‘Then He proceeds to juſtifie the late Proceedings of His Legate in Bretagne, as not being partial to either Party; and that as much as in Juſtice He could, He had been more favourable to the King's ſide than to the Other, as Count Charles of Blois had by Letters and Meſſages grievouſly complain'd to Him; yet however, He had now upon Complaint of His Friends recalled Him, and if any undue Practices were proved againſt Him, He ſhould further correct Him. After theſe Anſwers He puts the King in Mind, that againſt the Tenor of the Truce He had ſeized upon the City of Vannes, and expelled thoſe who were to keep it by direction of the Cardinals and Mediators in the Name of Him and the Roman Church, during the Truce; who were to diſpoſe of it afterwards as they ſhould think fit; of all which He ſaid nothing in His laſt Letters.

The Pope enjoins the K. to obſerve the Truce, and put the City of Vannes into the Hands of the Legates.

‘Then He goes on with a long and tedious Diſcourſe, telling Him how God had fitted Him with many Endowments to proſecute His Cauſe againſt the Enemies of the Chriſtian Faith; after which He earneſtly perſwades Him to undertake the Holy War, and calmly to conſider, whether the violation of the Truce ought to be imputed to the King of France, or rather to Himſelf? withal requeſting and exhorting Him in the Lord, and enjoining Him by virtue of the Oath He had made, to obſerve the Truce; to reſtore the City of Vannes into the hands of the Cardinal-Legates, in the ſame Condition it was when He expelled thoſe they had appointed to keep it in the Name of Him and the Church, during the whole time of the Truce, as is therein expreſſed; and to return to the obſervation of the Truce, which was to laſt until Michaelmaſs next coming, and a Year afterwards; and to omit His Warlike Preparations and Inſults, promiſing to prevail with the King of France to do the like.

That the King would ſend ſome freſh Commiſſioners to Him, and offers Himſelf to be a Mediator.

Laſtly, ‘He concludes with Prayers and Exhortations, That He would renew the Treaty of Peace, and to ſend ſome able and experienced Commiſſioners with full Power to treat of it; and promiſes, that having God only before His Eyes, He will promote it without Partia-

* Call'd by this Author Quentfort, but erroneouſly.

The K. ſends the Earl of Arundel His Lieutenant into Gaſcoigne, attended by ſome other Earls with great Force.

K. Edward was now reſolved to leave off the Combats of the Pen, and return to thoſe of the Sword, which alone could do His Buſineſs, and to this end [1.] He ſent the Earl of Arundel, His Lieutenant, into Gaſcoigne, accompany'd by the Earls of Pembroke and Oxford*, with 300 Knights and Eſquires, 2000 Archers, and 1000 Men at Arms, who taking Shipping at Southampton, landed at Bayonne, and after a ſhort ſtay there, they went to Bourdeaux, when they had refreſhed themſelves there a few days, they marched into the French Territories as far as the Town of Bergerac, where the French that lay in Gariſon ſeeing the Engliſh that came before it were much fewer in number than they expected, they ventur'd to ſally out upon them before they could come over the Bridges, and paſs the River Dardogne, on which the Town is ſeated; but they being moſt of them Countrey-Peaſants, and but ill arm'd, could not ſtand before the Engliſh, who were old experienced Soldiers; but running away toward the Town, the Engliſh follow'd them Pall-Mall, and had enter'd it with them, had they not immediately ſhut to the Gates, ſo that they then only took the Suburbs; but when the Earl ſaw that the Town was too ſtrong to be taken on that ſide, he ſent for about ſixty ſmall Ships, and ſome Barques from Bourdeaux, with which his Soldiers landed on that ſide next the River, which was not walled, but only fortify'd with a Palliſado, great part of which was preſently beaten down by the Engliſh; but it being now late at Night, the Gariſon deſired a Truce till the next Morning; before which time (finding the Place not tenable) they marched off with Bag and Baggage to La Reole, a ſtrong Town about eleven Leagues off, upon the River Garrone; then the next Morning, the Townſmen being thus deſerted, ſurrender'd the Place, upon condition of having their Lives and Goods ſaved, which the Earl graciouſly granted them; and ſo delivering him the Keys of the Town, they ſwore to him Fealty on the behalf of the King of England.

The Engliſh rout the French at Bergerac, which not being tenable, is deſerted by the Gariſon.

[2.] Id. c. 105.

The Earl marches forward, and takes ſeveral Caſtles and ſtrong places.

Then [2.] the Earl having ſtay'd here two days to reſt His Men, and on the third marched forward into the Countrey, and poſſeſſing themſelves of certain Caſtles in their way, took the Towns of Beaumont, Le Lac and Monagaret, the firſt of them by Storm, and the two latter on Conditions, as he did likewiſe the Town of Bounal. They paſſed by the City of Pierregont, being too ſtrong for their ſmall Forces to compaſs, and marched forward to attack the Caſtle of Peligreu not far off, when the Night following, there ſally'd out of the City laſt mentioned about Two hundred Spear-men, and falling upon the Engliſh Camp, ſlew and hurt many, and carry'd away the Earl of Oxford Priſoner into the Town;

The Engliſh are ſurprized by the French in their Camp, and the Earl of Oxford is taken Priſoner, but exchanged.

Town; however, the Engliſh ſtill beſieged the Caſtle of Peligreu, which proving too ſtrong to be taken, the Earl thought beſt to come to Terms with the Count of Perigord, upon condition, That the Earl of Oxford, with three Knights more, ſhould be exchang'd for as many French Noblemen, and that there ſhould be a Truce obſerved for the ſpace of Three Years, ſo that neither the French nor Engliſh ſhould make any War upon each other in thoſe Parts, during that Time.

[3] Id. ib.

The Earl having taken ſeveral other Caſtles and Towns, returns to Bourdeaux in triumph.

The Earl [3.] decamping from thence, turn'd into the Territory of Tholouſe, and beſieged a ſtrong Caſtle called Auberoche, belonging to the A Bp of that City, which being ſummon'd to ſurrender, they yielded the Place, ſince they ſaw the Count of Laille, who commanded in thoſe parts, was not able to bring ſufficient Force for their Relief. And here the Earl thought beſt to return back towards Bourdeaux, and in his way home he ſate down before a fine Town call'd Libourn, within nine Leagues of Bourdeaux, and having ſummon'd it, the Inhabitants, fearing to come to extremity, ſurrendered the Town, and ſwore Homage to the King of England: Then the Earl having left Sir Frank van Halle Governour of Auberoche with a ſtrong Gariſon, he return'd to Bourdeaux with the reſt of his Forces, where he was met by the Citizens in a Solemn Proceſſion, as having much enlarged the Engliſh-Territories: But though it was now about the end of July, and Winter far off, yet the Earl conſidering it was in vain to take in more places, unleſs he had Men ſufficient to gariſon them, his Forces having been very much diminiſhed in the late Expedition, reſolved to do no more this Campaign, but to keep thoſe places he had already taken.

[4.] Id. c. 107.

The Count La de Laille muſters up an Army, and beſieges Auberoche.

Yet [4.] this he was not long able to do, for the Count de Laille, who was ſtill at La Reole, when he underſtood that the Earl of Derby lay at Bourdeaux, without any appearance of taking the Field again that Year, wrote immediately to the Earl of Perigord, the Viſcount of Carmain, the Earls of Comminges and Bruniquel, and divers other Lords of Gaſcoigne, who held with France, that they ſhould all inſtantly join their Forces, and meet him by ſuch a day before Auberoche; which being put in execution accordingly, they laid vigorous ſiege to the Place before the Engliſh were aware of it; and the French ſo ſhook the Walls, and beat down the Roofs of the Towers with great Stones from their Engines of Battery, that the Beſieged were forced to repoſe themſelves in Vaults and Cellars, ſo that they were almoſt reduced to the laſt extremity. When the Earl of Derby received notice by a Spy of the deſperate Condition of the Place, he was much concerned for it, as alſo for his Friends that were in it, and therefore reſolved to undergo any Danger, ſo he might ſave them; in order to which he made up a ſmall flying Party of about 300 Lancers, and 600 Archers, but they were not ſtrong enough to encounter the French Army, (which was between 10 and 12000 Men); wherefore to reinforce thoſe few Forces, he had ſent to the Earl of Pembroke, who was then Governor of Bergerac, to meet him at Libourn, with what Men he could draw out of that Gariſon; but he not coming at the Time appointed, the Earl of Derb would not any longer defer his Deſign, leſt the Enemy ſhould get Intelligence of his March, which he ſtill perſued with that ſecrecy and expedition, that being attended by the Earl of Oxford, Sir Wate Manny, and ſeveral other Gentlemen, they came upon the French Camp i in the Cloſe of the Evening, when they were at Supper, and falling in among the Gaſcoigners, and killing all that came in their way; it ſo alarm'd the whole Army, that they knew not which way to turn themſelves In the mean while the Engliſh Archers, who ſtayed without the Camp, ſhot furiouſly, and ſlew many of thoſe that came out of it, and endeavour'd to rally; and at the ſame time the Men at Arms who were within, eaſily overcame thoſe that they found unarmed and diſorder'd in the Camp; ſo that in ſhort, the Earl of Laille himſelf, being firſt grievouſly wounded, was taken Priſoner in his own Tent, and the Earl of Perigord; but the Lord Duras, and divers other Officers of Note, were ſlain upon the Place.

Which is reliev'd by the Earl of Derby with no great Forces, and the French Army routed.

The Earl of Laille taken Priſoner, and many Nobles and Officers ſlain.

But for all this, the other Half of the French Army remain'd as yet entire and undiſturbed: And now the Earl of Cominges, the Viſcount of Carmain, with the reſt of the Noblemen that were with them, who lay encamped with a Moiety of the Army on the other ſide the Caſtle, having had ſufficient notice of the Enemies Approach, were riſen, and drawn out into the Field in order of Battel. When the Engliſh, by this time, being fluſhed with their Victory, which they were now afraid to loſe, drew up again in good Order, and placing the Archers in the Wing, briskly Charged the Enemy; who made alſo a Vigorous Defence. But whilſt the Succeſs yet remained doubtful, Sir Frank Van Halle, with the Gariſon from within the Town, turned the Scale: For having notice, by the Noiſe of the Trumpets and Shouts of their Victorious Countrymen, what was doing without, they boldly ſallied upon the Backs of their Enemies with a Terrible Outcry, and fully perfected their Defeat; and reſolving to be revenged for what they had ſuffer'd, gave them no Quarter: So that in this Action, above Seven Thouſand of the French were Slain, and a great many taken Priſoners; among the latter, were Nine Earls and Viſcounts, of Lords and Knights Two Hundred, and of Eſquires and other Soldiers ſo many, that every Engliſhman had two or three Priſoners; the reſt were ſaved by the Darkneſs of the Night. This Victory is as great an Inſtance of what a few Courageous Men may do, by taking their Advantage over a more numerous Enemy, as any can be ſhewn in Hiſtory, and is owned as ſuch by the French Hiſtorians themſelves.

The other part of the French Army is alſo put to flight, by the Sallying of the Gariſon out of the Town.

Seven Thouſand French are ſlain, and a great many Noblemen and others taken Priſoners.

The [5.] Engliſh dealt very kindly with their Priſoners, and ſuffered many of them to go, upon their Oath to return with Money for their Ranſoms, or to render their Bodies by ſuch a day at Bergerac, or Bourdeaux. The Fight being ended, all the Engliſh entred into Auberoche, and there the Earl of Derby treated the French Earls, and other Noblemen, his Priſoners, at Supper. This Victory was obtain'd on St. Lawrence's Day, or 10*th* of Auguſt at Night, 1345, or as Froiſſ. reckons 1344 but herein he is miſtaken, as I ſhall ſhew by and by. About the ſame time, the Earl, like a Pious General, gave Orders, that Publick and Private Thankſgiving ſhould be return'd to God; becauſe, by his immediate Hand of Providence, a Thouſand of them had overcome near Twelve Thouſand of the Enemy, and had ſeaſonably relieved this Town, and ſaved their Friends, who in all likelihood would otherwiſe have been loſt.

[5.] Id. ib. The Engliſh ſet free their Priſoners for eaſie Ranſoms; and the General returns ſolemn Thanks to God for their Victory.

The Earl of Pembroke arrives after the Fight, and is at firſt diſſatisfied, but alters his mind upon this great Succeſs.

The next Morning after the Fight, arrived the long expected E of Pembroke, with Three Hundred Men at Arms, and Four Thouſand Archers, and ſeemed diſpleaſed that the Buſineſs was over before he came: But upon the Earl of Derby's Excuſe, that they had waited for him as long as they durſt, without loſing an Opportunity, which could only then be laid hold on; he reſted ſatisfied, the great Succeſs of this Undertaking anſwering indeed all the Objections that could be made againſt it; as on the other ſide, had it proved otherwiſe, it would have been thought a very Raſh Action.

After this, the Earl of Derby made Sir Alexander Chaumont, a Va liant Knight of Gaſcoigne, Governor of the Gariſon; and having tar ried ſome time in Auberoche, during which the French Battering En gines were brought into the Town, and their Camp ſpoiled, he depart ed the next Morning with the Earl of Pembroke, and his own Forces for Bourdeaux.

[1.] Mr. Barns's Hiſt. p. 305. Froiſſ. miſtake in making two Expeditions of one.

*P. 315.

I cannot but here take notice, [1.] that the Learned Writer of the Life of King Edward, being miſled by Froiſſart, contrary to all our Hiſtorians, places theſe Actions of the Earl of Derby under the laſt Year, and only ſuppoſes what follows to have been performed under this; making two Expeditions of that which was really but one, a any Body may obſerve, that will but compare what he ſays in hi * 23*d*. Chapter, concerning the Earl's going over again into F this Year, with the Account he gives of it in the foregoing C And he will find it to be one and the ſame Expedition, by the Ti the Earl began this, as alſo from the Place he went on Shipboard, a well as that where he landed; and both what was paſt and what fol low'd to have been perform'd in one and the ſame Campaign, as al the Hiſtorians, both French and Engliſh, (except Froiſſart) do agre But to return to our Hiſtory.

[2.] Froiſſ. c. 108. The E. makes another Incurſion into the French Territories and takes ſeveral Towns & Caſtles.

After [2.] the Earl of Derby had reſted his Men, and ſtrengthene his Army with freſh Recruits, he was reſolved to lay hold on this Op portunity (when the French had no Army in thoſe Parts) to mak another Incurſion into their Territories, and, if poſſible, to lay Sieg to the ſtrong Town of la Reole already mentioned. And t this end, leaving Bourdeaux about the end of Auguſt, he marched t Bergerac, where joining Forces with the Earl of Pembroke, making i all Two Thouſand Men at Arms, and Three Thouſand Croſs-bows o Horſeback, he marched to the French Frontiers, and took the Caſtl of St. Baſil, and from thence advanced to a ſtrong Place called Roch millon; which, tho' he knew it to be very well fortified and mann'd yet he reſolved to aſſault: But finding a vigorous Reſiſtance, h cauſed the Ditches to be fill'd with Faggots, and the Walls to be un dermined by his Pioneers, whilſt his Archers ſhot ſo thick upon tho within, that they ſcarce durſt ſhow themſelves on the Walls; ſo tha a large Breach being made, the Engliſh enter'd the Town and Caſtl and put all to the Sword, except thoſe whom, being fled to the Church and there imploring his Mercy, the Earl pardon'd.

[3.] Id. ib. The Town of Montſegur agrees to ſurrender, if not reliev'd by a time prefixt, and gives Hoſtages to perform it.

Then [3] leaving a Gariſon in this Place, he march'd forward and laid cloſe Siege to the Town of Montſegur, which proving to ſtrong to be eaſily taken by Force, and the Earl not thinking it wort his while to ſtay till he could reduce it, accepted of the Offer made hi by the Governor of the Gariſon and Townſmen, That if they wer

not relieved within the Space of a Month, they would quietly ſurrender the Place into his Hands: And for the true Performance thereof, Twelve of the Richeſt Burgeſſes were ſent Hoſtages to Bourdeaux. From thence the Earl went on, and ſat down before the ſtrong Caſtle of Aguillion in Agenois; where as ſoon as he arrived, and had ſummoned it, the Governor ſurrender'd, on condition of marching out with Bag and Baggage. But when he came to Thoulouſe, the French hanged him for a Coward, for ſo eaſily giving up this Important Fortreſs; which being ſeated on the Point where two Rivers met, was counted one of the Strongeſt Places in Europe.

The Earl lays Siege to the ſtrong Caſtle of Aguillion, which, upon Summons, is ſurrender'd, but the Governor is hang'd by the French for a Coward.

[5.] Then the Earl having taken the Town of Mont Segurr by Aſſault, came before the Town of la Reole, being the Place for which he chiefly deſigned this Expedition; when having laid cloſe Siege to it, and made ſeveral Aſſaults againſt it with Engines upon Wheels, which being built three Stories high, each Stage containing One Hundred Archers; which, when the Ditches were fill'd up, were drawn cloſe to the Walls, and under the Covert of theſe Pioneers, made a great Breach, Whereupon the Inhabitants ſurrender'd the Town, on condition of having their Lives and Goods preſerved; but the Gariſon retired to the Caſtle, which being very ſtrong, held out, and not likely to be taken by Aſſault, they were forced to do it by Mineing; which ſucceeded ſo well, that after it had held out near Eleven Weeks, the Miners were at laſt got under the Baſe-Court, but [1.] could not undermine the Great Tower or Dungeon, becauſe it ſtood upou a Rock. When the Governor perceived the Caſtle was thus undermined, and the Walls only ſupported by Props, he deſired a Parly; where he offer'd to ſurrender the Place, provided he and his Men might march out with their Arms and Horſes; Which being at length granted by the Earl, the Place was ſurrender'd accordingly; and thus the ſtrong Town and Caſtle of la Reole was again reduced to the Engliſh Obedience, after it had been in Poſſeſſion of the French above Twenty Years; when it was taken by Count Charles of Valois, Father to the preſent K. Philip.

[5.] Id. ib. c. 110.
He then beſieges la Reole, which is alſo ſurrender'd.

[1.] Id. c. 112.
The Gariſon retires to the Caſtle, which is alſo yielded on reaſonable Conditions.

[2.] After the Earl of Derby had reſted himſelf and his Men, ſome few days at this Place, and given Orders for the Repair of the Breaches; he marched on to Montpezat, which not being very well mann'd, the Caſtle was ſoon taken by Aſſault, tho' many Engliſh Archers were there ſlain. Here the Earl leaving a ſmall Gariſon, went on to a ſtrong Town called Maulrou, which he not being able to take by Storm, compaſſed with this Stratagem; viz. The Earl ſeemed to raiſe the Siege, and left a Party in the Rear of his Army, under the Command of the Earl of Oxford, as it were, lying behind to entice the Beſieged to Sally out upon them; but had already order'd Sir Walter Manny with a ſtrong Detachment, to lie in Ambuſh not far from the Town, in a Vally among the Olive-Trees and Vineyards. So upon the Earl's marching off, the Townſmen ſeeing ſome of his Men lag behind, ſallied out upon them; who flying on purpoſe till they were paſt the Place of the Ambuſcade, they turned again upon the Perſuers with great Fury: And at the ſame time Sir Walter Manny, with his Men, ſallied out from among the Vines upon their Backs; and ſome of the ſame Party, with thoſe that lay there, ran ſtrait into the Town, where finding the Gates open againſt the Return of their Companions, they ſurprized them, and kept their Poſt until the coming up of the reſt, who had now diſpatched or taken Priſoners all that had ſallied out upon them: Whereupon the Town preſently yielded to the Earl of Derby, who generouſly preſerved it from being plunder'd. Thus was this ſtrong Place won by much the ſame Stratagem, as we find in Scripture the City of Ai was taken by Joſhua.

[2.] Id. c. 113.
The Earl goes on, and takes divers other Towns and Caſtles.

And particularly Maulrou, by Stratagem.

[2.] Id. c. 113, 114. He takes in other Places, and comes before Angouleſme which the Citizens promiſe, if not relieved by ſuch a time.

[2.] From thence he marched to Ville-Franche, which together with the Caſtle was taken by Aſſault. Then having poſſeſſed himſelf of Miramont, and another Town called Thonnins, and the Caſtle of Damoſſen by Surrender, he came before the Great City of Angouleſme, and vowed he would not ſtir from thence, until he had it yielded to him: Whereupon the Citizens being terrified with his late Succeſs, deſired a Month's Reſpite, within which time if they were not ſuccour'd by the King of France, with a Force ſufficient, to keep the Field, they then engaged to Surrender the Town to him, and for the Performance of this, they ſent Four and Twenty of their Principal Burgeſſes, Hoſtages to Bourdeaux.

[3.] Id. ib. He beſieges Blaye without any Succeſs.

But Angouleſme is ſurrender'd to him.

The Earl returns to Bourdeaux, & there winters.

[4.] Gaguin. Villani. l. 12. c. 46.

Upon [3.] this Compoſition, the Earl raiſed the Siege, and marched to Blaves, or Blaye, where was a ſtrong Gariſon held by two valiant Commanders; who, upon the Earl's Summons, anſwered, They would yield to no man. Wherefore he laid a cloſe Siege to the Place; which he not being able to take by Aſſault, reſolved to do it by Famine: And whilſt he blocked up the Town, ſent a Detachment to take in ſome Neighbouring Places of leſs Conſequence, ſuch as Mortaigne in Xantoigne, near the Sea-ſide; where his Forces being repulſed, as well as at ſome others, they return'd to the Camp before Blaye, which ſtill held out. But by this time the Month being expired, the Earl of Derby remembring his Agreement with the City of Angouleſme, ſent thither his two Mareſchals, to whom the Citizens willingly ſurrender'd, and ſwore Allegiance to the King of England; whereupon their Hoſtages were reſtored, and the City indemnified. Then the Earl having appointed for Governor thereof the Lord Norwich, a valiant Commander, Winter now being far advanced, and ſeeing the ſtout Reſiſtance at Blaye, and the ſmall Importance of the Place, the Earl reſolved to ſpare his Men for better Service, and to raiſe the Siege, till a more commodious Seaſon: So he diſlodged, and repaſſing the River Garrone, went back to Bourdeaux, where he diſtributed his Men into Winter-Quarters. And thus [4.] the Earl of Derby having recovered moſt of the Places that had been taken from the Crown of England, kept them in Poſſeſſion till the Beginning of the next Year; when John Duke of Normandy marching with a Great Army into thoſe Parts, recovered moſt of them again, as you will find hereafter. And indeed he had endeavour'd it this Autumn, could he have preſently raiſed a Force ſufficient to oppoſe the Earl of Derby, then in the full Career of Succeſs. For King Philip had before ſent his Son, Duke John, with a Conſiderable Force, to put a ſtop to the Earl of Derby; but when he came near the Confines of Gaſcoign, he heard ſuch ſtrange Reports of the great Strength of the Engliſh, that he retired without doing any thing; at which the King his Father was very much diſpleaſed.

[5] Froiſſ. c. 116. The Ruin of Jacob Van Artefeld, and on what account.

But in the mean while, the King's Affairs in Flanders did not proceed ſo much to his Advantage as they had done in France: For there happened a Memorable Accident which for ſome time put a ſtop to His Deſigns in thoſe Parts. It fell out thus: [5.] Jac. Van Artefeld (whom we have ſo often mentioned) having now form'd a Project (for the raiſing of his Family, and the ſecuring his Intereſt in Gaunt) utterly to diſinherit the Earl of Flanders of that Country, and to put the Government of it into the hands of the King of England, upon Condition He would beſtow it upon Prince Edward His Son, with the Title of Duke; and the King being made acquainted with it, ſo far aſſured Himſelf of Succeſs, that leaving His Son the Lord Lionel Lieutenant of the Kingdom in His abſence, He took Shipping at Sandwich ~~about Midſummer~~, accompany'd by His Son the Prince, and the Earl of Warwick, with divers other Lords, and x passing over to Sluice, lay at Anchor in the Harbor, and there kept Open Houſe on Board, many of His Friends of Flanders coming thither to viſit and pay their Reſpects to Him; where having one day entertain'd the Conſuls of moſt of the Chief Towns in Flanders, [1.] Jacob Van Artefeld (as was before agreed) made them a Plauſible Speech, 'extolling the King of England's Power, either to protect his Friends, or puniſh his Enemies; he likewiſe ſet forth the great Good Will which He had all along expreſs'd to His Allies of the Lower Germany, and that the Prince of Wales, His Son, would no way fall ſhort of his Father's Vertues, but rather promiſed, if God gave him Life, to equal all His Noble Qualities; but as for their own Lord Lewis, he was unmindful of the Welfare of his People, had confederated with Philip their Mortal Enemy, and had himſelf made War againſt them, and done unto them many great Injuries; wherefore unleſs they judged it fit to requite their Well-willers with Neglect, and to yield their Enemies all Service and Friendſhip, he muſt needs adviſe them, either to make the Earl of Flanders do his Homage unto King Edward, to whom, as to the Rightful King of France, 'twas only due; or if through his Obſtinacy, they could not prevail with him herein, then wholly to caſt off the hateful Yoke of a Tyrannical and ſtubborn Lord, and ſubmit to the Mild and Equal Government of King Edward and His Son, who would advance the Earldom of Flanders into a Dukedom, and make them flouriſh above all other People in Trade and Proſperity.

K. Edward goes over to Flanders, on hopes of making His Son, the Prince, Earl thereof, which Jacob does all he can to promote.

[1.] Mezeray, ad hunc Ann. His Speech to the Conſuls of the chief Towns on the K's behalf.

This [2.] Speech was ſo far from being well receiv'd by the Conſuls there preſent, that they inwardly reſented the Propoſal; yet not daring to give a poſitive Denyal, they adjourned the further Debate for the preſent, by returning in general, That the Matter propoſed to them being of very great importance, they could ſay nothing to it at preſent, before they had propoſed it to their reſpective Cities and Towns, and if the Major and Wiſer part would agree, they ſhould do ſo too, and ſo promiſed within a Month's time to come again to His Majeſty with their final Anſwer. Then the King and Jacob urged them to make a more ſpeedy Return, but when they could obtain no other Reply from them, they were diſmiſſed; but Jacob ſtaid behind with the King, ſtill making Him believe that he would bring this Deſign to a good Effect; but he was deceived, and the King too, who now found He had gone too far already in this Affair, and was afraid of the Succeſs, eſpecially leſt His Friend ſhould ſuffer for his Kindneſs; [3.] wherefore He offered him a Guard of 500 Welſhmen, commanded by Sir John Matravers; which tho' accepted by Jacob Van Artefeld, becauſe he feared one Gerard Deniſe, Dean of the Weavers; yet he was ſo ſecure, that having brought the Citizens of Bruges and Ypres to his Opinion, he return'd

[3.] King Edward, who ſtill lay at Sluiſe, expecting an Anſwer fro the Flemiſh Deputies, upon the News of this Murther, immediately r turn'd for England, vowing a ſevere Revenge upon thoſe who had an hand in this Action: And indeed ſeveral of the Chief Towns in Flande were ſo ſenſible of the King's Diſpleaſure, that they reſolved to ſend De puties to appeaſe Him; and not long after thoſe of Bruges, Ypres, Cour tray, &c. ſent to the King, deſiring His ſafe Conduct, to come over an excuſe themſelves about that Matter, which He yielded to when H Fit of Paſſion was over.

Several Deputies from the chief Towns in Flanders come over to excuſe themſelves, and appeaſe His Diſpleaſure.

Then about Michaelmaſs certain Deputies of the beſt Note came fro all the Chief Towns of Flanders (except Gaunt) into England, and aft ſome time they were introduced into the King's Preſence at Weſtminſte where they humbly excuſed themſelves of being any way acceſſary t the Death of Jacob Van Artefeld, and ſwore ſolemnly, that they kne nothing of it till it was done; and that if they had, he was the Ma whom to the beſt of their Powers they would have defended, and tha they were all extremely concern'd for His Loſs: They added fu ther, That the Gauntois themſelves, who had done this Barbarou Act, ſhould make ſatisfaction for it. and His Council, That although he was dead, yet the King of England was not at all ſunk in the Love and Fidelity of the Good People of Flanders, as He ſhould find in all things, except what pertain'd to the Inheritance of that Earldom; which they ſaid, The Flemings were reſolved by no means to preſume to diſpoſe of from the Right Heirs. Theſe and the like Proteſtations ſomewhat pacify'd the King's Diſpleaſure, ſo that ſoon after, the League between England and Flanders was renew'd, and the Death of Van Artefeld quite forgotten.

They promiſe him all Fidelity except the diſinheriting their Earl; whereupon the League is again renew'd with them.

But before we quit this Subject, I cannot but obſerve, that it was one of the Raſheſt and moſt Inconſiderate Actions of this King's Reign, to believe the Falſe Aſſurances of one Single Man, concerning His Son's being declar'd Earl of Flanders, ſo far, as to make a Voyage thither on purpoſe, before He was aſſured of the Reſolutions of the chief Cities and Towns of that Countrey.

[4.] Nor was this the only Misfortune K. Edw. receiv'd, for not long after, John Earl of Haynault, &c. the King's Nephew, having been victorious this Summer over the City of Utrech, and being reſolved to carry on his Succeſs, ſail'd from Dort about the end of September, with a great Fleet and Army to reduce the Rebellious Friſons to their Obedience; but landing too precipitately near Staverin, he was ſet upon by them, before the reſt of his Men could come in to his Aſſiſtance, and being unknown, was there unfortunately ſlain about the beginning of October, together with his Nephew William Marqueſs of Juliers, a Valiant Young Prince, and a great Friend to King Edward.

[4] Id. c. 117. The Unfortunate End of John Earl of Haynault.

The [5.] Lord John of Haynault, Uncle to the Earl, was not then with him, but being tranſported with Rage at the News, he would preſently have gone away to revenge his Death, had he not been hindered by his Servants, who refuſed to obey him, and ſo carry'd him back againſt his Will: But not long after, this Lord was perſuaded by one of his chief Counſellors to leave K. Edward, and go over to the K. of France's Intereſt, upon a Suggeſtion, that K. Edward would not now continue to pay him the Penſions which he had hitherto receiv'd out of England; which the French King hearing of, ſent Envoys to treat with him, and coming to an Agreement, He made him one of His Chief Council, and alſo beſtow'd upon him as much, or more Revenues in France, than he had ever enjoy'd in England.

[5.] Id. ib. c. 118. The Ld John his Uncle would have gone to revenge his Death, but was hindered by his Servants, ſome of whom perſwade him over to the K. of France's Intereſt, who makes him one of His chief Counſellors.

[1.] But to make ſome amends for theſe Loſſes, not long before the Lord Godfrey de Harcourt (Brother to the Earl of that Name) came over to K. Edward; he had been once as intimate with K. Philip of France as any Lord of His Realm, but upon occaſion of a Quarrel between his Brother and a Marſhal of France (which was fomented by Partakers on both ſides) he ſo greatly diſpleaſed K. Philip, that could He have got him into His Hands, perhaps he might have found no better Uſage than the Lord Cliſſon, and the reſt abovementioned; but he receiving timely notice from his Friends, withdrew into Brabant to the Duke his Couſin, by whom (when all his Lands were ſeized on by K. Philip) he was adviſed to go into England, and profer his Service to the King, which was graciouſly received; and he made uſe of him in his following Wars, to the great prejudice of France, as you will find hereafter.

With theſe Forces Count Montfort took and ſacked Dinant, and laid ſiege to Quimperle, where being ſuddenly taken with a Burning Fevour, he died about the end of September at Quimpercocorentin, leaving his Pretenſions to the conduct of his Gallant Lady, and his Young Son John; who many years after having ſlain Charles of Blois in Battel, obtained, together with the Dukedom, the Noble Sir-name of Valiant: However, after the Death of this Earl, the greateſt part of Bretagne was for ſome time in the hands of Charles of Blois; for now moſt of the Engliſh Soldiers were gone into Gaſcoigne to ſerve the Earl of Derby, except Sir Thomas Dagworth, and thoſe who before were formerly ſent to the aſſiſtance of the Counteſs of Montfort.

Me

Anno Dom. MCCCXLVI.

Men. With which, in the Beginning of January, the Duke of Normandy took his March from Tholouſe, to that Part of the Country which the Engliſh had conquer'd the Year before. Where the firſt thing that ſtood in their way, was, the Caſtle of Miramount, which they took by Aſſault; and marching alſo to Ville-Franche, did the like to that Place.

With which he takes in ſeveral Places.

When [5.] the Earl of Lancaſter heard that the French had enter'd the Engliſh Territories, not expecting the Duke of Normandy would have taken the Field ſo ſoon, and he not having Forces ſufficient to reſiſt ſo great an Army, did all that lay in his Power to act defenſively, and to ſecure what he had won, by ordering the Earl of Pembroke, and Sir Walter Manny, with ſeveral other Knights and Perſons of Quality, to the number of Forty, to take along with them Three Hundred Men at Arms, and a proportionable Number of Archers, and with all ſpeed to go to the Reinforcement of the Gariſon in the Caſtle of Aiguillon, to maintain that Fortreſs: For tho' the Duke of Normandy had paſſed by without attempting it, yet he would not have it loſt by any means. Theſe went thither accordingly, and there found an Hundred and Twenty Luſty Soldiers, whom the Earl had left there the laſt Year. Theſe being all got together, immediately applied themſelves to fetch in Proviſions from all Parts, that ſo they might be able to hold out a long Siege, as you will find they did ſome time after.

[5.] Id ib. The Earl of Lancaſter is fain, for want of ſufficient Forces, only to be upon the Defenſive, and ſends a ſtrong Gariſon to the Caſtle of Aiguillon.

In the [1.] mean while, the Duke of Normandy laid cloſe Siege to the City of Angouleſme; which, notwithſtanding the Weakneſs of the Gariſon, and Largeneſs of the Place, made a Defence beyond Expectation; until at laſt finding their Proviſions begin to fail, and that there was no holding out much longer, the Lord* Norwich, the Governor, had no way left to quit the Place with Safety, but by making uſe of this Stratagem. The day before our Lady's Purification, he deſired a Parly with the Duke in Perſon; who, at his Requeſt, coming up near the Walls, the Governor told him, he had only one Favour to beg of him, which was for the Honour of the Bleſſed Virgin, That he would grant him a Truce for the next day. The Duke deſiring to know, whether he would then ſurrender the City, or not? He reply'd, as to that he was not yet reſolved; but that this Favour would render him much more inclinable to do it. Upon which, the Generous Prince granted his Requeſt. But the Crafty Governor laying hold of this Opportunity, order'd his Men to truſs up their Baggage, and be ready to march with him the next morning betimes; which they did accordingly. But as they came to the French Out-Guards, they were juſt going to fall upon them, when the Lord John of Norwich advancing at the Head of his Men, ſaid thus: 'Pray, Gentlemen, uſe no Violence, for we have had a Truce granted laſt Night by the Duke himſelf, for this Day, as you all know; and during that time, we may go where we pleaſe. The Duke being acquainted herewith, anſwered, Let them go whither they will, for tho' they have over-reached me, yet I will not break my Word: Whereupon they had leave to march thro' the Army to the Caſtle of Aiguillon, where they reinforced that Gariſon, which was very ſtrong before.

Anno Dom. MCCCXLVI.

[2] Mezeray ad Ann. 1364.

I am the more particular in relating this Action, becauſe ſuch Inſtances of the French Honour in this kind, are not very Common, either in our own, or former Ages. But of this Prince it is peculiarly noted, [2.] that when he was King, he was Author of that Noble Saying, That if Faith and Truth were baniſhed from Mankind, they ought to be found in the Mouths of Kings and Princes. And, I ſuppoſe, it was upon the Governor's knowing the Duke's Temper, that he now ran this Riſque; tho' the worſt that could befal them, was, to have been made Priſoners of War; which might have happened, had they held out a day or two longer.

[3] Id. ib.

The Duke enters Angouleſme and marching from thence, takes in ſeveral Towns & Caſtles.

[3.] Then the Duke, after the Departure of the Engliſh, marched quietly into the City, and having left ſufficient Forces to keep it, went back, and laid Siege to the Caſtle of Damaſſon, Which being taken by Aſſault, they put the Gariſon to the Sword. Then paſſing the River Garrone, he came before Tonneins; which, after a ſhort Siege, ſurrender'd upon Conditions. From thence he went to Port St. Mary, lying on the ſame River; where the Engliſh being about Two Hundred in Number, endeavoured to defend the Place, but were all put to the Sword. When this was done, he march'd forward, and laid Siege to the Caſtle of Aiguillon, ſeated on the Confluence of the Lort, and Garrone.

[4] Froiſſ. c. 121. Villani l. 12. c. 60.

He beſieges the Caſtle of Aiguillon, which laſts ſeveral Months.

And is at laſt forced to raiſe the Siege.

At [4.] this Place, the Duke having inveſted it with his whole Army, began a Formal Siege, which laſted ſeveral Months: For beſides the Natural Strength of it, there were in the Gariſon Four Hundred Lords and Gentlemen, and about Four Thouſand Men of all Sorts, moſt of whom were old experienced Soldiers. So that this Siege was one of the moſt remarkable in that Age; as well for the briſk Aſſaults of the French, as vigorous Sallies of the Engliſh, which they commonly made with great Advantage: But, ſince to relate all the Particulars of it would be tedious, and not very inſtructive to the Reader, I ſhall ſay no more, than that the French Aſſaulted the Place thrice a day for a Week together; ſo that after all the Efforts they could make by Engines of Battery, and other Warlike Machines, the Duke was at laſt forced to raiſe the Siege, to go and aſſiſt his Father, after the Battle of Creſſy, as you will find preſently; tho' at his Sitting down before it, he had made a Solemn Oath never to raiſe the Siege, till he had the Place in his Poſſeſſion.

[5] Ib.

The Duke of Lancaſter not being ſtrong enough to encounter the French, hinders them from Proviſions, and tires them out.

The [5.] Duke of Lancaſter was not idle in the mean time; for tho' he had not a ſufficient Army to raiſe the Siege, yet he had divers conſiderable Succeſſes over ſome Parties of the French, who were ſent to take in other Places, whom either he, or ſome of his Captains happened to meet with: Inſomuch that the Duke of Normandy was ſo pent in by the Earl and his Gariſons, that he durſt never ſend out any Parties for Forage, but in very conſiderable Numbers; whereby he was not without great Difficulties, to get in ſufficient Proviſions for the Army, for fear of the Earl of Lancaſter, who ſo well watched his Advantages, that the Beſiegers were at laſt quite tired out.

Upon the News of the Duke of Normandy's Succeſs, the King prepares to go to Gaſcoigne.

But it is time now to return to the Affairs of England. King Edward having received full information from His Lieutenant the Earl of Lancaſter, of the Duke of Normandy's Deſcent into Guienne, and of his Succeſs in thoſe Parts; He thereupon reſolved to go over in Perſon, to defend His Territories, and reſcue ſo many Gallant Subjects who were cloſely beſieged in the Caſtle above-mentioned.

The King holds a great Council, and what was done in it.

In order to this Great Expedition, the King held it neceſſary, firſt to ſettle and reform what was amiſs in His own Kingdom: And to this end, in Lent, [1]He held a Great Council of the Biſhops and Peers, at Weſtminſter; where, by their Advice, He took into His own Hands all the Profits, Revenues, and Emoluments, which the Cardinals of the French Faction, and other Foreign Clergymen, held within the Realm. For He thought it not reaſonable, that thoſe who favour'd the Pope, (a Frenchman by Birth) and the French King, ſhould enjoy any ſuch Promotion or Advantage in His Kingdom.

I ſuppoſe likewiſe, that therein it was * ordain'd, That all His Juſtices throughout His Dominions, ſhould renounce, and utterly forbear taking any Penſions, Fees, or any Sort of Gratuities, from any one; (which before they were wont to receive, both of Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Others) that ſo their Hands being clear from all Corruption, Juſtice might be by them more uprightly and impartially adminiſtred. For this Worthy Prince then thought He might expect a Bleſſing upon His Cauſe, when He took care that His Subjects might have Righteous Judgments in His Courts: And then it was that that Form of Oath was drawn up for all Juſtices to take, tho' in our Printed Books of Statutes it is miſplaced in the Eighteenth Year of this Reign.

And in this Council, the King, to ſatisfie His Subjects, that had made great Complaints againſt the Purveyors for his Houſhold; who, under Colour of their Commiſſions, took up all manner of Proviſions without ready Money, or ever paying for them: Wherefore he now cauſed a ſtrict Enquiry to be made into their ſaid Miſdemeanors; and ſome of the moſt Notorious Offenders were hang'd, and others condemned to pay great Fines, whereby that Grievance was redreſſed, and others of the King's Officers were made at leaſt more Wary, if not more Honeſt for the future.

The King Himſelf, on the 4*th* of July, at His taking Shipping, reſolved to land at Bayonne, or Bourdeaux, in order to raiſe the Siege of Aiguillon; but God was pleaſed to order it otherwiſe, for on the 3d Day when they were now very near the Coaſt of France, there aroſe a contrary Wind, which drove them back upon the Coaſt of Cornwall, but without any further damage, where they were forced to lay about ſix days at Anchor; during which time the King took a different reſolution; for [5] Godfrey de Harecourt abovementioned, (who attended Him in this Expedition, and was now much truſted by Him) made uſe of this Occaſion to perſuade Him from ſailing to Gaſcoigne, but rather to make for Normandy, as being more ſafe and honourable And for His Encouragement he further remonſtrated to Him, that i He would land in that Countrey, which He very well knew (as having been a Conſiderable Man in it,) he would find an eaſie Shore for Him ſince the Common People were wholly unwarlike; and as for the Noblemen and Gentlemen, they were with the Duke of Normandy in Guienne; beſides all which, He ſhould find many rich Towns unfortify'd, by whoſe Plunder, not only His Soldiers, but He Himſelf might be much the better, and deſired Him to put confidence in him as to thi Matter, ſince none had more reaſon to underſtand it than himſelf.

Anno Dom. MCCCXLVI.

So ſoon as the French King had received the News of King Edward's being landed in Normandy, He was very much ſurprized, for He expected it would have been in Gaſcoigne; wherefore not having an Army then ready to march, all He could do at preſent, was, to ſend Orders to the Governors of Caën and other Places, to make as vigorous a defence as they could. And indeed King Edward's landing there at this time proved very fortunate to England; for the French King had deſigned, ſo ſoon as King Edward ſhould have begun to invade His Territories in the South of France, to raiſe a great Army to be tranſported into England; and in order to this had got a great many Ships, and expected more from Genoa for that purpoſe, when King Edward's arrival ſo near Paris quite fruſtrated thoſe Deſigns.

Upon the News of the K's landing K. Philip is very much ſurprized, and ſends orders to His Governors to make a vigorous defence.

The King [1.] having burnt the Town of La Hogue, order'd the Earl of Huntington, His Admiral, with part of the Fleet, and a hundred Men at Arms, and Four hundred Archers to cruiſe along the Sea-Coaſt, and to follow the Courſe of the Land Army; as for the reſt of this Navy, He had ſent it back into England: And His Land-Forces were divided into three Bodies, which took three ſeveral Routs, the King Himſelf marching in the midſt, whilſt that on the Right-hand towards the Sea, was led by the Earl of Warwick; and the Lord Harecourt commanded another Battalion on the Left-hand further into the Country, becauſe he beſt underſtood all the Ways and Avenues into it; theſe three Bodies amounting to Thirty thouſand Men, were order'd to meet every Night, and encamp together in one place: Thus they march'd forward burning and ſpoiling the Country as they went, until they came to * Barfleur, which was firſt plunder'd by the Soldiers, and then burnt by the Seamen, after the King's Departure; as they did likewiſe many great Ships in that Harbour; From thence the Earl of Warwick with his Party marched to Cherburgh, which He alſo took and plundered, excepting the Caſtle, which could not be then reduced, and thence return'd back on the Left-hand to Valognes, which they took, plunder'd, and ſet on fire: They did the ſame afterwards to Monteburgh, and all the Towns in thoſe Parts, from whence they got much Rich Plunder: Then they came to a conſiderable Town called Carenton, which tho' a ſtrong place, and well mann'd, yet the Townſmen againſt the Will of the Gariſon, ſurrender'd, upon Condition to have only their Lives ſav'd; but the Soldiers retiring to the Caſtle, within two Days after delivered it on Condition to march out with their Baggage.

[1.] Froiſſ. c. 122. The K. burns La Hogue, and marches from thence with His Army in three Battalions.

They take Barfleur, with ſeveral other Towns.

* In the printed Copies it is Harfleur, which is an Error.

[2.] Whilſt theſe things were perform'd by the Earl of Warwick's Battalion along the Sea-Coaſt, that which was commanded by the Lord Harecourt made no leſs Devaſtations up in the Country, where as Marſhal of the Army, he marching often ſix or ſeven Leagues from the King, his Men found no Place able to reſiſt them; for the People being wholly unwarlike, fled away for fear, to Caën and other Neighbouring Places of ſtrength, leaving moſt of their Goods and Proviſions behind 'em, of which the Army found more than ſufficient, beſides a great deal of Rich Plunder.

[2.] Id. ib. The Lord Harecourt deſtroys the Inland Countrsie.

[3.] The Country being thus clear'd as far as the North Point of Normandy, the King marched Eaſtward, directly towards St. Loo, being the fartheſt Port of the Lower-Normandy; but when He was come to this Place, He found the Town was already taken by a Detachment which which had been ſent thither before, and the Men were ſent Priſoners, on board the Fleet. From hence the King (having firſt burnt the Towns Torigny, Cormolin, Fontenay, and Cheſne) marched directly back again toward the Great City of Caën, and [4.] ſitting down before it, He ſent a Fryar to the Biſhop of Bayëux, and the Earl of Ewe, Conſtable of France, and the Earl of Tankerville, to exhort them to deliver up the City without Blood-ſhed; but inſtead of this the Biſhop ordered the Meſſenger to be put in Priſon, and tore the King's Letter in pieces. The Conſtable's Reſolution at firſt was to act only on the Defenſive, but being encouraged by the Towns-men, who were very numerous, and made a ſhew of ſufficient [5.] Courage, he reſolved to ſally out upon the Enemy the next day, on which (being the 20*th* of July) King Edward reſolved to make an Aſſault upon the City, when the Conſtable being follow'd by the Towns-men, and aſſiſted by the Gariſon, marched out to encounter the Engliſh, but when they ſaw the dreadful appearance of ſo many Armed Men, and tall Archers, who were ready to let fly, their Hearts began to fail them, and having ſcarce endured the firſt Brunt, for all that the Conſtable could ſay or do, they quite abandoned both him and their Honour, and fled with all the ſpeed they could toward the Town, the Engliſh eagerly following them at the Heels: Here it was that the Archers finding ſome reſiſtance at the Bridge, and the King fearing they might ſuffer by the Frenchmen at Arms, ſent the Earl of Warwick with more Men to aſſiſt the Archers, who ſo well acquitted himſelf, that he not only won the Gate of the Bridge, but beating down all that ſtood before him, entred the Town Pall-Mall together with the Enemy: When the Conſtable and the Earl of Tankerville ſaw how things went, curſing the Cowardize of the Towns-men, and their own Credulity, they betook themſelves to a Tower at the Bridge-foot, which they enter'd with certain Captains and Men of Quality.

[1.] Villani l. 12. c. 63. The Town is taken, and a great ſlaughter made of the French, whereupon the Conſtable and Earl of Tankerville yield themſelves Priſoners.

In the mean while the Engliſh, who had now poſſeſſed themſelves of the Town, were killing all they met, for as yet they gave no Quarter; and it happened very ill for the French, that the Tide in the River Seyne being now out, their Enemies could come in upon them either on Horſe-back or on Foot; ſo that there was a Cruel Slaughter made, no [1.] leſs than Five Thouſand being kill'd in this Action; whereupon the Conſtable and the Earl of Tankerville finding the Place they were in not tenable, reſolved to yield to Mercy; and eſpying an Engliſh Lord, one Sir Thomas Holland, whom they knew, marching down the Street, with five or ſix Knights in his Company, they called out to him, and coming down from the Tower, yielded themſelve his Priſoners. Then this Lord ſuppoſing the Town wholly maſtered mounted his Horſe, and rode about the Streets, where he ſaved many Lives, and preſerved ſeveral young Ladies and Nuns from Violation for now the Common Soldiers were grown outrageous, becauſe thoſ of the Town, who were got on the Tops of Houſes, flung down Tiles Stones, &c. wherewith they broke their Skulls, and did much miſchief which not only made them more cruel, but provoked alſo the King himſelf; who hearing at Night that above five hundred of his Me were killed, or grievouſly maim'd by that means, was about to hav given Orders to put all the Citizens to the Sword, and reduce the Cit to Aſhes; but He was ſoon diverted from it by the Lord de Harecourt ho ſhewed him the Ill Conſequences of ſo Cruel a Procedure: And hereupon, having received from Him milder Orders, rode early the ext Morning with his Banner diſplay'd before him, from Street to treet, and by an Herald commanded aloud in the King's Name, That o man ſhould preſume to ſet fire to any Houſe, to kill any Perſon, or o violate any Woman whatſoever. The Townſ-men hearing this Proclamation, freely admitted the Engliſh into their Houſes, and gave hem good Entertainment: And yet for all this there were ſeveral Rapes and Murthers committed in the Town; and the Spoil was beſtowed on the Soldiers; except Gold, Silver, and Precious Stones, nd the beſt Wares in the Merchants-Houſes and Shops, as Fine Cloath, Silks, and Linnen; of which vaſt Quantities were not long after conveyed into England for the King's Uſe, as were alſo all the Nobility, Gentry, and Citizens, who were there taken Priſoners.

And [3.] 'twas there they repreſented to Him, That they were ſent from His Holineſs to endeavour an Accord between Him and the King of France, deſiring Him to remit the whole Matter to the Pious Deciſion of the Pope. But King Edward, who could put no longer Truſt in Him, would not hear of any ſuch Accord; but preſently broke off all Treaty with the Legates, becauſe it appeared, That the Pope was much more favourable to the King of France, than to Him, or His Cauſe: Yet foraſmuch as one of them had been rifled by ſome Engliſh Soldiers, King Edward not only cauſed what was their own to be reſtored, but gave them ſomewhat over and above, to make them amends; and ſo they returned to Paris.

In the [4.] mean time, King Edward, by ſeveral Parties He ſent out, over-ran the Country far and near, burning and deſtroying all that came in their way, except it were ſome Caſtle or Place too ſtrong to be taken without a long and formal Siege, which He then could not well afford Men or Leiſure, ſince He daily expected the French King's coming up to give Him Battel. And for this reaſon He left Rouën on His left Hand, or elſe, (as others ſuppoſe) thro' the interceſſion of the Lord Harecourt, whoſe Brother, the Earl of the ſame Name, was Governor there with a ſtrong Gariſon: tho' ſome ſay, that the King of France Himſelf, with Part of His Army, ſtill marched not far from the Engliſh on the other ſide of the Seyne, watching the King of England's Motions all along until He came to Poiſſy; as appears by the Letters of the King's Chaplain, which we ſhall produce hereafter. Wherefore the King returned from thence to Pont del Arche on the Seyne, which He took and deſtroyed, as alſo all the Country about Rouën: The like He did to Vernon, and ſent out a Detachment from thence, which took and burnt the Town of Giſors,

It is to be noted, that on the ſecond Day after King Edward had paſſed the Seyne, being then at Abbeville, within three Leagues of Beauvois, He there received Letters from King Philip, ſignifying, that He would give Him battel either on the Thurſday, Saturday, Sunday, or Monday following, which K. Edward ſhould pleaſe to chuſe, on condition He would in the mean while forbear deſtroying the Country: To which the King immediately ſent Him an Anſwer in Writing, that begins with no other Title than bare Sir Philip of Valois; and then reciting the Subſtance of the French King's Letter, 'Wherein He offers to fight Him with his whole Power, between St. Germains de Prez, and Valgerart de la Paris; the King again aſſerts His Right to the Crown of France, which was unjuſtly uſurped from Him, and that He was now come over to recover it by a Battel, which He was willing to have given Him before now, had He not cauſed the Bridges to be broken down, ſo that He could not approach Him until He came to Poiſſy; where having cauſed the Bridge to be repaired, He had for Three days waited His coming, but in vain, for He had not appeared: And ſhould Philip decline Fighting now, He (viz. King Edward) was marched further into His own Realm, to comfort and aſſiſt His Friends, and chaſtiſe thoſe that Philip called His Subjects; whom if He deſired to ſpare, He ſhould find Him ready to receive Him in the Field, and to encounter Him by the Help of God; and which He earneſtly deſired, ſince Philip would not offer any other Way of ending this Difference between them: Yet that He ſhould not be directed by Him to accept of any Day, or Place, of Battel, upon His Conditions. Then [3.] King Edward paſſing by the City of Beauvois, which He would not ſtay to beſiege, ſtill went on towards the Somme, the Bridges of which were all broken, and all the Fords and Paſſes ſo ſtrongly guarded, that it was impoſſible to paſs them without imminent Hazard and Danger. For King Philip's Deſign was to encloſe Edward between the Two Rivers above-mentioned, that ſo He might either famiſh His Army for want of Proviſions, or elſe force Him to a Battel, to His great Diſadvantage; ſo that the King ſtill marched near the River, and (looking for a Paſſage over it) burnt divers ſmall Towns in His way: But when He came to the Town of Oyſmount, He there held a Council of War, and examining certain Priſoners, whether they knew ever a Safe Ford below Abbeville; one of them, [4.] viz. a Yeoman's Son of Normandy, called * Gobin Agace, inform'd the King, That he knew of a Ford about Four Leagues off, where, at Low Water, not only the King Himſelf and His Army, but alſo all His Carriages might ſafely paſs over; for the Bottom of it was hard and firm with Chalk, Stones, and Pebbles, (whence it is called Blanchette aque, or the White Water:) And further engaged to conduct Him thither in Four or Five Hours time. So He left Oyſement, and marched on by the Guidanc of Gobin Agace; and by Sun-riſe they came to Blanchetteaque, (ne Saigneville) a Place below Abbeville, where the Somme ſpreading ſelf more largely in Breadth, proves leſs Rapid and more Shallow tha elſewhere: Yet here it is not paſſable, but when the Tide is out.

Yet the King marches on & reſolves to paſs over.

The French Commander reſolves to defend it againſt King Edward.

Who enters the Ford with His Army, & beats the French from the oppoſite Shore.

At [1.] their coming thither, they found it near High Water, that they were forced to ſtay until the Ebb, before they would ventu to paſs over. During which time, Sir Godemar, upon notice of th King's Arrival, made haſte thither from Crotoy, and ranging his Me upon the declining Bank of the River, reſolved to defend the Pa againſt the Engliſh. However, King Edward being no way diſcour ged, when it was near Low Water, commanded His Mareſchals to en ter the Ford, and Himſelf looking back on His Men, and crying ou aloud, They that love me, let them follow me; plunged in after then the whole Army following in good Order. Upon this, the Frenchm at Arms on the other ſide, together with the Croſs-Bows, went alſo i to the Water; and there the Gentlemen of Artois and Picardy beh ved themſelves with much Reſolution; and being back'd by the G noueſe Croſs-Bows, gave the Engliſh no ſmall Annoyance. But King E ward's Archers ſhot with ſuch Fury againſt them, that they were force to retire from the Men of Arms, and, after an obſtinate Diſput were alſo beaten back by the Engliſh, and ſo they won the Shore; an ſtill as they landed began to draw up in Order. When Sir Godemar d Fay ſaw how ſtrangely his Men gave back, and that the Landing of th Enemy could be no longer hinder'd, he preſently fled, and left th Field, with the Chief of his Horſe; ſome whereof recover'd Abb ville, others St. Ricquier, but moſt of the Foot were cut off, wi above Two Thouſand Men at Arms, beſides thoſe that were taken Pr ſoners. Nor did the Engliſh eſcape wholly without Loſs: For befo the Rear could get quite over, the Van-Couriers of the King of Boh mia, and the Lord John of Haynault, came upon them, and kill ſome of them before they could gain the Ford, and took ſome Ho ſes and a few Carriages.

And many of the French Foot are cut off. Holingſh. p. 932. H.K. Col. 2587.

Anno Dom. MCCCXLVI.

When [2.] K. Edward with His Army had eſcaped this great Hazard, He return'd Thanks to God; and then calling for the young Fellow that had guided Him over, not only paid him the hundred Nobles He had promiſed him, but gave him a good Horſe beſides to carry him home. The King was informed there was a great Town call'd Noyelle ſur la Mer not far off, but underſtanding that it belonged to the Counteſs of Aumale, who was Siſter to His late Friend the Lord Robert of Artois, He would do no harm to that Place, but turned another way, whilſt His Marſhals took and burnt Crotoy, in the Harbour of which they found a good Booty of Veſſels laden with Wines.

[2.] Id ib. The King being got over ſafe, returns Thanks to God, and very well rewards the man that had ſhew'd Him the Paſſage.

But [3.] it is time to return to the French King, who had marched from Airaynes in perſuit of King Edward, and expected to find Him encloſed between the River of Somme and His own Army; but when He heard how the Paſſage was won, and the Lord Godemar du Fay defeated, He cry'd out, That He was betray'd; for He thought it impoſſible that twelve thouſand Men, ſo well poſted as they were, ſhould not be able to defend that Paſs againſt all the World, if they had done as they ought to do: But that was not now to be remedy'd, whereof He immediately follow'd the Engliſh by the Banks of the River (on the other ſide of which K. Edward and His Army lay) and tho He had in His Company an Army of above an Hundred thouſand Men, yet [4] K. Edward offer'd Him free Paſſage over the Ford, provided He would come the next Tide and chuſe a place fit for Battel.

[3] Id. ib. K Philip being inform'd that K. Edward had paſſed the River, is highly diſpleaſed, and follows Him as faſt as He can.

[4] De la More cited, ad hunc An.

But [1.] K. Philip thought it beſt for Him to retire back to Abbeville, as the moſt convenient Place where He might paſs the River, whilſt K. Edward in the mean time was marching up further about three Leagues into Ponthieu, till He came to the Foreſt of Creſſy, near the Town of the ſame Name, which ſtands on the River Maye, between Abbeville and Heſdin; the King finding here a convenient Country for two Armies to draw up in, and conjecturing rightly, that His Enemy being reſolved to give Him Battel, would follow Him whereever He went, ſaid to His Lords, That He would ſtay here till He had looked the Enemy in the Face, and recover'd this Province, which was the Inheritance of Queen Eleanor His Grand-Mother; concluding with His own Motto, God defend my Right: And becauſe He had not above a fourth part of the Army that K. Philip then brought into the Field, He commanded His Marſhals to chuſe a piece of Ground, the beſt they could for His advantage, which being done, and having ſent out His Scouts (who yet could give Him no account of the approach of the French,) He there ſtrongly encamped Himſelf and all His Forces.

[1] Froiſſ. Ib: Yet returns to Abbeville, and there paſſes the River.

King Edward encamps in a convenient place near Creſſy, and there waits the coming of the French.

We [2.] will now ſpeak of K. Philip, who ſpent the ſame Day at Abbeville, on which K Edward encamped near Creſſy; and when the Duke of Savoy, who had been long expected, was come to the French Camp with a thouſand Men at Arms, the next Day about Sunriſe K. Philip marched from thence, and paſſing the Bridge of Abbeville with all His Army, advanced towards the Place where K. Edward was encamped; and when He approached ſomewhat near the Engliſh, He gave orders for His Army to be put in Battel Array, and the Foot to advance firſt. But it ſeems His Commands were not well obſerved; for [3.] Froiſſart relates from ſome that had been at this Battel, That there being a great multitude of Nobility, each of them ſtriving to go firſt, thereby to ſhew his forwardneſs as well as Quality;

[2.] Id. ib King Philip paſſes the River at Abbeville, and advances toward K. Edward, and puts His Army in Battel array, but with great diſorder.

[3.] Froiſſ. c. 129.

Anno Dom. MCCCXLVI.

Four Gentlemen ſent to view the Engliſh Army, with their Account of it; and one of them adviſes the King not to fight that day.

none can imagine what ill Order and want of Conduct there was in the drawing up of this French Army: However, the King ſent out four Gentlemen; to wit, he that was commonly call'd the Monk of Baſcle, (but was indeed a ſtout Knight) and the Lord of Noyers, with two others, to take a view of the Engliſh, and give Him an Account what poſture they were in: Theſe Gentlemen being return'd in a little time from doing what they were commanded, the firſt of them (who had been an old Soldier belonging to the King of Bohemia) ſpoke for the other three, and gave the King this Account, viz. That the Enemy were drawn up in three Battalions, and waited for His coming; and therefore (with ſubmiſſion to better Judgment) his Advice was, That ſince it was now late in the Afternoon, it was better to let His Men reſt in the Place where they were, and not hazard a Battel that Day, when His Men were weary and out of order, for before they could all come up, it would be too late to engage with the Engliſh, who were freſh and newly come out of their Camp; which Advice the King at firſt ſo well approved of, that He commanded the Marſhals to give Order for the whole Army to ſtop and march no farther; but in this His Orders were not obey'd, for the Captains and Soldiers in the Rear, either not receiving, or not liking thoſe Orders, ſtill preſſed forward, and that ſo haſtily upon thoſe who were before, that they were again forced to renew their March, tho in great diſorder; and indeed the French Commanders preſumed ſo much upon their Numbers, that looking upon the day as their own, they thought it long before they began the Battel; and thus they advanced until they came within ſight of the Engliſh Army; of which it is now high time to ſpeak.

Which the K. approves, but His Orders are diſobey'd.

[2.] Froiſſ. c. 128.

King Edward draws up His Army in three Battalions, and by whom they were commanded.

King [2.] Edward having ſpent part of the Night in His Prayers to God for Good Succeſs, roſe early in the Morning, and having heard Maſs, and communicated together with the Prince His Son, and moſt of the Lords and Gentlemen that attended Him, He then drew up His Army into three Battalions, the firſt of which was led by Prince Edward His Son, who tho' but little more than ſixteen Years of age, yet was of Strength and Courage above his Years: With him were joined for Council and Aſſiſtance Thomas Beauchamp Earl of Warwick, the Earl of Oxford (whom our Author ſtill calls Quenfort by miſtake) the Lord Geoffrey Harecourt, with divers other Perſons of Quality, amounting in all to the number of Eight hundred Men of Arms, Two thouſand Archers, and One thouſand Light Armed Welſhmen. The Second Battalion was headed by the Earl of Arundel and Northampton, the Lord Ros, with many other Lords and Knights, whoſe Names would be tedious to relate, the whole Body being to the number of Eight hundred Men of Arms, and Twelve hundred Archers. The Third and laſt Battalion was headed by the King himſelf, accompany'd by John Lord Moubray, the Lord Roger Mortimer, with others, in all to the number of Seven hundred Men of Arms, and Two thouſand Archers, the whole Army making up in all about Thirty thouſand effective Soldiers.

[3.] Id. ib.

The K. puts His Army in order, and encourages 'em to fight, who wait the coming up of the French.

Then the King, having knighted Fifty young Noblemen and Gentlemen for their encouragement in Arms, and ſet His whole Army in ſuch order as if they were preſently to fight, [3.] mounted on a little White Nag, and riding between two of His Marſhals from Rank to Rank of each Troop and Company, He not only ſaw that all things were in good order, but exhorted every Man that Day to defend and maintain His Right and Honour; and this He did by ſuch obliging Words, that even the moſt faint hearted of them were ſufficiently encouraged. Then (it being about Nine in the Morning) the King commanded them all to go to Breakfaſt, which being ſoon diſpatched, each Man return'd again to his Place, where ſitting down on the Graſs, they lay ready ſome Hours, expecting the coming up of the Enemy, and when they beheld them approaching nearer to them, they preſently ſtarted up on their Feet, and prepared themſelves for Battel.

The [4] Prince's Battalion led the Van, and he had placed his Archers in the Front, who were drawn up in a thin oblong Square like a Wedge, that they might not be encompaſſed by their more numerous Enemies, and behind them ſtood the Prince himſelf, at the head of the Main Body of Men at Arms, having the Battalion that was led by the Earls of Arundel and Northampton for the Left Wing, whilſt the King Himſelf, with Twelve thouſand Men were drawn up on the Right Hand, ſomewhat farther off, on the ſide of a Hill, who were to ſerve as the Forlorn in caſe of extremity, and the Carriages were placed within a ſtrong Trench caſt up for that purpoſe.

[4] Id. c. 130. The manner of drawing up the Engliſh Army.

Then [5.] King Philip approaching near the Engliſh Army, commanded His Genoueſe Croſs-Bows, who were about Fifteen thouſand, to begin the Fight with their Arrows, which they did, tho with ſome Reluctance, as being ſo much tired by their long March, that they rather deſired to lye down and reſt them, ſo that their Volley of Arrows did little Execution; and juſt before the Army engaged there fell a ſharp Thunder-ſhower which ſo wet their Bow-ſtrings, that they could not ſend their Arrows home: Upon this the Engliſh Archers, whoſe Bows were kept cover'd in their Caſes, ſtept forward, and diſcharged ſuch a Shower of Arrows among the Genoueſes, as put them into that Diſorder, that flinging away their Bows, they retreated without making any more Volleys, but ran back upon that Body of Horſe where the King himſelf was; at which He was ſo incenſed, that He ſaid aloud, Kill theſe Cowardly Raſcals, for they do but hinder us; ſo that there aroſe a great Confuſion between the Horſe, ſtriving to go forward, and theſe Croſs-bows who ſought how to retire out of danger, the Engliſh Archers at the ſame time diſcharging freſh Flights of Arrows, where the Preſs and Confuſion was greateſt; inſomuch that the Genoueſe being trodden down by their own Party, as well as ſhot in the Backs by the Engliſh, were the occaſion that many of the French Nobleſs who ſtumbled over them, fell down Horſe and Man, and they were ſo far from being able to riſe, that they were the cauſe of others falling over them: Then immediately certain Welſh and Corniſh Footmen ran in among the French Gentlemen, and with long Knives cut the Throats of thoſe that lay on the Ground, of what Quality ſoever they were; for none that Day gave any Quarter on either ſide. In the mean while the Earl of Alençon, the Earl of Flanders, the Earl of Blois, the Duke of Lorain, and the Dauphin of Vienne, having at laſt got clear of the Genoueſe, coaſted round about with their own Troops, and came (tho not without much loſs) on the right ſide of the Engliſh Battalion where Prince Edward was, with whom they fell to handy-Strokes, and ſtoutly engagd with His Men at Arms; and tho the Prince with His Battalions were drawn up behind the Archers, ready to receive the Charge of the French, yet they were all of them very hard put to it; for certain freſh Squadrons of French and German Horſe ruſhing forward with great fury, and forcing the Engliſh-Archers to give way, fell in upon the Prince and his Men at Arms with great violence: hereupon the Second Battalion, commanded by the Earls of Arundel and Northampton came in to his aſſiſtance, who had elſe perhaps been overpower'd; however thinking themſelves in ſome danger, the Earls preſently ſent away a Knight to King Edward (who ſtanding with His Battalion on a Hill not far off, obſerved all the manner of the Fight) to deſire Him to come down ſpeedily to ſuccour His Son, as being then very hardly beſet; the King demanded of the Meſſenger, Whether he were ſlain or hurt? the Meſſenger anſwer No, but was like to be overpower'd; Well then, ſaid the King, return and tell them who ſent you, that ſo long as my Son is alive, they ſend no more to me, whatever happen, for I will have the Honour of this Day to be his: This Anſwer being brough back to the Prince and his Chief Commanders, they were the more encouraged thereby, being diſpleaſed with themſelves that they ſhould trouble the King with ſo mean a Meſſage; but by this time the Squadrons that ſet upon the Prince were utterly broken and routed, and many ſlain by him and his brave Aſſiſtants, inſomuch that he fully anſwered, if not exceeded the King his Father's Expectation; for before they ha done, the Earls of Alencon, Flanders and Blois, with the Duke of Savoy, tho they behaved themſelves valiantly, yet being encloſed between the Engliſh and the Welſh, were there ſlain, with many othe Knights and Squires that attended them.

[5] Id. ib. King Philip commands His Genoueſe Croſs-Bows to begin the Fight by diſcharging their Arrows, which they do but with ſmall execution, and are clearly put to flight by the Engliſh Army.

The Croſs-Bows being routed, bring a great confuſion among the French Horſe.

At laſt he routs the French Squadrons that had attacked him, and divers Princes and Lords are there ſlain.

[1.] Id. ib.

The Prince being follow'd by divers Engliſh Noblemen, falls upon the main Body of the French Army, and forces the Emperor Elect to quit the Field, His Father King of Bohemia being there ſlain.

[2.] Gi. Villani L. 12. c. 66.

And now the Prince and his Men, being throughly inflamed wit this Succeſs, and aſſiſted by the Forces of the Earls of Arundel an Northampton, [1.] began to march forward againſt the Main Body o the French Army, which ſtill continued to make a vigorous defence and the Marqueſs Charles, Emperor Elect, received the Prince wit great Courage, until His Men being ſlain round about Him, and Himſelf wounded in two or three places, [2.] He thought it beſt, tho wit ſome difficulty, to quit the Field, without ſtaying to ſee what was become of His Father, the King of Bohemia; who, tho He had alread loſt an Eye, and was almoſt blind with Age, reſolved not to diſgrac His former Victories by an Ignoble Flight: but making the Gentleme about Him lead Him up to the Enemy, and having order'd His Horſe' Bridle to be ty'd to thoſe that were next Him, as the reſt of them did t thoſe of their Companions, they fought ſo deſperately, that they wer all ſlain upon the Place, their Horſes being ty'd together, and thei Dead Bodies were found the next Day ſurrounding that of their Maſter's; then were the Arms of that Valiant King (being Three Oſtric Feathers,) taken by the Prince of Wales, and afterwards uſed as hi Device, and have ever ſince been born by his Succeſſors the Princes o Wales.

How the three Oſtrich-Feathers come to be the Arms of the Prince of Wales.

[3.] Chron. Ad. Mur. H.K. Gi. Villani. ib.

At the ſame time alſo fell James King of Majorca by the hands of th Earl of Northampton, if we may beleive the [3.] Authors of tho Times, who are cited in the Margin, beſide the Teſtimony of Enea Sylvius, that was afterwards Pope by the Name of Pius II.; tho ſom relate, that this Prince was afterwards ſlain in a Battel by his Adverſar the King of Arragon; or, as others, That He was by Him ſtarved to deat in Priſon.

In the meanwhile, [4.] King Philip did not fail to perform the Part not only of a Couragious General, but alſo of a Brave and Gallant Soldier: For rallying again the Flower of His Nobility and Men at Arms, He enter'd the Hotteſt of the Battel, and not being known, was ſo hem'd in among the Engliſh, that His Horſe being killed, He was remounted by thoſe about Him; and being again diſmounted, and wounded in the Neck and Thigh, had been there either ſlain, or taken Priſoner, had He not been mounted the Third time by the Lord John of Haynault; who, at the ſame time taking the King's Horſe by the Bridle, obliged Him, partly by Perſuaſions, and partly by Force, to quit the Field: After whoſe Departure, little Reſiſtance was made, except by the Earls of Flanders, Auxerre, St. Paul, and ſome Germans; who notwithſtanding were all at laſt ſlain, and their Men utterly defeated.

[4.] Id. ib. King Philip acquits Himſelf not only like a General, but a Gallant-Soldier; yet is at laſt forced to retreat.

Thus [5.] the Battel endured from Four a Clock in the Afternoon till two Hours within Night; and, if we reckon the ſeveral Efforts that ſome Scattering Troops made by fits, till Two the next Morning: Where, on the French Part, were ſlain, Two Kings, John King of Bohemia, and James King of Majorca; and of Princes, Charles Earl of Alencon, King Philip's Brother, Guy Earl of Blois, Lewis Earl of Flanders, Ralph Duke of Lorain, Nephew to the King of France, James Son of Humbert, Dauphin of Vienne, and many others of the Chief Nobility of France, Bohemia, and Germany: Beſides theſe, there fell Four and Twenty Bannerets, Twelve Hundred Knights, Fifteen Hundred Gentlemen, and of Men at Arms and Eſquires on Horeſeback, Four Thouſand, but of the Commons of France above Thirty Thouſand more.

[5.] Mezeray ad hunc Ann. How many hours the Fight laſted. H. K. The Names of the Kings, Princes, &c. that were there ſlain.

On the Engliſh ſide, I cannot ſay particularly how many were ſlain, unleſs we ſhould believe what * Knyghton relates, when he ſays, That there fell but one Eſquire before the Fight, and three Knights in the Battel; which ſeems almoſt incredible. But ſince neither the French, Engliſh, nor any other Writers, are more particular in this Point, it is thus far certain, That none of the Engliſh Nobility, nor many Common Soldiers, fell that day; which is to be looked upon as a Remarkable Inſtance of Divine Favour to King Edward's Arms. This Great Battel was fought on the Twenty Fourth of Auguſt, being the Feſtival of St. Bartholomew.

* Ad hunc An. The ſmall Number of the Engliſh that then fell almoſt incredible.

Before I quit this Subject, I cannot but obſerve, that * Mezeray attributes the Chief Cauſe of the Loſs of this Battel, to Want of Courage in the Genoueſe Croſs-Bows; who fail'd to acquit themſelves as they ought in the Beginning of the Battel; as alſo, that ſome of the French Grandees being willing to ſee their King a little humbled, rather made a Shew of Fighting, than doing it in good earneſt, and quickly withdrew themſelves out of the Field: To both which he alſo adds, That King Edward brought into this Battel Four or Five Pieces of Cannon, which did no ſmall Execution, and caſt a ſtrange Terror and Confuſion among the French: For this, ſays he, was the firſt time that ever thoſe Thund'ring Engines were ſeen in the Wars of Europe.

* Ad hunc An. The Chief Cauſes to which Hiſtorians attribute this Defeat.

As for the two former of theſe Cauſes, I will not contradict him, but for the laſt, I muſt make bold to queſtion his Authority; unleſs he had cited ſome other Teſtimony for it; all our own Writers, as well as the Foreign ones of that Age, making no mention of it: tho' I grant, that theſe fatal Engines were invented in Germany, about Six or Seven Years before. But to return to our Hiſtory.

[1.] Froiſſ. c. 130.
King Philip retreats but with 60 Perſons to the Caſtle of Braye, where He is received with great conſternation, and goes from thence to Amiens.

[1.] King Philip having retired, as we have already ſhewn, by the Favour of the Night, with not above Sixty Perſons in His Company, (of whom about Five were Barons) rode away as faſt as He could, till coming to the Caſtle of Braye, about two Leagues Northward from the Place of Battel, found the Caſtle-Gates ſhut; wherefore He called for the Captain of the Watch, who coming to the Walls, demanded, who it was? The King reply'd, Open the Gates quickly, for I am the Fortune of France: But whether He meant the Good or Evil Fortune, I will not determine. So ſoon as the Governor knew the King was there, he preſently cauſed the Gates to be open'd, where He was received by the Tears of His Subjects, lamenting His Misfortune, whom He encouraged as well as He could. But He ſtayed here no longer than to refreſh Himſelf, and [2.] going from thence about Midnight, came to Amiens before Morning: Where He bitterly exclaim'd againſt Sir Godemar du Fay, who had let King Edward paſs over at the Ford above-mentioned; ſaying, he was a Traytor, and the Chief Occaſion of his late Defeat; and was like to have order'd him to be hang'd, but the Lord John of Haynault moderated His Reſentments, telling Him in few Words, How could it lie in Sir Godemar's Power to reſiſt the whole Force of the King of England, when all the Flower of France could not prevail againſt Him. This Truth mitigated the King's Diſpleaſure; who ſoon after return'd to Paris, to conſider of His Weighty Affairs, in ſo ſad a Conjuncture.

And had executed Sir Godemar du Fay, had not the Lord John of Haynault prevented it.

[3.] Id. c. 131.
What was done after the Battel.

But [3] we ſhall now look back to the Place of Battel, and ſee what hath been doing there in the mean while. All that Saturday-Night after the Battel, the Engliſh never broke their Ranks to take any Priſoners whatſoever; for knowing how numerous the Enemy was, and that there were two or three freſh Bodies near thoſe Parts, they never offer'd to follow the Chace, but ſtood ready upon their Guard; and if one ſays true, they had need enough to do ſo: [4.] ſome of the French Troops rallying upon them ſeveral times that Night, though they were ſtill repulſed with Loſs. And certainly this Day King Edward ſhew'd Himſelf a moſt Experienc'd Commander; For He order'd the Greater Part of His Army, eſpecially the Battalion in which He Himſelf was, to keep the Field, and ſtand to their Arms all Night; tho' it is ſcarce to be believed, that the French, after ſo abſolute a Defeat, with the Flight of their King, and the Death of ſo many of the Principal Leaders, could have the Courage to make any freſh Attacque on their Enemies; and that too in the Night, when all things are doubtful even to a Conqueror. Yet indeed the Earl of St. Paul had ſtill preſerved ſeveral entire Troops, and had done more Execution, if in his laſt Attempt he had not been ſlain; however, far the Greater Part of the French Army eſcaped, tho' in ſmall ſcatter'd Parties: yet ſome, by the Darkneſs of the Night, fell among the Engliſh, where they found no better Uſage than they would have done in the Battel.

[5] Froiſſ. ib. The Prince cauſes Fires & Torches to be lighted, and is met by the King His Father; with what paſſed between them.

When [5.] Prince Edward received no more Diſturbance from the Enemy, and was now aſſured of the Victory, He gave Orders for Fires to be made, and Torches to be lighted up round about the Field, to diſpel the Darkneſs. At which time, the King His Father being come down from the Hill, where He had ſtood in His Armour all the time of the Battel, advanced to the Prince, (who ran to meet Him) and having embraced and kiſſed Him, ſpoke to this effect:

'Dear Son, God Almighty give you Grace to go on as you 'have begun: You are my beſt Son, and have this day acquitted your ſelf moſt nobly, and truly deſerve that Crown 'for which We have fought.

To this the Prince made no other Reply, but by a Submiſſive Bow almoſt to the Ground.

[1.] Id. ib. The whole Army return publick Thanks to God,

[1.] That Night was ſpent by the whole Army in Publick rejoycing for their Good Succeſs, but they made no manner of Boaſting. For it was the King's Expreſs Command, That none ſhould inſult, nor make any vain Bragging Songs or Ballads; but all moſt humbly to give Thanks to Almighty God, for his Infinite Goodneſs and Mercy to them.

The Field of Battel conſecrated for the Burial of the Dead.

The next day, for the ſake of the Dead, the Pious King cauſed the Place of Battel to be Conſecrated, for the Decent Sepulture both of His Enemies and Friends; and ordered, That the Wounded ſhould be taken up, and carefully dreſſed and look'd after; and to the meaner ſort, when recovered, He gave Money, and ſent them away.

[2.] Id. ib. The King ſends out a Party to ſcour the Field, who fall upon a great Number of French belonging to ſeveral Towns, & deſtroy moſt of them.

[2.] The next Morning, being Sunday, there was ſuch a Miſt, that a Man could hardly ſee before him: But however, King Edward and His Mareſchals ſent out Five Hundred Spears, and Two Thouſand Archers on Horſeback, to ſcour the Fields, and to ſee whether any of the French were again rallyed. Now it happen'd, that a great Number of the Inhabitants of Abbeville and St. Requier in Ponthieu, with the Commons of Rouën and Beauvois, had early that Morning come into the Field, not knowing of the late Loſs; and ſome ſay, the Engliſh had ſet up the French Colours, which they had taken in the Fight, whereby thoſe poor Frenchmen being deceived, came up to join them, as if they had been their Friends; but the Engliſh ſoon made them know their Error, and fell upon them ſo furiouſly, that they quickly put them to flight, and chaſed them, and ſlew in the Ways and among the Hedges more than Seven Thouſand Men; nor had one of them eſcaped, if the Day had been clear.

Anno Dom. MCCCXLVI.

The Engliſh encounter another Party led by the Abp of Rouën, and put them to the Sword.

[3] Vid. Wil. North-burgh's Letter, cited in Fox Acts and Mon. pag. 504.

The Engliſh had ſcarce wiped their Swords, and recover'd their Order, when they met with another Occaſion to beſtir themſelves; for now they were to encounter a more Formidable Number of their Enemies, conducted by two Great Men the Archbiſhop of Rouën, and the Grand Pryor of France: Theſe alſo being ignorant of the late Overthrow, had only heard that King Philip intended not to fight till the Sunday, and thereſore thought then would be time enough to come thither to His Aſſiſtance; upon theſe (the Day beginning now to clear) [3.] the Engliſh, under the leading of the Earls of Arundel, Northampton, and Suffolk fell with that Courage, that after an obſtinate Reſiſtance they gain'd a Compleat Conqueſt, having ſlain the two Commanders, with moſt of their Men upon the ſpot: Beſides theſe, they met with many of the French, who had ſtray'd in the Dark, and not well knowing where they were, had lain in the open Fields; but their Reſpite was not long, for now they were all (a many as were ſo met with) put to the Sword without any Quarter, whereby it was thought, that of the Commons and Foot-Men of the Cities and Neighbouring Town of France, there fell now near four times as many as were ſlain th Day before in the Battel.

The Reaſon why the Engliſh gave no Quarter.

[4.] Sir Tho. de la More cited, by Stow. pag. 242.

But perhaps this may be thought a great piece of Cruelty to ki and deſtroy ſo many Thouſand Men without giving an Quarter. To this it may be reply'd, That the Engliſh-Arm being but few in compariſon of the French, durſt not encumber themſelves with Priſoners, and had no place near whe they could beſtow them; and [4.] beſides, the Engliſh we well inform'd, That the French King being aſſur'd of th Victory, and reſolved that His Men ſhould ſatiate themſelv with the Slaughter of their Enemies, had ordered them give no Quarter to any, but King Edward Himſelf, and th Prince His Son; and ſo the Engliſh did but deal with th French, as they muſt have been dealt with themſelves had they bee overcome.

[5.] Froiſſ. c. 131. The King finding no more Enemies left to encounter, orders the burial of the Slain, whom being ſtripped, He orders the Booty to be given the Soldiers.

The [5.] ſame Sunday about Noon, as the King came fro hearing Maſs, the Captains of this Flying Party, whom t King had ſent out for that purpoſe, return'd and ſhew'd wh they had done, and how they had ſucceeded, and aſſur Him that there was no more appearance of any Enemy in t Field: Then the King ordered the Lord Reginald Cobham, a Sir Richard Stafford, Brother to the Lord Stafford, with th Heralds, to go and ſearch the Fields, and view the Numb and Quality of the Slain, (for in thoſe Days every Noblem and Gentleman of Note wore a Surcoat of his Arms over Armour, to diſtinguiſh him according to his Quality), th having viſited the Bodies of the Slain, when they had tak a full and exact Account of them, certain Men, who w thereto appointed by the King, ſtripped the Dead Bodies, taking the Money, and what elſe was moſt valuable from them, but all this with ſo much decency, that they left ſufficient Apparel to cover their Nakedneſs. That Booty the King cauſed to be equally diſtributed among His Soldiers; and the Lord Cobham, and Sir Richard being returned from viſiting the Dead, after Supper they gave the King a Juſt Account how many of the Enemy were ſlain (viz.) Eleven Princes, Eighteen Bannerets, Twelve hundred Knights, and more than Thirty Thouſand of the Common Soldiers.

The whole number of the Slain in this Battel.

King Edward [1.] kept the Field all Sunday Night, and on Monday Morning prepared to march from thence; but firſt by Proclamation He granted a Truce to all the Towns thereabouts for three Days, That ſo the Countrey People might be encouraged to come and ſearch the Fields, and bury their Dead; but as for the Bodies of the Kings and Princes, He cauſed them to be taken up decently, and convey'd with ſolemn Pomp to Monſtrevil, where they were all depoſited in the Abbey Church, the King Himſelf, and the Chief of the Nobility attending in Mourning at their Funerals; eſpecially bewailing the Loſs of that Gallant Old Prince, the King of Bohemia: his Body the King not long after cauſ'd to be convey'd to the Marqueſs His Son, who order'd it to be bury'd at Luxemburgh among His Anceſtors.

While [2.] the King lay thus at Monſtrevil, His Marſhals made an Excurſion towards Heſdin, and burnt Vauban and Seram; but they let the Caſtle alone, becauſe it required ſome time to take it, and that Night they lodged by the River of Canche near Heſdin. The [3] next day the whole Army began to march forward towards Bologne, and by the way took St. Joſſe, with the Town of Eſtaples, and other ſmall Places, and burnt and waſted all the Country for about Eight Leagues, to the very Suburbs of Bologne. [4.] After this, the King, with the Prince His Son, went and encamped by Whitſand, on the Sea-ſide, about Three Leagues from Calais, and having tarried there one Day to refreſh His Army, on Thurſday, being the Laſt of Auguſt, or (as Du Cheſne with more probability ſays,) the Seventh of September He came and ſat down before the ſtrong Town of Calais, which had been of old a great Annoyance both to Him and His Kingdom, being a Place of much ſtrength in thoſe Times, and a better Harbour than it is at preſent; nor did He inveſt it only by Land, but alſo blocked it up by Sea; the Earl of Huntington, His Admiral, lying before it with a Great Fleet, conſiſting of no leſs than Seven hundred thirty eight Veſſels of all ſorts, lately arrived from England.

The King ſummons the Governor to ſurrender, who returns a ſtout denial.

So ſoon as the King came before the Town, He ſent a Summons by a Herald to the Governor, to ſurrender the City and Caſtle to Him, as Rightfull King of France; otherwiſe, upon taking the Place, He would put them all to the Sword: Sir John de Vienne, the Governor, anſwer'd, He knew but one King of France, who had ſent him thither to keep that Place, in whoſe Service he was reſolved both to live and die; though he doubted not but to have ſufficient Aſſiſtance from Him when there ſhould be occaſion.

[5.] Froiſſ. c. 133.

The King reſolves to reduce the Town by Famine, and to that end makes deep Trenches round it, with Huts for the Soldiers.

Upon this Reſolute Anſwer [5.] King Edward began to entrench Himſelf ſtrongly about the City, and ſince He was not like to take it by Aſſault, reſolved to reduce it by Famine; and to this end He drew a Trench quite round the Town, with regular Fortifications, and form'd His Camp into Streets, conſiſting of Huts cover'd with Reeds, for His Soldiers, ſufficient for them to lodge in all the Winter; and the Diſcipline of the King's Army was ſo ſtrict, and His Pay ſo good, that the People brought in all ſorts of Proviſions and Commodities, beſides what was ſent them in from England, and other Parts of the King's Dominions: And more than this the Marſhals ſcour'd the Country daily, and rode often towards Guiſnes and Terouenne, and to the very Gates of Ardres, and St. Omers, and ſometimes to Bologne, and mightily refreſh'd the Army with great Booties of Cattel, which they brought thither in abundance.

The great Plenty in the Engliſh Camp.

[1.] Id. ib.

The Governor turns out of the Town above 1700 uſeleſs Mouths, who are permitted by the King to go away.

[1] Not long after the Siege was thus begun, John de Vienne, afterwards Marſhal of France, and Chief Commander in the Town, by the Advice of the reſt of the great Officers that were with him in the Gariſon, foreſeeing a long Siege, thought fit to rid the Town of as many uſeleſs Mouths as he could, and ſo he forced out more than Seventeen hundred of the pooreſt and leaſt neceſſary People, and ſhut the Gates upon them; which when the King ſaw, He was ſo far from driving them back again, and ſtarving them, as ſome Cruel Conquerors would have done, that having compaſſion on them, He not only let them paſs through His Camp without moleſtation, but gave them all a Dinner, and Two-pence a piece in Money.

The Town of Terouenne taken and plunder'd.

Not long after the Earl of Warwick ſent forth a Detachment as far as Terouenne, where he heard a great Fair was the kept; but though the Biſhop had raiſed Ten Thouſand Men t defend it, yet they were all worſted, and the Biſhop himſe wounded, and forced to fly for his Life; and he not only plundere the Fair, but the Town, carrying all the Riches he could find in bo to the Camp at Calais.

[2.] In the mean while, King Philip being now arrived at Paris, was conſulting about the beſt means how to ſecure His Country, and to be revenged on His Enemies; and in order to the former, He ſent His Expreſs Commands to His Son, the Duke of Normandy, to raiſe the Siege of the Caſtle of Aiguillon, and return to Him, with the Army under His Command. And as to the Second, to divert the War from France, [3.] He wrote to His Ally, David King of Scots, conjuring Him by all the Tyes of Friendſhip, and the Confederacy that was between them, to lay hold of this Opportunity of raiſing the Siege of Calais, and to revenge their Common Injuries, by making a Terrible Invaſion upon England during King Edward's Abſence, with the Flower of His Forces; and the more to encourage Him in this Enterprize, He ſent Him a good Sum of Money, beſides Fifteen hundred Croſs-Bows: And the Scotiſh King not long after employ'd them; for in the Month of July following, (as a Manuſcript Chronicle of the Church of Durham informs us) He ſent the Earl of Murrey, as His General, to invade England; who entering by the way of Cumberland, miſerably deſtroy'd moſt part of that Country with Fire and Sword, and ſo returned into Scotland with a vaſt Booty of Cattel, and without receiving any Damage or Reſiſtance from the Engliſh: Which was (I ſuppoſe) either becauſe this Invaſion was very ſudden, or ſoon over: Or elſe it proceeded from the King's being with the Flower of the Engliſh Forces in France.

A Parliament held on Monday after our Lord's Nativity by the Lord Lionel, Guardian of the Kingdom, and what was done in it.

The K's Letters Credential are read in Parliament.

Sir Bartholomew Burghurſt gives them a Brief Relation of the K's late Victory and Succeſſes, with the Siege of Calais, and puts them in mind of their Promiſe to aſſiſt the King to the utmoſt of their power.

The Lord Lionel, at the Day appointed, held the Parliament according to the Summons, as Guardian of the Realm for the King His Father; at which time they being inform'd, that Sir Bartholomew Burghurſt, Sir John Darcy, Lord Chamberlain, Mr. John de Thoresby, Clerk of the Privy Seal, and Mr. John de Carleton were arrived as Meſſengers from the King then lying before Calais; yet ſince they could not be ready to make their Appearance till the Wedneſday following, they were therefore prorogued until that Day; when were produced the King's Letters Credential, directed to the Archbiſhops, Biſhops, Abbots, Priors, Earls, Barons, and others His Faithful Subjects in Parliament, * bearing Date at Calais the Seventh of September laſt paſt, referring them for the Relation of what He had done to the Meſſengers above-mentioned. Then the ſaid Sir Bartholomew for himſelf and his Companions, in preſence of the Guardian of England, the Prelates and other Great Men there named, declared the Great Graces God had given to the King, His Nobles, and others with Him, after their landing at La-Hogue, with a ſhort Account of His Progreſs and Succeſs in Normandy, the late Battel of Creſſey, and His beſieging of Calais, from whence He reſolved not to depart till He had taken the Town, and that then He would draw towards His Adverſary, perſue His Quarrel, and not return into England before He had ended the War beyond Sea, with the help of God; for the accompliſhment of which, the ſaid Meſſengers prayed the Prelates, Great Men and Commons, that they would treat and adviſe about an Aid and Means to perfect that which had been ſo well begun; For that by Common Aſſent in Parliament, at the time when the King undertook this War, they all promiſed that they would aſſiſt Him with their Bodies and Goods to the utmoſt of their Power. and they allso brought certain letters from the [illegible] of [illegible] the Earls of Northampton, Arundel and Warwick &c. & others there directed ^ Estates of Parliament then assembled at Westminster, giving them to understand that the King having at his arrival at La Hogue made his eldest the Prince of Wales a Knight that for ~~this~~ which cause the King ought to have an Aid as [illegible] [illegible] has [illegible] for every knights fee [illegible] which the Lords there mention gave their consent as far as in them lay & they further hoped that the sd Parliament would treat and ordain effectually for the [illegible] of the warre. this letter bears date at Caleys the day of our Ladies nativity. * Ib. n. 8.

The Meſſengers produce an Agreement made between the French King and ſome Great Men of Normandy to deſtroy the Engliſh Nation.

At * the ſame time they produced an Ordinance or Agreement made between the King's Adverſary of France and ſome Great Men of Normandy, to deſtroy the whole Engliſh Nation and Language; and to put this Deſign in execution, the Earl of Ewe, then Conſtable of France, and the Earl of Tankerville, were to raiſe a Great Army for that purpoſe; but as it pleaſed God, they were both taken Priſoners at Caën, and many of their Men kill'd, as you have already heard that this intended Invaſion and Deſtruction were quite defeated.

* Ibid.

This * Ordinance is entered upon the Parliament-Roll, and is in the Todding, called, L' Ordinance de Normandiæ: 'tis pretty long, but the moſt material Thing in it, is:

'That

Anno Dom. MCCCXLVI.

The Effect of that Agreement of France.

'That John Duke of Normandy, as General, with the Nobles and others of that Dukedom, were to paſs into England 'with Forty Thouſand Men of all Sorts. And then it was 'agreed, That if England was thus Conquer'd, it ſhould be in 'the Name of the Duke; and all that the King of England 'enjoy'd ſhould be his, as King and Lord, with all His Rights 'and Honours: And what the Nobles, Barons, and other Seculars enjoyed, was to be poſſeſs'd by the Church, the Barons, Nobles, and Great Towns of Normandy.

'That the Pope and Church of Rome ſhould ſafely have what 'they before had, without any Diminution.

'And, That whatever had been taken from the Scots by 'War, or otherwiſe, ſhould be fully reſtored.

This Ordinance was dated at Boys de Vincennes, the Twenty Third of March, 1338. and Avesbury relates, that it was found at Caën, where it was lately taken and delivered to the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, that he might excite the Clergy and Laity the more readily to pray for, and aſſiſt the King.

* Ibid.

The Eſtates of Parliament approve of what had been done, yet deſire time to conſider what further Aid they ſhall give the King.

* Ibid. n. 8.

* After theſe things had been thus declared in Parliament, they all thanked God for the Succeſs he had given the King againſt His Adverſary; and ſaid, That whatever had been given Him, had been well employ'd; and that they would further Aid Him according to their Power. Then the Knights, Citizens, and Burgeſſes, deſired time to conſider of the Aid, until Thurſday next following. When they granted Him Two Fifteenths, making Grievous Complaints of Oppreſſion and Poverty in their Grants: * Praying the King to conſider, how they had been Annually charged with great Talliages, as Fifteenths, Wools, Ninths, Men at Arms, † Hobelors, Archers, Victuals, Guard of the Sea-Coaſts, and many other Taxes, by which they were almoſt ruined. And alſo, in the laſt Parliament, when they gave Two Fifteenths for the Ending of the War, it was granted, and certainly promiſed to them, That they ſhould not be charged or grieved with any further Payments of Talliages: Wherefore it ſeemed to them reaſonable, that they ought now to be diſcharged, and excuſed. And notwithſtanding all theſe Grants and Promiſes, there daily iſſued Commiſſions to Array in all Parts of England, for Men at Arms, Hobelors, and Archers, according to the Value of their Lands, or to make Compoſition for the ſame.

†Note Hobelors were Light Horſemen, ſomewhat like our Dragoons.

They likewiſe complain of ſeveral Grievances and Oppreſſions, yet grant the King Two Fifteenths.

They likewiſe complained of Purveyance, and Free Quarter, and of the Cuſtom and Subſidy of Forty Shillings the Sack upon Wooll. Which Grievances, Hardſhips, and Oppreſſions, were done and ſuffer'd every day, wihout Aſſent or Grant in Parliament;

ment; expreſly againſt * Law: Yet notwithſtanding theſe Oppreſſions and Grievances, the Commons, to the utmoſt of their Abilities, had now granted Two Fifteenths for the final Accompliſhment of the War, by God's help, and the Deſtruction of the King's Enemies; to be levied in Two Years, of Cities, Burghs, and Antient Demeſnes, and alſo of the Commons of the Counties; ſo as their Petitions upon theſe Grievances, and others, might be recited on the morrow in Parliament, and have ſpeedy and good Remedy order'd thereupon, for the Common Profit of the Land; according as the King's Four Commiſſioners or Meſſengers, had granted on His behalf to the Commons.

* Ibid. n. 9. The Petitions and Complaints of the Commons.

Then * the Commons made their Petitions more fully, ſetting forth the Hardſhips and Oppreſſions they then lay under.

Their firſt Petition was, That the Ordinances, Promiſes, and Grants, made by the King in Parliament, for the future might be obſerved, for the Eaſe of the Commons, againſt the great Charges and Hardſhips they had ſuffer'd. Alſo, That Commiſſions might not be iſſued out of Chancery, to charge the People with the Array of Men at Arms, Hobelors, Archers, or Victuals, without Aſſent or Grant in Parliament: And if any ſuch were, the People ſhould neither be charged with, nor bound to obey them.

† Ibid. The Anſwers to them.

† The Anſwer was, As to the Firſt Point, That it ſhould be as they deſired.

* In French, Grantz.

As to the Second, It was Notorious, that the Great Men and Commons, in many Parliaments, had promiſed the King, to aſſiſt Him to their utmoſt with Body and Goods in His Quarrel with France, and for the Defence and Safety of England. Wherefore the * Great Men ſeeing His Neceſſity to be ſupplied with ſuch Soldiers before His Paſſage, to recover His Rights beyond Sea, and for the Defence of England; had ordered, That thoſe who had an Hundred Shillings a Year Rent on this ſide Trent, ſhould find Men at Arms, beſides Hobelors and Archers, according to the Quantity of their Eſtate and Tenure, to go with the King at His Wages; or if they would not go in Perſon, to find others; or if not that, to pay the King what He could procure Men for. And ſo things were, and had been done, and no otherwiſe. Yet the King would not, that what was done in this Neceſſity, ſhould be made an Example for the future; as appears by His Letters-Patents.

* P. 47.

There were other Petitions from the Commons; which, ſince they are of no great Importance, I ſhall refer the Reader to * Cotton's Abridgment of them for his further ſatisfaction. Then this Parliament, having ſat about 10 or 11 Days, was diſſolved. But we ſhall now look beyond Sea, and ſee what has been done in the mean while in Gaſcoigne.

We

Anno Dom. MCCCXLVI.

The Duke of Normandy quits the Siege of Aiguillon, and marches towards his Father.

We left the Duke of Normandy long ſince at the Siege of Aiguillon, [1] which he ſtill carried on, and had lately made a deſperate Aſſault upon it for a whole day, without any effect beſides the loſs of a great many brave men, and among the reſt of the young Lord Philip, eldeſt Son to the Duke of Burgundy; ſo that his men being grown weary of the Siege, his Father's peremptory Commands to raiſe it came very ſeaſonably to relieve him from the raſh Oath he had made, never to ſtir from thence till he had taken it: But before he would quit it, he ſent to the Pope for his Abſolution from his Oath, which was eaſily granted; and then by the advice of all the Lords about him, he rais'd the Siege, and marched away with his Forces in obedience to his Father's Commands. And this is, I muſt confeſs, a far more probable account of this Action, than what [2] ſome of our Engliſh Hiſtorians give of it, who make him to be ſo ſtraiten'd by the Earl of Lancaſter for want of Proviſions, that he ſtole away from his Army, and left them to ſhift for themſelves; which, being now without a Head, preſently followed him in that diſorder, that between the Earl of Lancaſter's Forces and the People of the Country, they were almoſt reduced to nothing. Which Story is altogether improbable to any that will conſider the Circumſtances of it, and how unſutable it is to the Character of the Prince on whoſe memory it reflects: Yet this much is certain, [3] that upon the Duke's marching off, Sir Walter Menay for a farewel ſally'd out upon the French, kill'd a great many of them, and brought forty Priſoners into the Caſtle.

The E. of Lancaſter muſters up an Army to recover the Places the Duke had taken.

So ſoon as the Duke of Normandy had left Gaſcoigne, and was return'd to Paris, the [4] Earl of Lancaſter immediately reſolv'd to retake thoſe Places the French Duke had recover'd, and to carry on his Conqueſt as far as he could before the Winter came on; and to this end he immediately ſent his Summons to all the Engliſh Lords and Perſons of Quality, beſides ſuch Gaſcoign Noblemen who held of King Edward, the chief of whom were the Lord D'Albert, with others needleſs here to be nam'd: So that the Earl's Forces amounting in all to twelve hundred Men at Arms, two thouſand Archers, and three thouſand Foot, with this ſmall, but well compacted Army, he paſs'd the River Garonne, between Bourdeaux and Blaye, and marching towards Xaintogne came to Mirabel, which he took by Storm, both Town and Caſtle, and put therein a Gariſon of Engliſh; then he turned to Mortaigne by the Sea-ſide in Poictou, which he took by Aſſault, and gariſon'd alſo. From thence he rode to Taillebourg, and likewiſe took that Town and Caſtle, putting all he found to the Sword, in revenge of the death of a Knight of his, who was ſlain in the Aſſault. After this he advanced to Annay, Surgieres and Benon, all which he took; then he went and laid Siege to the fair Town of St. John d'Angely, and gave there a general Aſſault, which laſted till almoſt night; but the Gariſon being weak, the Mayor and greater part of the Burgeſſes deſired a Parly, which being granted, they agreed forthwith to ſurrender the Town and Caſtle, and ſwear Allegiance to the King of England, as long as He, or any for him could defend them. Then after three days ſtay to refreſh his Army, the Earl marched to Luſignan, which making ſome reſiſtance, he burnt, and afterwards took the Caſtle; but the ſtrong Town of Niort (after having made three vigorous Attacks, and being repulſed in every one

The People fly to the fortify'd Towns.

The Earl takes Monſtrevil and Bonnin by ſtorm, and in it a great deal of ready Mony.

Ad An. 1345.
A generous Act of the Earl to a common Soldier.

Thus [1] the whole Country was ſo terrify'd with the very Name of this Earl of Lancaſter, that every man fled before him into ſtrong Holds and fortify'd Towns, forſaking their Houſes and their Goods: nor was there the leaſt preparation made to ſtop his career; for all Knights and other Captains kept cloſe in their Fortreſſes, without making the leaſt ſhew of fighting the Engliſh. Then the Earl went forward to Monſtrevil and Bonnin, wherein he heard there were no leſs than two hundred Coiners making Mony for the French King: the Inhabitants were reſolved by no means to yield, but to defend the Place to the laſt; but upon the Earls having encouraged his men by promiſing them that every one ſhould freely poſſeſs whatſoever they could light on in the Town when it ſhould be taken, a vigorous Aſſault was made by the whole Army, the Place enter'd by Storm, the Town plunder'd, and the Inhabitants put to the Sword, the Soldiers thereby obtaining a vaſt Booty. And here it is moſt likely (and not at Bergerac, as this Author makes it) that that remarkable Inſtance happened of the Earl of Lancaſter's Honour and Liberality to his Soldiers, which Walſingham ſuppoſes to have been done at Bergerac. The Story in ſhort is thus: The Earl having (to encourage his Soldiers to take the Town) promiſed them, as you have already heard, that whatſoever Plunder they could take ſhould be their own, a common Soldier had the good luck to light upon a Houſe (I ſuppoſe one of the Mints) in which were ſeveral Sacks of coin'd Silver, beſides Bullion. The Man being ſurpriz'd at the ſight, having never ſeen ſo much Mony before, and thinking it above his deſert, ran immediately to the Earl, and telling him of it, deſired him to ſend ſomebody thither to ſeize it; but he was ſo far from doing it, that he told him, the Houſe was his and all that was in it. The Fellow returned to the Place, and upon a ſtricter ſurvey of the greatneſs of the Sum he had there found, was ſtill ſo modeſt, as thinking it above his Neceſſitys as well as his Fortune, he went again to the Earl, and ſpoke to him to the ſame effect as he had done before; to which the Earl again reply'd, Prithee keep it, honeſt Soldier, it does not become me to give and take away a thing again like Children; go thy ways, it's all thy own, tho it were thrice as much. Whether the Duke acted in this for his own or his Maſter's Intereſt, I will not diſpute; but this much muſt be granted, that it was done like a downright honeſt Engliſh-man.

He takes the City of Poictiers by a ſudden Aſſault.

[2] The Earl having repair'd the Fortifications of this Place, return'd homeward to Bourdeaux, and taking the City of Poictiers in his way, ſate down before it; but not having Forces enough to make a formal Siege, he was reſolved to try what he could do by two or three briſk Aſſaults at one and the ſame time: So having ſurvey'd the Town, and found the weakeſt part of it, to amuſe the Beſieged he order'd two briſk Attacks to be made at once upon thoſe places which were beſt fortified; and whilſt the Gariſon was wholly taken up in defending them, he in the mean while with a third Party of choſen men aſſaulted that part which was weakeſt, and finding it but meanly guarded (for there was no experienced Officer in the Place to give Orders) the Engliſh eaſily ſcal'd the Walls, and made themſelves Maſters of it; moſt of the Inhabitants as ſoon as the Town was taken eſcap'd away at ſome of the Gates which were not in the Enemy's poſſeſſion. Here the Soldiers alſo got a vaſt deal of Plunder, both in rich Commodities and Gold and Silver, inſomuch that they ſcarce thought any thing elſe worth carrying away.

The Earl having ſtaid here about twelve days to reſt himſelf and his men, and finding he had not Soldiers enough to gariſon ſo great a City, quitted the Place, without doing it any other damage than plundering it of all that was conſiderable: but not long after, [1] the Inhabitants that had eſcap'd returned thither again, and new fortified and gariſon'd the City; and then in revenge they marched out to ſurprize Luſignan, at which Place making an Attack, tho they were thrice as many in number as thoſe that defended it, they were repulſed with great loſs; and their Captain being ſlain, they were forc'd ſhamefully to retreat. And beſides theſe great Succeſſes in Gaſcogne, [2] the ſtrong Town of Larnon in Bretagne was now betray'd to the Engliſh by the Governor of it.

Which after he had plunder'd, he quits.

Nor had King Edward leſs Succeſs in Scotland this Year than in France; for whilſt he lay at the Siege of Calais, [3] David King of Scots being encouraged by the late Embaſſy and Forces ſent him by the French King, inclin'd to renew the War with England, notwithſtanding the Truce that had been lately made: of which King Edward having intelligence, preſently diſpatch'd the Lords Moubray, Roſs and Lucy, Commanders of great experience, either to perſuade the Scotiſh Prince to a juſt and punctual Obſervation of the Truce, or (if he would not be brought to it) to help to defend England againſt him. Theſe Ambaſſadors are ſaid by the Scotch Writers to have offer'd King David in their Maſter's Name, not only to deliver into his Hands the ſtrong Town and Caſtle of Berwick, but even the Perſon of his old Competitor King Baliol, for whoſe ſake the War was firſt begun betwixt them; on condition that David would reject the Motions of the French King, and agree to obſerve the Truce, as both in Honour and Equity he was bound. Theſe Offers (if the Scotch Authors do not a little enlarge upon them, as it ſeems very likely, particularly in that which relates to the delivery up of Baliol) being propounded to the King of Scotland in his Council, cauſed the moſt prudent of them to adviſe their Maſter in no wiſe to reject them, ſince the Friendſhip of a Conqueror, eſpecially on Conditions both honourable and advantageous, was more preferable than to abet the weaker ſide, both againſt Equity and Profit. But King David, out of the great affection he bore to the French King (to whom he had ſuch mighty obligations) and the major part of his Nobility being ſuch as had either younger Heads, or more daring Hearts, or elſe who were ſway'd by the Prince's Example, or the Gold of France, were all deſirous to take this opportunity, now the Flower of the Engliſh Forces were in France, to revenge themſelves on their antient Adverſaries: and thus under pretence of Gratitude to King Philip, they were fatally drawn in to condeſcend to his unjuſt and hazardous Requeſt, and reject King Edward's more ſafe and advantageous Propoſals.

The Scots take Lidel, and put the Governor, &c. to death.

Wherefore [1] in a Parliament of all the Prelats, Earls and Barons of Scotland, which was held at St. Johns-town, it was concluded, that a War with England ſhould be immediately undertaken, and an Army was forthwith appointed to be raiſed, and a general Rendevouz to meet at the Place laſt mention'd, at a day prefix'd; ſo that by the latter end of September a great Army of near fifty thouſand men was in Arms, and they marched into England about the beginning of October, being commanded by the King in Perſon: and paſſing by the Caſtle of Roxburg without troubling themſelves to beſiege it, as being too ſtrong, [2] they advanc'd forward to that of Lidel, which being taken by ſtorm, thoſe in the Gariſon were all put to the Sword, and the Governor Sir Walter Selbey, who had his Life given him by the Knight that took him, was notwithſtanding (if we may give credit to our Engliſh Hiſtorians) cruelly put to death, together with two of his Sons, who firſt were ſtrangl'd before their Father's face. But I will not aver the truth of this Relation, being ſenſible how much our Engliſh, as well as the Scotiſh Writers, do all they can to blacken their Enemies, and excuſe their own Nation.

However from hence the [3] Scotiſh Army marched forward, ſpoiling the Country, and not ſparing the very Churches and Monaſteries, till they came near the City of Durham; and there having deſtroy'd many of the Farms belonging to that Abby, ſome of the Monks who were taken Priſoners made a bargain for themſelves and the reſt of their Fraternity, that upon the payment of a thouſand Pounds Sterling the next day, the Scots ſhould forbear ſpoiling the reſidue of their Mannors and Tenants; but all others they made pay three Pence a Head for their Lives, and ſuch as were not able to do it, were put to the Sword. In this manner they went on to Bear-Park, not far from Nevil's Croſs near Durham, where King David took up his Quarters, ſince he heard that the Engliſh were coming towards him with a great Army.

For [4] Queen Philippe hearing of the Invaſion intended by the Scots King, was now advanced as far as York, whither having ſummon'd all the Prelats and Peers that were left in England, there was in a little time got together not only a good appearance of Nobility, but likewiſe of brave Captains and Officers; ſo that they were not long before they muſter'd an Army of about ſixteen thouſand able men, at the head of whom the Queen went in Perſon againſt the Scots, being attended by the Archbiſhops of Canterbury and York, with divers other Biſhops and Clergymen, who then came to fight for their Country. When the Engliſh Army that had marched from York, came within three miles of Durham (Froiſſart ſays Newcaſtle, but that is a miſtake) and approached near that of the Scots, the former were drawn up in four Bodies; the firſt of which was commanded by the Lord Henry Piercy General of the whole Army (yet he was not Earl of Northumberland, as Hector Boethius falſly ſtiles him) who was accompany'd by the Bp of Durham, the Earl of * Angus, and divers other Noblemen of the North: The ſecond Body was headed by the Archbiſhop of York, the Biſhop of Carliſle, and the Lord Nevil, with ſome other Noblemen: The third was led by Thomas Beck Biſhop of Lincoln, aſſiſted by the Lord Mowbray and Sir Thomas Rokeby High Sheriff of Yorkſhire: The fourth and laſt Battalion was led by Edward

Anno Dom. MCCCXLVI.

Baliol titular King of Scotland, with whom were the Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, the Lord Roſs, and the Sheriff of Northumberland, with divers others. Theſe four Battalions conſiſted of about four thouſand men apiece, each having a proportionable number of Archers and Men at Arms (under which Title the Horſe are ſtill reckon'd by our Engliſh Hiſtorians.) But beſides theſe, the Lords Deincourt and Ogle and ſome other Gentlemen with a ſtrong Party were appointed to guard the Queen's Perſon, who early in the morning before the Fight mounting on a white Horſe, rode from Body to Body, and from Troop to Troop, and in a few very pathetick and obliging Words deſired them to do their utmoſt to defend the Honour of her Lord the King, as well as the Lives, Liberties and Fortunes of themſelves and all that were dear to them. This done, having recommended her People to God, ſhe retired from the Place of Action at ſome diſtance. This is according to Froiſſart's Relation of this buſineſs; but all our Engliſh, as well as Scotiſh Hiſtorians, ſay nothing of the Queen's being preſent, or having any thing to do at this Battel, or what follow'd it.

The Queen rides into the Army, and encourages her men.

But to come to the buſineſs, it is fit I ſay ſomething in what manner the Scotiſh Army was drawn up, which [1] being divided into three Battalions, the firſt was conducted by the Lord Robert Stuart Son of King David's eldeſt Siſter, with whom was the Lord Patrick Dunbar Earl of March: The ſecond was commanded by John Randolph Earl of Murray, and William Earl of Douglas; and the third the King led himſelf, having with him beſides the French Auxiliaries, the Flower of the Nobility of Scotland: Yet Buchanan, by I know not what Authority, contradicts Hector Boeth. and gives the firſt Battalion to the Earls of Murray and Douglas, the middle to the King, and the laſt to the Lord Robert Stuart, and Dunbar. In the ſame prepoſterous manner likewiſe do the Scotch Hiſtorians divide the Engliſh Army, contrary to what we have already ſet forth from our own Hiſtorians, who underſtood that matter much better than they could do.

[1] H. Boeth. l. 15.

How the Scotiſh Army was diſpoſed.

But [2] before the two Armies approached near each other, Earl Douglas by the King's Command rode forth with a flying Party of Horſe to diſcover the Enemy, and as occaſion offer'd, to skirmiſh with them; but coming ſuddenly upon them, before he was aware, he was received ſo ſharply, that being put to flight, he loſt five hundred of his beſt men, narrowly eſcaping himſelf to the main Body. Preſently after which the Engliſh Army was ſeen to advance; whereupon Sir David Graham a valiant Baron of Scotland, with another Detachment of five hundred Horſe, gave a briſk charge upon the left Flank of the Engliſh Archers, hoping to diſorder and overrun them: but he was miſtaken, for they receiv'd him with ſuch a Shower of Arrows, that after two or three Attempts in vain, having loſt many of his men, he was alſo forc'd to fly back to the main Battel upon the Spur, in great danger of being taken by his Purſuers.

[2] Id. ib.

The E. of Douglas going out upon the diſcovery, is put to flight, as is alſo Sir David Graham*'s Detachment.*

Yet theſe unlucky beginnings did nothing at all abate the Courage of the Scotiſh King, who was both young and valiant; and becauſe he had never yet fought himſelf in a ſet Battel, he hoped he might be no leſs fortunate and victorious than King Robert his Father; [3] therefore he commanded to ſound a Charge, and the Lord Robert Stuart preſently join'd the Engliſh Van. The Fight beginning (as was uſual) with a thick Shower of Arrows, from the Engliſh Long-bows, as well as the Croſs-bows of the Genoueſes, the former had the advantage, ſince their Vollies laſted longer, and reached further than their Enemies; but the Lord Robert reſolving to fall preſently to handy Strokes, he preſs'd forward on the Engliſh Archers, who were forc'd to open to the Right and Left to let him paſs thro, when he fell upon the Lord Piercy's main Body: and thus they maintain'd the Fight with great Bravery and Courage, [1] the Scots manfully laying about them with their ſharp Battle-Axes and broad Swords; ſo that for a while the Engliſh were very hard put to it, which when King Baliol ſaw, knowing that the chief Strength of the Scots lay here, and not doubting but if the Engliſh could prevail in the beginning of the Fight, it would add Courage to them, and Terror to the Enemy, he reſolved to fall on this Blow; and briskly advancing with four thouſand Horſe on a round Trot, fell in upon this Body commanded by the Lord Robert, and they being before pretty equally match'd, were now ſo diſpirited by this freſh Reinforcement and Aſſault, that they preſently gave ground, and began to retire; which being obſerv'd by their Commander, he thought it beſt not to urge them too far, but to make a wiſe Retreat before it was too late. This was done without any very conſiderable loſs, and it had been well for the King if he had done ſo likewiſe, ſince he might then have reſerv'd himſelf and his Army until ſome better Opportunity.

The Scots at firſt behaving themſelves bravely, the Engliſh had the diſadvantage, till K. Baliol advancing with 4000 Horſe, turns the Scale.

The King diſdains to follow them.

But King David diſdain'd to follow thoſe whom now he looked upon not as Cowards, but Traitors and Deſerters; for he was jealous that his Nephew Robert retreated thus with a deſign that he ſhould be cut off, that ſo the Crown might fall to him as next Heir: wherefore the King now fought with the more reſolution, being fully determin'd either to repair this fault, or not to ſurvive it: but at that inſtant his Adverſary King Baliol having clear'd his hands of the firſt Battalion of the Enemy, whom he thought not fit as yet to purſue, came in with his freſh Troops, and charged King David's Battalion in the Flank, whilſt the Engliſh Van at the ſame time preſſing hard upon him in the Front, the late Diſaſter ſo diſcouraged the Scots, that they were not longer able to hold out, but began by degrees to give back, and at laſt were wholly put to the Rout. The Engliſh fell furiouſly on thoſe who kept the Field, yet durſt not hazard the Victory by an inconſiderate and raſh purſuit, ſince they fear'd that the Lord Robert Stuart and the Earl of March might ſtill hover thereabouts in a conſiderable Body.

He is charged by K. Baliol, and his Battalion routed.

~~But~~ As for King David, [2] he fail'd neither in the Duty of a good Captain or a valiant Soldier, but more than once rallied his diſorder'd Men, and encourag'd them both by his Words and Example; ſo that thoſe who were neareſt him were aſham'd to forſake ſo gallant a Prince, and therefore they held for ſome time together cloſe in a Ring, fighting deſperately till not above eighty of them remain'd alive with the King, who for his part being ſenſible of the unhappy event of the Day, and not willing to outlive ſo many of his Nobility and other loyal Subjects, preſs'd forward to meet the like Fate; when an Eſquire of Northumberland named John Copland, who knew him to be the King, ſtept forward with one hundred Men at Arms, whom he himſelf had brought into the Field, and bad him ſurrender himſelf, which which he at firſt refuſed, unleſs it were to ſome Perſon of great Quality, till Copland told him he was a Baron; which the King believing, gave him his Gauntlet in token that he was his Priſoner, and ſo ſurrender'd himſelf. But tho the Scotch Hiſtorians relate for their King's Honour, that he was taken Priſoner in the Battel, yet [1] one of ours who lived and wrote nearer to thoſe Times, gives us a different and more probable account of this matter; as that the King ſeeing the Day loſt, and being wounded by an Arrow, endeavour'd to eſcape by flight, but being purſued by this valiant Eſquire, who knew him, was taken Priſoner near a Place called Merrington, and that ſo privatly, that he carried him off to his own Caſtle before it was known what was become of him, as you will hear further anon. But to make an end of this Battel;

[1] H. K. col. 2591. Our Engliſh Hiſtorians relate he was taken Priſoner in his flight.

[2] So ſoon as the Scots third Battalion was thus overcome, their ſecond alſo, as well by their diſcouragement from the ill Succeſs of their Fellows, as by the Valour of their Oppoſers, was put to flight. Few eſcap'd of this Battalion, in which [3] the Earl of Murray the Commander of it was kill'd, with a great number of the Nobility of Scotland, beſides common Soldiers; and their other Leader William Earl of Douglas was taken Priſoner: So that the Engliſh here gain'd an entire Victory, and had they join'd in a cloſe Purſuit, and not been diſtracted in taking Priſoners and Plunder, that Day had put an end to that long and fatal Contention between the two Nations. This cruel Battel, which Froiſſart miſplaces at Newcaſtle upon Tine, was fought not far from Nevil's Croſs near Durham, as all our Authors agree, who rightly place it on the ſeventeenth of October being St. Luke's Eve; and it continued in all three hours, from Nine in the Morning until high Noon. And tho [4] Knyghton ſays that the Engliſh loſt but four Knights and five Eſquires, yet beſides theſe many of the common Soldiers muſt likewiſe have fallen; for Froiſſart with greater certainty relates, that this Victory was not gain'd without the loſs of many Lives on the Engliſh ſide, of whom the moſt conſiderable was the Lord Haſtings, who dy'd of his Wounds.

The Queen remain'd in the Field until Evening, when moſt of the Engliſh Officers and Soldiers returned from the purſuit of the Scots: But all the reſt of that day, and the Night following, the Engliſh Army kept the Field, as well for their greater Honour, as for the ſecurity of their Friends, many whereof were ſtill in the chace; but the Queen had Lodgings provided for her in the City of Durham, where hearing that the King of Scots was in the Cuſtody of John Copland, ſhe diſpatch'd a Purſuivant to him with Commands to bring his Priſoner to Durham, and gently to tell him, that he had not done

After this the Queen returned from Durham, [1] leaving King Baliol and other Engliſh Northern Lords to proſecute the War with Scotland; who forthwith entring the Country with Fire and Sword, took the ſtrong Caſtle of Hermitage (for Roxburg was in the Engliſh hands before) and without any reſiſtance ſubdu'd the Countries of Anandale and Galloway, with the Marches Tividale, and Ethrick Foreſt, extending their Arms as far as Cockburn Peke and Sowtray-Hedge, without meeting any Oppoſition. And indeed it happened well for Scotland, that King Edward with the Flower of the Engliſh Forces was then beyond Sea; for had they been now in England, it is very probable the Scots would have been as intirely ſubdu'd as they were in King Edward the Firſt's time. But yet He queſtion'd him why he had not obeyed the Queen's Orders in the delivery of the King of Scots to her. To which (kneeling down) he anſwered to this effect, "That he hoped none would "envy his good fortune in taking ſo great a Perſon, ſince God may "afford it to an ordinary Eſquire as well as the greateſt Lord: That "he ow'd Allegiance to none but his Majeſty, and was only to obey "thoſe who were immediately commiſſioned by Him. At which Anſwer the King was ſo far from being diſpleas'd, that He not only thank'd him for what he had done; but [3] as a Reward of his good Service, and further encouragement to proceed, He promiſed him a Grant of Lands to the value of five hundred Pounds per Annum to him and his Heirs for ever; and till it could be ſettled, made it payable out of the Cuſtoms of London and thoſe of Berwick upon Tweed; and it appears upon * Record, that he was then made a Banneret.

The Reader may take notice that the bringing of the King of Scots to London did not happen until preſently after Chriſtmas, nor did the Execution of theſe Noblemen; and ſo (according to our Account) they do properly belong to the next Year; tho not to make any breach in the Scotiſh Affairs, I have put them altogether in this Place.

[4] Queen Philippe, after ſhe had given good Orders for the defence of the Caſtles and other Frontier Towns in the Marches of Scotland, and appointed the Lords Piercy and Nevil Guardians of them, returned from York to London; from whence being accompany'd with the Ladys of the beſt Quality, ſhe preſently took her Progreſs to Dover, and there going on Shipboard arrived at Calais the ſame day, where ſhe was welcom'd by the King with much joy and ſatisfaction. ~~But he~~ ſtill carried on the Siege with great Conſtancy and Vigour, inſomuch that the Beſieged not being able to receive any Relief, began to be in mighty want of Proviſions; but they were plentifully ſupply'd in the Engliſh Camp both by Sea and Land; ſo that the King kept a moſt magnificent Court and Feſtivity in his Camp during the Chriſtmas Holidays.

But since none of our English Historians make any mention of the Queens being present at [illegible] transactions which are only onely ~~[illegible]~~ related by Froissart a foreigner who wrote long after this time, I leave it to the Readers Judgment to believe as much of it as he pleases since [illegible] another might insert many of [illegible] stories away from common tradition Reports, and for the magnifying of this Queen who being a [illegible] country woman.

But before we end this Year, we ought to ſay ſomewhat more of the Civil Affairs that happen'd a little before this time, notwithſtanding the War. Overtures were made by his Holineſs to the King lying before Calais, towards the compoſing of all Quarrels; inſomuch that, by the [5] earneſt Mediation of the Cardinals of Naples and Ceremont (the Pope's Legates) five days after the Battle of Durham a Commiſſion was iſſued out to William Marqueſs of Juliers, William Earl of Northampton, Thomas Earl of Warwick, and divers other

The effect of the Pope's Letter to the King, exhorting him to Peace.

[3] Id. ib.

The King's Anſwer and Defence of himſelf.

King Edward having now cloſely blockt up and beſieged the Town of Calais, paſſed his Chriſtmas before it; and during this Blockade, King Philip not being able to raiſe the Siege by force, procured the [2] Pope to write King Edward a very preſſing Letter to exhort him to make Peace with the King of France; being much to the ſame purpoſe as ſeveral of his former, complaining, “how much the Infidels “had gain'd over the Chriſtians during this unhappy War; and then “blames the King for not admitting the Mediation of the Cardinals “his late Legates for a new Treaty of Peace, as they earneſtly de“ſir'd: and he again exhorts him to renew the ſaid Treaty, that a “Peace being made between the two Kings, he (meaning Ed“ward) might ſhew his puiſſant Valour againſt the Infidels in the “Eaſt. This was dated at Avignon, XVIII Kal. Feb. or 16*th* of January. To this [3] Letter the King not long after ſent a very rational and handſom Anſwer to this effect: “That he was ſtill, as he had always “been, deſirous of a Treaty of Peace, for the benefit of Chriſten“dom, as appeared by the ſeveral Truces he had made upon his “Holineſs's Mediation, tho they had been broken by his Adverſary: “So that a final Peace was impoſſible to be brought about whilſt “Philip of Valois had not only invaded and detain'd from him his “juſt and hereditary Rights, but alſo had endeavour'd to invade “England, and had excited and maintain'd the Scots in their late “War againſt him; and therefore he now committed his Quarrel “into the hands of God, who had ſo lately declar'd for him by ſeve“ral great Victories, for which he returns him humble thanks, ſince “they were not obtain'd by his own Strength and Power. Then he “concludes with his earneſt deſires to the Pope, as Chriſt's Vicar on “Earth, and who therefore ought to be equal and indifferent towards “all men, that he would receive due Information concerning the afore“ſaid Objections, and uſe his endeavours that the ſaid Adverſary of “France may be brought to acknowledg and make ſatisfaction for “the Wrong which in this particular he had done him; but eſpecial“ly that he may receive no Aid nor Countenance from his Holineſs “in this his injurious dealing: otherwiſe he (the King) ſhould be “forc'd to appeal to the ſupreme Judg of Judges, who for a time “may permit wrongs to be done for the Sins of Mankind; but in “the end redreſſeth the ſame, neither leaving any good Deed unre-

“ warded, nor evil ones unpuniſhed, and whom he moſt humbly “ prays to be a true and impartial Judg in this great Controverſy, &c. This was dated before Calais the ſixteenth of March, according to [1] John of Tinmouth's Copy; but the date of this Letter is not expreſs'd in Odoricus Raynoldus, tho he recites it at large, and in his Obſervations upon it ſhews himſelf very partial to the Pope, and unjuſt to the memory of this Great Prince, whom he blames for not accepting of a Peace upon the Pope's terms, and not making War where he would have him; which he calls, preferring his own Intereſt before Religion, and that he was an Enemy to Chriſtian Piety; whoſe unhappy Death, he ſays, was anſwerable to his Life; and that in the end he was deſpiſed of God, as he had deſpiſed him in the Perſon of his Vicegerent. Which certainly is a very raſh Cenſure, and ſhews that he had never fairly conſider'd the King's Reaſons contain'd in this Epiſtle, when he imputes the King's declining in Succeſs, as well as Underſtanding towards the latter end of his Life, and his Death above thirty years after, to be a Judgment of God upon him, for not abſolutely ſubmitting himſelf and his Cauſe to the Pope's determination. But it is the conſtant practice of the Eccleſiaſtical Writers of the Romiſh Church to defame all ſuch Chriſtian Princes, who have not made themſelves abſolute Slaves and Vaſſals to the See of Rome, and blindly ſubmitted themſelves to her Determinations. But to return to our Hiſtory.

The French King holds an Aſſembly of the Eſtates.

When the French King ſaw there was no hopes of a Truce, or Peace by the Pope's means, he reſolved to take a more efficacious Courſe for the defence of his Kingdom againſt King Edward, and if it were poſſible, to relieve the Town of Calais before it was too late; [2] and to this end he call'd an Aſſembly of his Eſtates to Paris, who met upon the five and twentieth of March, to aſſiſt him with their Purſes as well as their Advice: In which Aſſembly it was agreed, to call the old Treaſurers, and other Great Officers and Miniſters of State to an exact account for abuſing their Places, and embezeling and converting to their own uſe the Taxes and the other King's Monys they had been entruſted with; and to levy of all ſuch Offenders, Fines and Mulcts proportionable to their Offences; and for the future to refer the Government of the Treaſury to the moſt eminent Perſons of the Clergy and Nobility, thereby to free the People from ſuſpecting, that their Contributions were any more like to be ill imployed. Whereupon Monſieur Peter of Eſſars, Treaſurer of France, was thrown into Priſon, and condemned in a vaſt Fine to the King; and together with him many other Great Officers (whether juſtly or unjuſtly, I will not diſpute) were forc'd at once to part with what they had been divers Years heaping together. Then the Lombards and other Uſurers were called to a ſtrict account for all their unjuſt exactions upon the poor Subjects; and where the Intereſt exceeded the Principal, the former was adjudged forfeited to the King, and the latter remitted to the Debtor, or if actually paid, was to be reſtored to him, and all Obligations for ſuch Monys were declared void; and yet the Perſons of ſuch Uſurers were not releaſed out of Priſon till they had paid large Fines to the King. Beſides all which, this Great Aſſembly unanimouſly voted to aſſiſt the King with their Fortunes to the utmoſt, for the maintenance of his Crown and Dignity:

The Flemings beſiege Bethune, but are repuls'd.

I ſhall give you a ſhort account of what was done in the mean while in Flanders, where the Flemings ſtill continuing firm to King Edward's Intereſt (whilſt he was yet in Normandy) ſome time before the Siege of Calais, [1] raiſed a powerful Army under the Conduct of Sir Edward de Renty a French Knight (lately baniſh'd thence by King Philip) who went and laid cloſe Siege to Bethune, a Town of Artois; but the Place was ſo well defended by the Lord Charny and other Commanders, that they were repuls'd with loſs. After which the French King, to buy off the Flemings from ſiding with King Edward, made them large Promiſes, and offer'd them very advantageous Conditions, as not only to procure the Pope's Excommunication againſt them to be taken off, but alſo to reſtore the three Towns which he had taken from Flanders, with other Conditions needleſs to be here recited.

The E. of Flanders ſent home by the French King, refuſes the Match with England.

Makes the Flemings believe he is contented with the Match; but getting his Liberty, eſcapes into France.

[2] But all theſe fair Offers ſeeming rather to be extorted by Neceſſity, than to proceed from any good will, were rejected; and King Edward did the more prevail by propoſing a Match between the Lady Iſabella his eldeſt Daughter (then about fourteen years of Age) and their young Earl Lewis, only Son to Lewis late Earl of Flanders, who fell in the Battel of Creſſy. This Propoſal was very well accepted by the Flemings, who thereupon ſent certain Envoys to King Philip, to deſire him to ſend home their young Earl, for that they ſhould receive him for their Lord. Then King Philip, by the perſuaſion of the Duke of Brabant, who alſo propoſed his own Daughter for the young Earl (with a promiſe to bring over the Flemings to his Intereſt) ſent the Earl home, where he was at firſt well enough treated by his half Subjects; but when he abſolutely refuſed the Match they propos'd to him, as being the Daughter of that Prince who had ſlain his Father in Battel, the Flemings, upon the arrival of the Engliſh Embaſſadors, to make their Earl more flexible to the Match (which was by them again propoſed) confin'd his Perſon in the Town of Courtray: but the young Prince finding it in vain openly to oppoſe their Deſigns, and having learnt ſome cunning by dear-bought Experience, made them believe that he was now very well ſatisfied with the Match; of which King Edward and his Queen (then lying before Calais) having had notice, they brought their Daughter to the Abby of Bergues, where they were met by the young Earl, attended by the chief Burgeſſes of the Cities and Towns in Flanders; and he ſeemed ſo well pleaſed with the Lady, that the Articles were concluded on; and the Parties being affianced, the Marriage was in a ſhort time to be conſummated. Upon this he was reſtored to his Liberty, which as ſoon as he had obtain'd, he took the firſt opportunity to give them the ſlip, and under the pretence of riding out a hawking, eſcap'd again into France.

Anno Dom. MCCCXLVII.

After his departure, the War between the King of France and the Flemings again broke out more fierce than ever; inſomuch that when he ſaw fair means would not do, [1] he ſent his Son Duke John to beſiege Caſſel, a Town between St. Omers and Ipres: But the Flemings being aſſiſted by a ſtrong Detachment of Engliſh from Calais, the Duke was repuls'd, and forc'd to raiſe the Siege with conſiderable loſs of Men. And no better ſucceſs had he in a like attempt upon the Town of Lilliers, where he alſo received another Repulſe; ſo that he brought back the reſt of his Troops very much diminiſhed in their number, at which freſh Diſgraces the King his Father was very much diſcontented. Theſe things were done during the Winter, and part of the following Spring.

Beſides, if the Walls could have been quite beaten down, yet were the Ditches (whereinto they could at their pleaſure let in the Sea) ſo deep, that with a few Men (provided their Ammunition and Proviſions fail'd not) they ſeem'd able to withſtand the whole World, ſo impregnable was Calais counted at that time; tho after the uſe of great Guns, and the Improvements that have been made in the Art of carrying on Sieges, in the laſt Century ſave one, it hath been twice taken; once by the French from the Engliſh, and then by the Spaniard from the French, tho it was in a ſhort time after reſtored to them again.

K. Edward carries on the Siege of Calais with great obſtinacy, but with no ſucceſs.

But beſides the vigorous reſiſtance from within, the French Fleet made alſo divers efforts to put Proviſions into the Town, but ſtill fail'd in the Attempt, their Ships being taken by a part of the Engliſh Fleet that cruiſed before the Town under the Command of the Earl of Northampton, who made ſo ſtrong a Fortreſs into the very Sea, that from it he deſtroyed or chas'd away ſuch Boats and ſmall Veſſels as us'd to ſteal in with Proviſions along the Shore.

The Engliſh Cruiſers hinder any Proviſions from being put into the Town.

However, [3] a little after Eaſter no leſs than thirty Norman Ships and Gallies, all nimble Sailors, adventur'd one Morning early; and by the advantage of the Wind and Tide, without any hindrance from the Engliſh Fleet, carry'd ſome Proviſions into the Town, and got off again with little or no damage. But from that time the King cauſed the Mouth of the Haven to be quite block'd up, and the Earl of Warwick with eighty tall Ships was conſtantly ſcouring the Channel between Calais and Dover. [4] Then King Philip, that he might do what he could to ſuccour theſe his loyal Subjects, again equip'd a Fleet of twelve Gallies of Genoa, and ſeventy Sail of ſtout Ships, all laden with Proviſion and Ammunition, with ſtrict orders to relieve the Town; but ſo ſoon as ever this Fleet was ſeen from Dover, and the Earl of Warwick had notice thereof, he ſet upon the French with ſuch fury, that they were all diſpers'd, taken or ſlain, the Admiral of

The difficulties the Engliſh labour'd under during the Siege of this Town.

Yet notwithſtanding all this Succeſs, the Engliſh (tho they wanted no manner of Proviſions) labour'd under ſome difficulties: for when any of them went into the Country to forage, if they did not go in ſtrong Parties, they were often cut off by the French; and beſides this, the Gariſon in the Town made frequent Sallies with very good advantage. And once early in the morning there ſallied out a Troop of choſen Soldiers, who breaking into the Engliſh Camp, had like to have ſurprized the King in his Tent; but ſtarting up from his Bed, and cauſing his Trumpets to ſound, he with his own private Guard fought the Enemy in the Trench, till divers of the Officers of the Army coming to his aſſiſtance with freſh Forces, they were beat back into the Town with the loſs of two hundred Men.

But let thoſe Loſſes be what they would, they were ſtill made up by conſtant Recruits out of England: [3] and beſides theſe, many Lords and Noblemen of Germany and the Low Countries, who were willing to ſerve as Voluntiers, came with a conſiderable number of Men at Arms, to learn Experience, and aſſiſt King Edward at this Siege; and one of the chief of theſe was the Lord Robert of Namur, who was Nephew to Robert of Artois by his Siſter. This young Lord being newly return'd from Jeruſalem, came hither with a gallant Retinue: and beſides his love to Military Affairs, he had alſo a great Inclination to Letters; for it was by his encouragement and for his ſatisfaction, that Froiſſart wrote his two Volumes of Hiſtory, as [4] he himſelf informs us, to which we are ſo much beholden in this preſent Work, eſpecially for foreign Affairs. with as many more by Berwick, made an Incurſion into Lothian and Cuddiſdale, whence he brought great Booty of Goods and Cattel; while King Baliol did the like in Galloway, Niddiſdale and Carrick; ſo that many of the Scots were at laſt compel'd to yield again to him, and own him once more for their King. From hence, both Armies being join'd, they began to march towards St. Johns-town, with a reſolution to bring all Scotland under their ſubjection; but the Scots made ſuch humble Inſtances, that they obtain'd a Truce for one Year, on condition to pay immediately nine thouſand Pounds Sterling to King Baliol, and that he ſhould reſide the mean while in the Caſtle of Caer-Laverock, on the Borders of Galloway, with competent Forces, for fear of the Scots recovering what they had loſt. The Siege of this Town ſtill continuing, we will ſee what was doing in the mean time in Bretagne: [2] in the beginning of January the King ſent over Sir Thomas Dagworth, as his Lieutenant, with a hundred Men at Arms and four hundred Archers, that came very ſeaſonably to the Counteſs of Monfort's aſſiſtance, for ſhe ſent theſe Engliſh Auxiliaries to join her own Forces; who together with Sir Thomas, beſieged a ſtrong Town and Caſtle ſtanding between Pontrieux and Lantriguet, called Roche Darien or Dirien, which was kept on the behalf of Count Charles of Blois: but ſo ſoon as the Counteſs's Army came before the Place, the major part of the Town being for the Counteſs, ſeized upon the Governor, and forced him to deliver it up to Sir Thomas Dagworth, who put a ſtrong Gariſon into it.

The King ſends Sir Thomas Dagworth with ſome Forces into Bretagne, with which he beſieges and takes the Town of Roche Darien.

When Count Charles of Blois [3] heard this, he muſter'd a great Army at Nantes of ſixteen hundred Men at Arms, twelve thouſand Footmen, and two thouſand Croſs-bows, beſides many Noblemen and Gentlemen; for he had in his company no leſs than four hundred Knights and twenty four Bannerets. With theſe Forces he went and laid Siege to Roche Darien, which he aſſaulted ſo vigorouſly by his Soldiers, and batter'd ſo furiouſly with his Engines, that the Buildings of the Caſtle being almoſt ruined, and the Beſieged reduced to the laſt extremity, they would gladly have marched out upon condition of having their Lives and Goods ſaved; which Count Charles, being blinded with Paſſion, would not hear of, but required that they ſhould ſurrender to Mercy; which they not being willing to truſt to, ſtill obſtinately held out. In the mean time Sir Thomas Dagworth reſolved, if poſſible, to relieve the Place; and tho he was very much inferior to the Count in Forces, yet having received a Recruit of above a hundred Men at Arms, he march'd away by night to Count Charles's Camp, which he ſurpriſed the next morning before Sun-riſing, and breaking into it on the ſudden (the Governor with the Gariſon of the Town making a vigorous Sally at the ſame time) after a ſhort diſpute routed the whole Army conſiſting of near thirty thouſand men, and took Count Charles himſelf with his two Sons Priſoners, together with divers Lords and Perſons of Quality needleſs to be particularly named; beſides many other of the ſame Degree, which with the reſt of the ſlain made near ſeven hundred men, as [4] Sir Thomas Dagworth himſelf certified to the Chancellor of England

But Froiſſart is here certainly miſtaken, who makes two Aſſaults to have bin given to Count Charles's Camp, in the firſt of which he ſays Sir Thomas Dagworth (whom he always calls Dagerno) was taken Priſoner, and his Party routed; the falſhood of which appears from our Engliſh Hiſtorians.

While matters paſſed thus in Bretagne, King Edward had ſo ſtraiten'd the Town of Calais, both by Sea and Land, that without a ſpeedy Relief, it could not long hold out. Wherefore the [2] Duke of Normandy having recover'd now his Loſſes in Flanders, marched forward about the beginning of June, and hover'd about Calais with a conſiderable Body of Men, till the King his Father ſhould come up and join him with all his Forces. [4] H. K. ib. Chron. R. Aveſ. A Letter taken out of the Sea, diſcovers the ſad condition of the People in the Town.

[4] About this time ſome of the King's Ships met by chance with a ſmall Gally belonging to Genoa, the Maſter of which ſeeing he could not eſcape out of their hands, took a Letter he had lately received from the Governor of Calais, to the French King, and tying it to a Hatchet, flung it over-board; yet the Water being there but ſhallow, it was preſently taken up again by a Fiſhing-net. This Letter being dried, and then open'd, was found to this effect, which I here tranſlate verbatim.

Know, Dread Sir, that your People in Calais have eaten their Horſes, Dogs, and even Rats. Now nothing remains for them to live upon, unleſs they eat one another; wherefore, Great Sir, if we have not ſpeedy

Succour, the Town is loſt; and we are all reſolved, if we are not reliev'd, to ſally forth and die upon our Enemies with Honour, rather than to die within the Walls by Famine: And God grant you Power to render to us or our Heirs according to our Sufferings in your Service.

[1] When King Edward had peruſed this Letter, he cauſed it to be cloſed up again with his own Seal, and ſent to King Philip, requiring him to make haſte and ſuccour his good People in Calais, that ſuffer'd ſuch Miſery for his ſake: And he being ſufficiently ſenſible of the Hardſhips they endur'd, was all this while raiſing Forces for their Relief; but as his Preparations were great, ſo they were ſlow, and took up much time. However, in anſwer to the aforeſaid Letter, he ſent word to King Edward, that he would ſhortly come in Perſon, and raiſe the Siege; and gave the Caliſians notice, that now he would by no means fail to bring them a ſpeedy and powerful Succour. All this while the Duke of Normandy had made ſeveral offers to draw near Calais with his Forces, and ſometimes came within two or three Leagues of that Place: but the Engliſh had ſo drain'd the Country, that for want of Victuals he could not ſubſiſt thereabout for any time. Then in the end of July, [2] King Philip having raiſed a vaſt Army of a hundred and fifty thouſand men, began his march from Amiens to Arras, being accompanied by his Son the Duke of Normandy, and moſt of the chief Nobility and People of his Kingdom, that ſo he might be nearer hand to watch the motions of the Flemings, who had lately come with a great Army and laid Siege to the Town of Aire, to divert the French from relieving Calais: but ſo ſoon as they heard of his arrival in thoſe Parts, they raiſed the Siege, and marched off; yet not without doing a great deal of damage to the Country, having killed a great many of the French, and taken much Plunder.

His Anſwer to K. Edward, that he would come and raiſe the Siege.

[2] Froiſ. c. 144. Mezeray. K. Philip raiſes a vaſt Army, and raiſes the Siege of Aire.

[3] When King Philip underſtood the Flemings had quitted the Siege of Aire, he began his march towards Calais thro the Country of Bologne, with all his Forces, until they came between Calais and Whitſand, within a League of the Engliſh Camp; where on the ſeven and twentieth of July he intrench'd with his whole Army on the Hill of Sangates on the other ſide of the Marſh, over-againſt King Edward's Camp, and from thence ſent and offer'd him Battel: But he wiſely conſidering the great advantage he had over the French, return'd in anſwer, That he had lain many months before the Town, to his vaſt loſs of Men, and expence of Treaſure; but when he had taken it (which he hop'd to do in a ſhort time) he ſhould then think of anſwering his Challenge, and marching to fight him in the open Field.

[3] Froiſ. ib. He thence marches towards Calais to relieve it.

[4] When the French King ſaw he could by no means bring King Edward to a Battel, he deſired the two Cardinal Legats from the Pope, who had been all along the Mediators for a Peace, to go to the end of the Cauſway that leads to the Town, and ſend Letters to the Earl of Lancaſter, and ſome other Great Men in the King's Army, requeſting that they might ſpeak with them. Whereupon he gave leave to him and the Earl of Northampton to go and treat with them, who with great earneſtneſs deſired there might be a ſpeedy Treaty ſet on foot, ſaying, they knew the French King would make ſuch Offers of Peace, as might be reaſonably accepted. To which Propoſal the King preſently aſſented, and then the Earl of Lancaſter order'd two Pavilions to be erected between both Armies, wherein there imme-diatly aſſembl'd before the ſaid Cardinals, and the Marqueſs of Juliers (then one of the Commiſſioners) on the behalf of King Edward, the Earls of Lancaſter and Northampton, and the Lords Cobham and Manny. On the part of the French were ſent the Duke of Burgundy and the Lord of Bourbon, with other Lords of France, and the Lord of Oſtmond and Monſieur Geoffry de Charny; [1] who at firſt only inſiſted upon Terms for the Town of Calais, but at laſt they offer'd the King's Commiſſioners, that he ſhould enjoy the Dukedom of Guyenne and County of Ponthieu, as his Grandfather had done; which was thought a ſmall matter for the Damage he had received, and the great Pretenſions he had to the Crown of France it ſelf, and therefore it was rejected.

[2] Chron. MS. Col. Ben. Froiſ. ib.
The French King again offers K. Edward Battel.

So after three days ſpent in Treaty without any effect, when the French King ſaw that all the Avenues to the Town were ſo well fortified and guarded, that there was no approach to it for his Army without running the utmoſt hazard, he was very much concern'd that all his great Preparations, made with ſuch a vaſt Expence, were like to come to nothing. Then [2] by the advice of his Council, he ſent the Sieurs Charny and Ribemont, with others, to King Edward, to demand Battel of Him, who being brought into his Preſence, he received them at the entrance of his Pavilion. Then they told him, that the King their Maſter, ſince He could find no convenient way of coming at Him, deſired He would come out with his Army and fight Him on the ſecond of Auguſt following, as alſo that he would ſend certain Lords of his Council, as their King would alſo do of his, to view and ſet out the Ground, and appoint the time of Battel.

The King's return to this Meſſage.

To which Meſſage King Edward only return'd a ſhort Anſwer, “That He had now lain before the Town almoſt a Year, and that their Maſter who kept his Inheritance from Him, might have come and tried to relieve the Place long ſince, if he had pleaſed; but that juſt when it was upon the point of being ſurrender'd, and could no longer hold out, it was very unreaſonable, after all the trouble and expence He had been at, that He ſhould now at his deſire come out into the Field and fight for what He looked upon as his own already; and therefore He ſhould keep his advantage, and let the King of France come to Him if he pleaſed.

[3] Id. ib. Du Cheſne.
The Cardinals again offer their Mediation, and the Treaty is once more renew'd, but breaks off.

[3] With this Anſwer the French Lords were civilly diſmiſs'd; and whilſt King Philip was conſidering what to do, the two Cardinals already mention'd came again to Him, and offer'd their Mediation, who being by Him ſent back to the Engliſh, to know what their Reſolution was, the King out of reverence to whatever they ſhould offer, agreed to renew the Treaty once more, which was managed by moſt of the ſame Commiſſioners as before; where among other things the French offer'd to King Edward all Gaſcoigne and Ponthieu, and the Marriage of his Son John; and further to yield unto Him the Town of Calais, ſaving the Lives and Limbs of the Inhabitants. To which the Engliſh Commiſſioners in ſhort anſwer'd, that they were not beholden to them for that, for the Town and all that is in it was at their King's mercy; ſo after four days the Treaty broke off.

[4] H. K. col. 2595.
The Fr. Commiſſioners offer to decide the Right of both Kings by Combat, which is declin'd by the Engliſh.

Then [4] when the French Commiſſioners ſaw there was no Peace to be obtain'd by theſe means, they propos'd that the Right of both Kings might be decided by Combat between five or ſix, to be choſen by each ſide; and that the Place where they ſhould meet might be aſſigned ſigned by the King of France. To this the Earl of Lancaſter reply'd, that then the Place ought rather to be aſſign'd by King Edward, who was the natural and right Heir both of England and France; for Philip of Valois had no Right at all: So the Cardinals finding there was nothing more to be done, retir'd to St. Omers. King Edward having in the mean while receiv'd a Recruit of ſeventeen thouſand freſh Men, Engliſh and Flemings, offer'd the French King Battel; and tho he would not come out upon the Plain above Calais[1], yet he proffer'd at his own Expence to fill up the Trenches, and to remove all Impediments, that ſo the French Army might have free Acceſs to draw down and join Battel with him in the Marſh, provided he might have ſufficient Security, that nothing ſhould be convey'd into the Town during that time.

Anno Dom. MCCCXLVII.

K. Edward having receiv'd Recruits out of England, offers K. Philip Battel.

But [2] King Philip not liking that Offer, and deſpairing to do any thing further, on the Thurſday morning betimes ſet fire to his Tents, and ſo decamp'd and march'd off, taking his way towards Picardy, and then to Amiens; where for the preſent he disbanded his Army. But however, upon his Removal the Earls of Lancaſter and Northampton follow'd him at the heels, and took many of the Carriages belonging to the Army, beſides a great many Straglers, whom they took Priſoners.

Who not liking that Offer, decamps.

When the Governour and Gariſon in Calais ſaw that their King was quite gone off without being able to relieve them, finding their caſe to be deſperate, they took down the Banner of France from the Walls, and ſet up that of England in its ſtead: [3] upon which the Governour deſired a Parly, and the Lord Manny and Sir Walter Baſſet being appointed to treat with him, he prayed them to intercede with the King for himſelf, the Gariſon, and Inhabitants of the Town; that ſince their Crime was only an exceſs of Duty to their Prince in holding out ſo long, his Majeſty would be pleas'd to take the Town and Caſtle into his hands, which they would freely ſurrender, together with all that was in them, and he hop'd that he would be pleas'd to grant them their Lives and Liberties. But the Lord Manny briefly told him, that after ſo great an Obſtinacy they muſt not expect to come off ſo eaſily; the King being not only highly incens'd againſt him and his Men, but againſt all the Inhabitants, for the great Piracys they had committed upon his Subjects during the War: yet he told the Governour, that he would repreſent what he had ſaid to the King his Maſter; which being done, he immediately ſent back word to the Governour and Townſmen, that he would grant them no other Conditions, than that they ſhould leave themſelves wholly to his Mercy. But at laſt, upon the Interceſſion of the Great Lords about him, he condeſcended to theſe Terms; That ſix of the chief Burgeſſes of the Town ſhould come forth bareheaded, barefooted, and in their Shirts, with Halters about their Necks, with the Keys of the Town and Caſtle, and ſhould lie at the King's mercy how he ſhould diſpoſe of them. Of which Reſolution notice being given to the Governour and Inhabitants, it caus'd a great Conſternation among them, for it ſeem'd hard to find out any of the principal Townſmen that would yield themſelves up as a Sacrifice for the reſt; till at laſt one Euſtace de Saint Pierre a chief Burgher, gave an example of his heroick Courage and Concern for

The King being ſtill much incenſed, commanded them to be all immediately beheaded; nor would he change his Reſolution notwithſtanding all the Interceſſion his Son or the Lords about him could make, till at laſt the Queen her ſelf (being then great with Child) fell upon her knees before him, and for Chriſt's ſake, and the Bleſſed Virgin's, and for all the kindneſs that the King ever had for her, humbly beg'd the Lives of theſe poor Men. Upon this the King being touch'd with Pity, granted her Requeſt, and ſhe preſently caus'd them to be carried to her Apartment, where the Halters were taken from their Necks; and being new clad, She order'd them a Dinner and ſix Nobles apiece, and ſo caus'd them to be ſafely carried out of the Engliſh Camp, andwholly to be ſet at liberty.

Then the [1] King ſent the Earl of Warwick to take poſſeſſion of the Town and Caſtle, and ſecure Sir John de Vienne with the reſt of the Officers and Soldiers of the Gariſon, to be there impriſon'd; and as for all the Inhabitants, who were almoſt famiſh'd, after they had been refreſhed with Victuals, he order'd them to be turn'd out of the Town, for he intended to people it wholly with Engliſh. The King's Orders being executed accordingly, and the common People having ſtore of Victuals ſent them, [2] and eating too freely after ſo long a Faſt, ſurfeited, ſo that no leſs than three hundred of them died the next day; but all the reſt being convey'd beyond the Caſtle of Guiſnes, within the French Dominions, were let go where they pleas'd, and moſt of them went to St. Omers. Thus all the French were turn'd out of the Town, except one Prieſt and two antient Men who underſtood the Laws and Cuſtoms of the Place, and how the Lands about it were divided. And thus the ſtrong Town of Calais was deliver'd into the hands of King Edward, after near eleven months Siege, on the fourth of Auguſt this preſent Year.

[3] Id. ib. The King makes his publick Entry into Calais, where he ſtaid till the Queen was brought to Bed of a Daughter.

[4] C. 147.

[3] A few days after King Edward made his publick Entry into Calais, mounted on a ſtately Horſe, and attended by his Nobility, and chief Officers of the Army in all their military Pomp, and took up his Lodgings in the Caſtle, where he ſtaid for above a Month, to give Orders for new fortifying the Place, and to ſettle his Affairs; during which time the Queen was there brought to Bed of a Daughter, call'd Margaret, who was afterwards married to John Haſtings Earl of Pembroke. The Birth of this Lady at this Place is only mention'd by [4] Froiſſart, but moſt of our Engliſh Hiſtorians make her to have been born the Year before at Weſtminſter or Windſor. Whilſt the King ſtaid here, he beſtow'd a great many of the faireſt Houſes in the Town on the Lord Manny, the Earl of Warwick, and other Noblemen, in conſideration of the great Expences they had been at in the Siege; and as for the reſt of the Houſes, he reſolved to people them with Citizens from London, Canterbury, and other Places, which being not long afterwards perform'd, Calais became a perfect Engliſh Colony; but as for all the Wealth and Riches of the Town (for He let nothing be carried away) He cauſed it all to be brought to one place, and there kept under a ſtrong guard. Then He made the Lord Montgomery Governor of the Town, and Sir Amerie of Pavia, a Lombard (who had been bred up under him) Captain of the Caſtle, of whom you will hear further anon; but as for Sir John de Vienne, the late French Governor, he and twelve others of the principal Officers were ſent Priſoners into England, to be kept in the Tower of London. Yet the King's great Succeſs was ſomewhat qualified by a ſmall Miſfortune; for five days after the taking of the Town, the Soldiers Huts in the Camp took fire, and burnt with that violence, that it deſtroy'd a great deal of warlike Ammunition and Proviſions; ſo that the King was forc'd to ſend for a freſh Recruit out of England.

But the Earl of Warwick had not ſuch good ſucceſs; for as he rode from the Camp towards St. Omers, he loſt to the number of a hundred and eighty Men at Arms and Archers, who indiſcreetly ſtraggl'd too far from the main Body. And beſides theſe Loſſes, by reaſon of the great Heats that laſted moſt part of this Summer, great numbers of the Engliſh died in the Camp before Calais, for want of freſh Water.

Whilſt the King was thus employ'd at this Place, [2] there came into France Guy of Montfort, a Nobleman of great extraction, commonly called Guy of Bologne, whereof he was Biſhop, and now Cardinal of St. Cecilius, who was juſt then ſent Legat from the Pope into France, to join with the other two Cardinals that were already there, in order to try what they could do towards reconciling the two Kings. This Prelat labour'd very zealouſly with his Couſin the French King at Amiens, and from thence went to Calais to move King Edward to a Truce; and at laſt his Endeavours met with ſo good Succeſs, that he obtain'd it of ~~Him~~, to commence from the fifth of September to the thirteenth, which being again prolonged to the eight and twentieth of the ſame Month, was then fully ratified and accorded on both ſides, to endure between the ſaid Kings, their Subjects, Allies, Confederates, Aiders and Abetters, from that time till the Eighth of July following, upon theſe Articles, viz.

In the mean time indeed it was but ill obſerv'd by the Scots; nor did the King's Governors of Places in Gaſcoigne maintain the Truce any better in thoſe Parts, but in Bretagne the War was ſtill carried on between the two Counteſſes of Blois and Montfort; by the former in her own and her Husband's Right; by the latter on the behalf of her Son, with extreme animoſity on both ſides.

As for King Edward, He would not repoſe any abſolute confidence in the Truce; but that He might the better ſecure his new Conqueſt, [1] he built a ſtrong Caſtle at Risbank, betwixt the Town of Calais and the Haven's Mouth, to keep off the Enemy from entring the Haven, or to endamage the Town that way. And having thus proſperouſly ſettled his Affairs, he went on Ship-board with his Queen, and the Prince his Son, and ſet ſail for England; but, according to his uſual fate, [2] He was now again ſeverely treated by a dreadful Tempeſt, wherein He loſt many of his People: however at laſt, tho not without great difficulty, and the loſs of many Veſſels, as well as Men and Horſes, He arrived ſafel~~y on Shore~~ on the 12 ~~fourteen~~th of October, and ſoon after went to London, where He was received in great triumph by the Mayor and Citizens, and by them honourably attended to his Palace at Weſtminſter.

As to foreign Affairs, the Emperor Lewis of Bavaria having been lately publickly curſed by Pope Clement, as a Heretick and Schiſmatick, and as much depoſed as that Pope could make him, [4] he thereupon to finiſh what he had begun in July the laſt Year, had cauſed Charles Marqueſs of Moravia, and Son to John King of Bohemia, to be elected in his ſtead, at Rens in the Dioceſs of Treves, tho the major part of the Citizens were not for Him, and moſt of the Cities of Germany ſtill held for Lewis, who did not long ſurvive; for as he return'd from Hunting, being taken with an Apoplexy, He fell off his Horſe, and ſoon after departed this Life on the eleventh of October.

He had by the implacable malice of ſeveral Popes two Emperors ſet up againſt Him; the one was Frederick Marqueſs of Miſnia, in the beginning of his Reign, and Charles the abovemention'd in the latter end; but for all this he ruled the Empire in ſpite of the Pope's

King Edward ſoon after his Return out of France, on the thirteenth of November, ſent forth [2] Writs of Summons for a Parliament to meet on the morrow of St. Hillary, or fourteenth of January; which being met accordingly, [3] the cauſe of Summons was by William de Thorp, Lord Chief Juſtice, declared to be on two accounts; firſt concerning the War with France, undertaken by conſent of the Lords and Commons; the ſecond was, how the Peace of the Nation might beſt be kept: and then he deſired that within four days they ſhould give their Anſwer to the King and his Council, what they thought and would adviſe concerning theſe things.

The fourth day [4] the Commons declared, that they are not able to adviſe any thing concerning War; and therefore deſired to be excuſed as to that, believing the King would be beſt adviſed by his Nobles and Council; and what ſhould be by them determined, they would conſent unto, confirm and eſtabliſh.

[4] Ibid. n. 5.

To the ſecond they anſwered, whereas they were charged to adviſe the King, how the Peace of the Land might be better kept, their Opinion was, that in every County there ſhould be ſix Perſons, of whom two to be the greateſt of the County, two Knights, and two Men of the Law, more or leſs, as need ſhould be; and they to be inveſted with a Power and Commiſſion out of the Chancery, to hear and determine all matters concerning the Peace, &c. and then concluded with a Requeſt, that becauſe they had been ſo long in Parliament, to their great Coſts and Damage, they might have a ſpeedy Anſwer to their Petitions, in order to have a ſpeedy diſmiſſion to return home. 'Tis probable the King receiv'd not the ſatisfaction He expected from this Parliament; for within a month after the firſt day of their meeting, He iſſued [5] Writs on the fourteenth of February for ſummoning another to meet on Monday next after the firſt Sunday in Midlent (or ſeventeenth of March) on which day, becauſe the Great Men ſummon'd were not fully come, the Parliament was continued until the next day, and for the ſame Reaſon until Wedneſday enſuing, [6] when Sir William de Thorp Chief Juſtice propounded the Cauſes of Summons, which were the ſame that are expreſt in the Writs of Summons. paratories for the Treaty and other things, about the Feaſt of St. Andrew laſt paſt, in hopes to have heard ſomewhat from them in his laſt Parliament; but of what they had done he had then received no certain Account: And for that many notable things were agreed on by the laſt Truce in favour of Himſelf, his Subjects and Allies, which thro the malice of the adverſe Party were not then accompliſh'd; and alſo for that his ſaid Adverſary, contrary to his Faith given concerning the then hop'd for Peace, had provided a very great number of Men at Arms, and others, with Ships and Gallies of greater force than had ever been heard of before, to invade England, and deſtroy the King and Engliſh Nation, as it manifeſtly appear'd by what had been, and was daily done. The other Cauſe was, to know how and in what manner the Peace of the Land might be beſt kept. And then the Commons were commanded to treat together, and take good advice how the Malice of the King's Adverſary might be reſiſted; and for the ſafety of Himſelf and his Kingdom, how He might be aided to his greateſt Profit, and the leaſt Charge to his People. Then the Commons having adviſed together, gave the Anſwer following, which tho ſomewhat long, I ſhall give you tranſlated from the French Record.

The Commons Anſwer to the King.

They ſet forth the great Taxes they had paid, and the Grievances they ſtill ſuffer'd.

"[1] To their moſt honourable and moſt redoubted Liege Lord, his poor Commons ſhew, that at his laſt Parliament he ſent the Noble Earls of Lancaſter and Northampton, and other Great Men, to tell them, that He intended not to take any thing more of them, or to charge them farther; which they had publiſhed to the whole Land, for which they had alſo thank'd Him, according to their knowledg, as much as they could, and prayed for Him night and day: and yet at this preſent Parliament, upon certain News now arriv'd, He demanded a very great Charge of his poor Commons. Wherefore they deſire his Nobleneſs and moſt High Lordſhip would be pleaſed to underſtand the Miſchiefs and Burdens of the Commons: that is to ſay, the reaſonable Aid which had been pardoned in his fourteenth Year (that is, a Grant was then made it ſhould not be paid all his Reign) to wit, forty Shillings upon every Knight's Fee, to make his eldeſt Son Knight; whereas by Statute there was but twenty Shillings due upon every Fee; beſides the Fifteenths of the Commons, and Tenths of Cities and Burghs, Men at Arms, Hobelors, Archers taking of Victuals without paying for them, guarding the Sea, and alſo the Subſidy of Wool, by reaſon whereof every Sack of Wool (that was the Treaſure of the Land) was ſold for forty Shillings leſs than its value. So tho it would be a great trouble to the Commons to bear any Charge, yet neverthele ſs, if the Aid now to be granted might not be turn'd into Wool, neither by way of Loan or Value, nor in any other manner, nor levied too haſtily, but in the Form it was wont to be granted; and that the Eyres of Juſtices in the mean time might ceaſe, as well of the Foreſt as of the Common Pleas, and General Enquiry in the whole Land. And when this Aid ſhould be levied, that then for the future no Subſidy upon Wool may be granted by the Merchants; and that no Impoſition, Loan, or other Taillage, or Charge whatſoever, ſhall be put upon them (the Commons) by the Privy Council, without their Grant and Conſent in Par-

Upon theſe conditions, and not otherwiſe, as alſo that they may be entred in the Parliament-Roll, as matter of Record, by which they might have Remedy, if any thing ſhould be done to the contrary in time to come; the ſaid poor Commonalty, to their very great miſchief, grant to the King three Fifteenths, to be levied in three Years, to begin at Michaelmas next coming, ſo as every Year one Fifteenth may be levied, and no more, at two Terms in the Year, viz. St. Michael and Eaſter, by even Portions; and that this Aid may be aſſigned and reſerv'd only for the War, and not to pay Debts; and if the War ſhould ceaſe, or a Truce be made, then the Fifteenth of the laſt Year not to be levied. That of theſe Conditions, and the manner of this Grant, Letters Patents ſhould be made, and ſent into all Counties, without paying any thing for them, wherein ſhould be mentioned the great neceſſity the King was in after the laſt Parliament; and in caſe the War ſhould break out towards Scotland, the Aid granted beyond Trent, ſhould be imploy'd for the defence of thoſe Parts, as it had been formerly.

There were likewiſe many other Petitions, with their Anſwers, made this Parliament, for which, being of leſs moment, I ſhall refer the Reader to Cotton's [1] Abridgment, only ſhall take notice of one or two of the moſt remarkable; upon the reading of a long Complaint againſt Foreſters, for afforeſting of mens Purlieus for undue Trial, and for Extortions. To which was added a Requeſt, that Magna Charta may be obſerv'd, and that all men may enjoy their Purlieus, according to the Perambulations made in the time of King Edward the Firſt.

[1] P. 69, 71.

To which Petition the King's Anſwer was, that Magna Charta ſhould be kept inviolable; and thoſe that will complain for the right of their Purlieus, may have Writs out of Chancery for redreſs.

This much I thought fit to take notice of, that the Reader may obſerve how ſenſible the Commons of England have been upon any Infringement of the Great Charters of Liberties and Foreſts, and how ready the greateſt and moſt powerful of our Kings have been to give them all due ſatisfaction to ſuch their Petitions or Demands, in their own way.

About this time the German Princes being much diſcontented at the Pope's impoſing an Emperor upon them againſt their wills, moſt part of the Temporal Electors, as alſo one of the Eccleſiaſtical,

[2] When Queen Philippe heard of their coming and the occaſion, being a wary and prudent Princeſs, ſhe was very much concern'd for the Quiet and Safety of the King her Husband; for ſhe very well knew the great troubles and vexations the late Emperor Lewis her Brother in Law had endured all his Reign, both from the malice of the Pope, and the Factions of the German Princes raiſed by Him; and therefore ſhe did all ſhe could to perſuade the King her Husband from concerning Himſelf with ſo hazardous and precarious a Dignity, to which the King Himſelf was not much inclinable: however, whilſt the Ambaſſadors continued in England expecting his final Anſwer, He privately ſent over the Earl of Northampton into Germany to obſerve the ſtate of Affairs there, who returning home after a ſhort ſtay, gave the King a full Information of the Factions and Intrigues of thoſe Princes, and that by the acceptance of the Empire, He ſhould not only have him that was lately ſet up by the Pope for his Adverſary, but alſo the Pope himſelf, who would be ſure to maintain an Emperor of his own appointing, and who, if ever he could be brought over to declare for the King, would never to be ſure do it without an exceſſive ſum of Mony; for which reaſons, but chiefly becauſe it would hinder Him from being able to recover his Rights in France, tho he treated the Ambaſſadors very Nobly, yet He anſwered them, That He would not undertake ſo great a Burthen, till he had gain'd the Crown of France, which was his due by Hereditary Right.

And not long after, the King ſent [3] Sir Hugh Nevil and Ivo de Clinton, his Envoys to the Princes Electors, to return them Thanks for the great Honor they had intended Him, with a more abſolute and formal refuſal of it than before; yet however, that He ſhould never fail to do the Sacred Empire all the good Offices that lay in his Power. The time of the Truce of Calais being near expiring, [6] upon the Pope's ſending Commiſſioners either to prolong it, or to treat about a final Peace, the former was accepted for ſix Weeks; which Term being ended, [7] the Ambaſſadors on both ſides met between Guiſnes and Calais, and agreed to another Truce to begin on the thirteenth of November, and continue to the firſt of September 1349. and how it was then prorogued the year following, you will find hereafter: and indeed this was a very proper time for the Pope's Interceſſion, for both Kingdoms were now ſo drain'd of Mony by the late War, that they needed a Recruit before they could begin it again. Indeed France deſired this Truce upon a much more fatal occaſion, caſion, viz. the great Plague that then afflicted Europe, and had now ſeiz'd that Kingdom; but the reſt of this year in England [1] was chiefly taken up in Sports and Tourneaments at Weſtminſter in the Eaſter Holydays, as alſo about Midſummer at Windſor, where David King of Scots was preſent, being held by King Edward himſelf, and the reſt of the Nobility, with great expence in Habits, Armor, and other Warlike Acoutrements. To ſay ſomewhat of Scotland, this Summer the [2] Scottiſh Nobility made a Propoſal to King Edward to redeem their King from his Captivity; to whom He return'd this Anſwer, That foraſmuch as they in defiance of the Truce had unjuſtly made War upon Him in his Abſence, He expected they ſhould firſt give Him ſatisfaction for all thoſe Injuries and Damages they had done to Him and his Realm in that War; and this done, they might proceed to the buſineſs of the Ranſom. But tho' this Anſwer was but reaſonable, yet it was ſo diſtaſtful to the Scots, that upon the firſt notice of it, they roſe ſuddenly, and in conſiderable Bodies enter'd the Marches of England, where they ravaged the Country, fired Villages, ſlew poor People without mercy, and took many ſleeping in their Beds, whom they carry'd away priſoners, and ſet unreaſonable Ranſoms upon them. Then the Engliſh Lords of the Marches, ſeeming to wink at theſe things, proclaim'd a Solemn Tourneament to be held at Berwick, thereby to entice the Scots again within the Engliſh Pale; who coming accordingly in their wonted Bravery, were many of them cut ſhort in the way by a good Body of Engliſh Borderers, who diſcomfited them, and put ſeveral of them to the Sword; and preſently after, in proſecution of this Revenge, the Northern Lords went into Scotland, and ſpoiled and ravaged the County of Carrick. ✱

✱ as to foreign affairs I find nothing more to have happened worth noteing, only that about the [illegible] year, [illegible] a final Peace concluded between the King and the Earl of Flanders [illegible] s. before. the Articles of this peace you may find in Rot. Franc. 22 Ed 3. m. [illegible] col. [illegible]

The reſt of this Year paſſed pretty quietly, inſomuch that our [3] Author takes notice, that Peace being now ſettled, England gloried in the ſpoils of France; ſo that there was ſcarce any Woman of Condition but could ſhew ſome rich Furs and foreign Furniture, and our Engliſh Dames began now to pride themſelves in the Faſhions of the French Ladies; and then Luxury increaſing, fine Table Linnen, Gold and Silver Plate, and Jewels were ordinarily ſeen in the Houſes of private Perſons.

The great Plenty and Luxury of the Engliſh at this time.

And indeed the Vanity of our Women was then very great, if what [4] Knighton relates of ſome of the Ladys of that time be true, that they were ſo fond of Tourneaments, that it was ordinary for them to ride forty or fifty in a Troop to theſe Aſſemblies; and having more Beauty than Diſcretion, went dreſs'd like Men, in Partycolour'd Coats, with ſhort Hoods about their Heads, and Girdles embroider'd with Silver (at which hung Daggers) about their Waſts; and thus they rode upon choice and well-furniſh'd Horſes from one Tourneament to another, waſting their Eſtates and loſing their Reputation. This I take notice of, that the Reader may not believe that exceſſive Confidence and Vanity among the Female Sex have only been in faſhion ſince this preſent Age. But God had provided a ſevere Scourge for the Luxury that now reigned in this Nation: for the laſt [5] year a Plague began in the North parts of Aſia, and ſpreading it ſelf Southward, never ceas'd, till paſſing thro' Greece it arriv'd in Italy, and going from thence into France, made ſuch quick diſpatch, that [6] about the beginning of Auguſt it came over hither, and be-

[2] T. W. Froiſ. c. 150. The Lord De Charny tampers with the Governor of Calais, to betray that Place.

King Edward had hardly time to [1] keep his Chriſtmas at Havering in Eſſex, before He was call'd into France on this occaſion. Some time after the prolonging of the late Truce was thus agreed on, [2] the Lord Geoffry de Charny, who was at that time at St. Omers, and commanded in Chief over the French Forces in Artois and Picardy, thinking it would be no great fault to ſurprize the Town of Calais during the Truce, held private Intelligence with Sir Americ de Pavia, who (as I have already ſaid) was left Governor of the Caſtle by King Edward, to betray the ſame to the French for twenty thouſand Crowns in Gold; but ſome time before it was to be executed, King Edward had ſecret Intelligence of this Treachery (as ſome ſay) from the Governor himſelf; or, as Froiſſart relates, from ſome other hand: but which way ſoever it was, Sir Americ came privately over to the King, and acquainting Him with the Deſign, promis'd to carry on the Treaty under-hand, and to make as if he would deliver up the Town at the time appointed, being the laſt day of December. But juſt before that day, [3] the King with his Son the Prince, having choſen out three hundred Men at Arms, and ſix hundred Archers, and ſent them away forthwith to Dover, and there All going on board arriv'd at Calais that night, and lodg'd Himſelf and his Men in the Caſtle, letting no body in the mean while go out of the Town to give notice to the French of his Arrival. In the mean time the Lord Charny began to march from Arras to Calais, and arrived before it about twelve of the Clock at night; then waiting there ſome time, till all his Men were come up, when he had put them in Order, he ſent two of his Eſquires to the Caſtle to know of the Governor, if it were time to ſend to receive it; who ſaying, Yes, they returned with this Anſwer to their Maſter, who advancing forward paſſed over [4] Newland Bridg with all his Forces: but he had ſent a little before twelve Knights and an hundred Men at Arms, under the Command of Sir Edw. Ranty, to take poſſeſſion of the Caſtle, with the twenty thouſand Crowns in Gold, which was to be the Price of the Treaſon; and in the mean while the French General hover'd not far off in the Field with great ſilence, expecting till his Men had ſeiz'd the Caſtle, and then to enter the Town. But the Governor having let down the Bridg of the Poſtern, permitted the hundred French Men to enter, and having receiv'd the twenty thouſand Crowns from the Commander, he carry'd the Men into the great Tower of the Caſtle to take poſſeſſion of it; but as ſoon as the Gate was open'd, they found K. Edward with two hundred Men, who ran upon them with their naked Swords and Battle-Axes in their hands; whereupon the French Men ſeeing they were maſter'd, yielded themſelves priſoners, and were preſently lock'd up in the Dungeon underneath the Tower. This done, the King with the Prince his Son having mounted their Horſes, went out of the Caſtle attended by his Archers and Men at Arms, and marched thro the Town to the Gate of Bologne, where (being incognito with

But [1] ſo ſoon as the Lord Charny and his French Men perceived their Enemies thus coming out upon them, truſting in their numbers, and ſeeing it in vain now to retreat, they reſolved to fight it out; ſo that there began a cruel Battle upon the Cauſway and Bridg leading to the Town, where, to paſs by ſeveral turns and circumſtances of this Action, the King was in ſome danger, and once hard put to it, being engag'd with the Lord of Ribemont, a Strong and Valiant Perſon, by whom tho he was twice ſtruck down on his knees, yet that Lord was at laſt taken priſoner, as were alſo the the L. Charny and many other Knights and Men of Quality, the French Army being totally routed by the Engliſh Archers and Men at Arms; but the greateſt part of thoſe Forces ran away, and eſcaped with the Lord Montmorancy, and divers other French Noblemen; for the brunt of the Battle fell upon that part which was commanded by the Lord Charny, who being grievouſly wounded himſelf was taken priſoner, with divers French Knights and Perſons of Quality, beſides a great many common Soldiers.

This Victory was obtain'd, and the Fight over on the firſt of January by ten of the clock in the Morning, the King and the Prince, with divers of the Nobility, having behaved themſelves very gallantly; [2] and then they marched into the Town with all their Forces; and ſo ſoon as they were got into the Caſtle, the King commanded all the Priſoners to be brought thither, and put in ſafe cuſtody: and tho the Lord Charny was the main Contriver of this unfortunate Deſign, yet being ſo wounded that he was not able to go, the King ordered his own Chirurgeons to take care of him, which they did ſo effectually, that he was able to ſit at Supper the Night following amongſt the reſt of the Priſoners; and then it was they firſt knew, that the King and the Prince his Son had been both engaged againſt them, as Private Volunteers. [3] King Edward after he had taken the remainder of that day, as alſo moſt part of the next for his own repoſe, as well as that of his Noble Priſoners, kindly invited them to ſup with him the Night following in the Hall of the Caſtle, where he made them a ſplendid Entertainment, and received them with a gracious Countenance; and He himſelf being magnificently clad, ſat down alone at the upper end of the Room, the Prince his Son and the Chief Lords carrying up the firſt Courſe; but when that was done, He made them all ſit down by him on each ſide, whilſt the French Lords and Officers were entertain'd at a long Table in the midſt of the Hall, and ſeeming at leaſt to be merry, put the beſt Countenance they could on ſo ſad an occaſion. Preſently after Supper, the King being bareheaded, except a rich Circlet of Gold about his Head, beſet with Orient Pearls, roſe up with ſome of his Chief Lords, and went to diſcourſe with the French Noblemen: when he came to Sir Geoffry Charny, He changed Countenance a little, and beheld him with a frown, and ſaid to this effect: My Lord, I owe you but ſmall thanks, ſince you deſigned to ſteal that from me by night, which I fairly won by day; and indeed it would have been too good a Bargain in Conſcience to have bought that for twenty thouſand Crowns, which coſt me ſo much Blood and Treaſure; but God has diſappointed your Deſign, and of his Mercy given me the Victory. The Lord Charny, either being aſhamed of his late Action, or diſpirited by his wounds and misfortune, anſwered not a word. So the King turn'd away, and went to the Lord Euſtace de Ribemont, where he made a ſtand, and with a ſmiling Aſpect, made him a very obliging Complement to this effect: That He looked upon him as one of the ſtouteſt and ableſt Men living, as well to offend his Enemies as defend himſelf; and that He (viz. the King) had never been ſo hard put to it in his Life: And therefore as a perpetual token of his Valor, he took off the Chaplet from his own Head, and put it upon this Lord's, charging him to wear it for his ſake in all publick Meetings and Solemnities; which being the greateſt Honor that could be confer'd by ſo Great a King on ſo Valiant a Warior, it is not to be doubted, but he always punctually obſerved. I have taken notice of theſe Paſſages, as well to divert as inſtruct the Reader, that he may obſerve not only the Martial Genius of that Age, but alſo the generous Temper of this Prince, who would own and reward true Valor, even in an Enemy.

The King's Speech and noble Preſent to the Lord De Ribemont.

But to return to matters of greater importance: The [1] King before he left Calais, turn'd Sir Americ de Pavia out of the Caſtle, and put the Lord Beauchamp in his room; for tho what the late Governor had done had proved for his advantage, yet He did not know but he that would perjure himſelf to an Enemy, might at one time or other do the like to his Prince; and the French [2] Hiſtorians tell us, that their King was ſeverely revenged upon him ſome time after: for being taken by certain French Men about St. Omers, he was firſt degraded of his Knighthood, and then, his Tongue being cut out for his Perjury, hanged and diſmember'd as a Traytor. When the King had ſettled his Affairs on that ſide the Water, He returned into England with the Chiefeſt of his Priſoners, and was received with great Joy and Triumph at London.

Sir Americ de Pavia is diſmiſſed from being Governor of the Caſtle of Calais, and why.

What the King did the reſt of this year after his return, our Hiſtorians give us no perfect Account, and therefore I ſuppoſe little happen'd worth noting; but that the [3] Parliament it ~~ſummon'd to meet~~ on the Quindene of Eaſter (which fell out on the twenty third of April this year) was ~~twice~~ again prorogued, which was [illegible] sine die and not to meet till further notice. becauſe of the Plague that raged ſtill in England, to the deſtruction of a great many People of all Qualities, tho chiefly of the meaner ſort, who periſhed not only in London, but in moſt of the Cities and Towns in England; for the particular Account of which I refer the Reader, who deſires to look into ſuch melancholy Relations, to our Author [4] Henry de Knighton, as alſo to Stow's Chronicle: but to paſs to ſomewhat more diverting.

The Plague raging in England, the Parliament is prorogued.

I am ſorry that I cannot agree with the Learned [5] Mr. Aſhmole's Account, who fixes the firſt Inſtitution and Feſtival Solemnity of the moſt Noble Order of the Garter to the twenty third of April this Year: For [5] Hiſtory of he Garter, . 185.

For I confeſs [1] Dr. Brady's Objections againſt the holding of this Feaſt this Year are very conſiderable, ſince it appears by the ſaid Writs abovemention'd, that the Parliament being prorogued by reaſon of the Peſtilence, it is not likely the King would then ſend Heralds to almoſt all the Kingdoms of Europe, to invite all Noble Perſons who delighted in Martial Exerciſes, to ſhew their Skill and Strength in tilting at this Solemnity; however, the Model of this famous Order might be then contriv'd, and the main Rules of it agreed on, tho the Feſtival Solemnity of it was not celebrated until the next Year. I ſhall ſay no more of this Glorious Order, but refer the Reader to the Author abovemention'd, who hath wrote a moſt elaborate Work concerning it; and therefore ſhall only obſerve, that the end and deſign of this Inſtitution was truly Noble and Generous, being worthy of that Great Prince who contriv'd it: For it was not only to adorn Martial Vertue by ſplendid Robes and rich Jewels, but alſo to engage them by a ſolemn Oath before God to preſerve and confirm Fidelity, Honour and Courage in the minds of thoſe that were then admitted into it; which Vertues were juſtly look'd upon as the nobleſt Badg and Diſtinctions of all Military Men, and by a ſtrict Obſervation and Performance whereof they could only acquire a great and real Reputation; when not to act juſtly, valiantly and faithfully, was then eſteemed the greateſt Blemiſh and Diſhonour imaginable: And I wiſh that the like worthy Sentiments may ever continue fixed in the Hearts of all the Companions of that Noble Order.

Mr. Aſhmole.

I find nothing elſe worth the noting this Year in domeſtick Affairs; but as for Military, if [2] Knighton may be credited, the Scots were ſo far from being terrified by the late dreadful Mortality in England, that they rather inſulted it, looking upon it as a particular Judgment on the Engliſh; and hoping to gain ſome conſiderable Advantage thereby, invaded the North Borders with a great Force; but before they could make any conſiderable Progreſs, a terrible Plague fell among them (I ſuppoſe got by Infection in the Places where they quarter'd) inſomuch that ſeveral thouſands of them died in a ſhort time, at which being terrified, they made all the haſte home they could; but being overtaken by a ſtrong Body of the Engliſh Militia, they were totally routed, and a great number of them ſlain: and the reſt that eſcaped carried home the Plague into their own Country, where it raged to as great a degree as it had done in other Places.

The Scots invade England during the Plague, but being infected with it, many die, &c.

I ſhall now give a ſhort account of the Deceaſe of ſeveral Perſons of note, that died of this Sickneſs: [3] for beſides the Lords Wake and Faukonberg, with ſome other Barons, there deceaſed no leſs than three Arch-Biſhops of Canterbury within one Year, viz. The firſt was [4] John Stratford, a Prelate of great Learning and Conſtancy; the ſecond John Ufford, the King's Chancellor, a Perſon of a Noble Family, who yet cannot properly be reckon'd in the Catalogue of Arch-Biſhops, becauſe being only ſo Elect, he died within ſix months after it, without ever being conſecrated; and was ſucceeded by Thomas Bradwardin, called for his deep Knowledg in Divinity, Mathematicks, and other Sciences, Doctor de Profundis, who died of the Plague within two days after he came to London, and within five

As to foreign Affairs, tho France had lately received great Misfortunes, yet this Year its Territories were augmented by the addition of a conſiderable Dominion to it; for [1] Humbert the laſt Prince or Dauphin of Viennois being tired out with the continual Attacks of the Duke of Savoy, and highly afflicted at the Death of his only Son, made over his Principality ſome Years ſince to the King of France for a Sum of Mony, upon condition that after his Deceaſe it ſhould be incorporated to the Crown of France, and that the King's eldeſt Son ſhould always bear the Arms and Title of Dauphin: and this Year he confirm'd the ſaid Contract, and then retiring to a Convent, profeſs'd himſelf a Jacobin Frier, and being immediatly ordain'd a Prieſt, was a few days after made a Biſhop by the Pope, under the empty Title of Patriarch of Alexandria. ^

Yet at laſt by the Prayers and Interceſſion of the Cardinals, it was agreed, that certain Commiſſioners from both Kings ſhould enter upon a Treaty of Peace, to be held from the time that this Treaty ſhould end, unto the Month of September following; by which, if then a final Peace could not be concluded, that the Crown of France ſhould be brought by the conſent of both Parties, to a certain convenient Place within that Realm, and there without any other Trial or Appeal, the Right thereof ſhould be decided by a pitch'd Battel. But in Bretagne, notwithſtanding this Truce, the War was ſtill carried on between the two Ladies, the Counteſſes of Blois and Montfort, with various ſucceſs, and ſometimes very unfortunate to the Engliſh: For [1] this Summer Sir Thomas Dagworth, who had formerly perform'd ſuch great things in that Country, was unhappily kill'd, tho our Hiſtorians differ about the manner as well as the time of his Death. Nor was the Truce much better obſerv'd in Gaſcoigne: for the [4] Earl of Lancaſter, then Lieutenant General of that Province, having received great Provocations from the French by ſeveral hoſtile Actions, was reſolved no longer to endure it; and therefore being accompany'd by the Lord Stafford and divers other Noblemen, he marched with an Army of about thirty thouſand men into the French Territories, and [5] meeting with no Enemy able to reſiſt him, in about ten days time he took more than forty Towns and Caſtles, and with Fire and Sword ſpoil'd the Country for above forty French Miles Southward; and at laſt he came to Tholouſe, which he ſummon'd either to ſurrender, or come forth and give him Battel. The Lord Beaumanoir being much provok'd at the Incurſions which Sir Richard Bramber an Engliſh Governor had made upon his Quarters, challeng'd him to fight thirty men againſt thirty, at a certain Day ſtated; upon which they met, and fought with great obſtinacy, till at laſt Sir Richard Bramber being ſlain, it ſo diſcouraged his Companions, that the Engliſh were worſted, and moſt either kill'd or taken Priſoners, tho they behav'd themſelves very gallantly, eſpecially two Knights, Knolles and Calverly, and an Eſquire called Craucort. This Combat was ever afterwards reckon'd ſo famous, that it was called the Battel of the Thirty.

[3] MS. Chron. Col. S. Ben.

Yet the moſt remarkable Action which happen'd this Year in relation to England, was That perform'd by the King Himſelf at the beginning of the Summer, in a Fight at Sea: [2] For the Spaniards being now by the French Artifices fallen out with England, had, under the Conduct of Charles de la Cerda their Admiral, enter'd the Britiſh Seas with a Fleet of forty Men of War, where meeting certain Engliſh Merchants that then lay in the Harbour of Sluice laden with Wines (lately brought from France) the Spaniards fell upon them, and either took or ſunk them all; and beſides this did many other Miſchiefs to the Engliſh Merchants upon the Coaſts of England and France. Upon notice of which the King being very much incens'd, preſently got ready a good Fleet of about fifty Men of War, beſides ſmall Veſſels, and [3] was attended by his Son the Prince of Wales, and the Earls of Warwick, Northampton and Salisbury, with divers others of the braveſt Barons of England; who with their Retinues made a conſiderable Force, beſides the King's own Archers and Men of Arms. He took ſhipping at Sandwich, and preſently ſail'd out to encounter the Spaniards; and on the nine and twentieth of Auguſt in the morning they met with them in their return near Winchelſea; and then began a cruel Fight between the two Fleets: Tho the Spaniſh Ships being higher built, had at firſt ſome advantage, by the ſhooting of Arrows and caſting other things upon their Enemies; yet by the force of the Engliſh Archers, who ſhot ſo thick upon the Spaniards, that they could ſcarce ſtand on the Deck, as alſo by the Bravery of the Engliſh Seamen and Men at Arms, when they came once to grapple and board the Spaniſh Ships, they had ſoon the better of them. The Fight laſted from Morning till dark Night, when they were forc'd to caſt Anchor, expecting a new Engagement the next day: But to avoid this, the Spaniards thought it beſt for them to ſail off in the night, and leave ſeventeen, or, as others relate, above twenty Ships in the hands of the Engliſh, who loſt no Perſons of note, but only Sir John Goldesborough, a young Knight of great Valour, and comely Shape, and who was no leſs lamented by the King than he was by the Prince his Son, to whom he was very dear, as being about the ſame Age with him, and had the ſame warlike Inclinations. Thus did this Great Prince ſeek all Occaſions, as well by Sea as Land, to expoſe his Perſon, not only to get Glory, of which He had enough already, but to defend the Nation from foreign Enemies, that would have inſulted it; and He ſeems ſo much to have valued Himſelf on that account, that on the firſt Pieces of Gold He ever coin'd, we find his Figure repreſented in the middle of a Man of War, with a drawn Sword in his Hand.

Anno Dom. MCCCL.

A little before the Sea-fight, [1] Philip King of France deceaſed on the twenty ſecond of Auguſt, after He had been not much above a Year married to the Daughter of the King of Navarre, a young Lady with whom he was much taken, tho perhaps it did not very well agree with his Age and Conſtitution. On his Death-bed He gave very good Advice to his Son, and the reſt of the Princes of the Blood, as that they ſhould preſerve Concord among themſelves, and make a Peace, if it could be obtain'd; to obſerve good Order and Juſtice, and to eaſe the People in their Taxes, with other excellent things, which Princes on their Death-beds do more often recommend to their Succeſſors than practiſe themſelves in their own life-times. This Prince was very brave in his own Perſon, yet more fortunate in Treaties than in Battels: He was very ſevere to his People, ſuſpicious, revengeful, and often ſuffer'd himſelf to be too much tranſported by his Paſſion. This is a modern French Hiſtorian's Character of Him, which being very juſt, I have tranſlated without ſcarce altering a word.

As for Eccleſiaſtical Affairs, the moſt conſiderable was, that [3] Pope Clement the Sixth, that He might ſee a Jubilee in his own time, and alſo gain a good Sum of Mony by the Indulgences then to be granted, (being the fiftieth from the firſt Jubilee inſtituted by Pope Boniface the Eighth) ordain'd another to be celebrated at Rome on the 25*th* of March this Year, and ſo for every fifty Years for the time to come. But [4] King Edward wiſely foreſeeing, that a great Sum of Mony was like to be drawn out of the Nation by ſo many People's flocking to Rome upon the account of Indulgences, expreſly forbad all Perſons from going thither.

As to the ſecond Article, relating to the Truce, it was anſwered, that the King of France had often acted Hoſtilities during the Truce upon the Lands of the King of England treacherouſly, to the deſtruction of his People, and contrary to the Conventions contain'd in the ſaid Truce. And as to the third Article concerning the Proviſors, it was anſwered, that the King would graciouſly receive all Clergymen making uſe of the Papal Proviſion, who were of good capacity, and worthy of Promotion, but not others. And with this Anſwer the Pope's Nuncios return'd, without doing any thing conſiderable in the buſineſs for which they came.

The King toward the end of the laſt Year having need of the Advice of his Parliament, [1] had on the five and twentieth of November before iſſued out his Writs for one to meet on the Octaves of our Lady's Purification; and from [2] thence, becauſe many of the Lords were not yet come up to Town, it was adjourn'd until Friday the 15th of February following, at which day the Lord Lionel, the King's Son, with many Noblemen, being aſſembl'd in the painted Chamber, the King's Commiſſion was read, authorizing him to hold the Parliament during his Majeſty's Abſence, who it ſeems was now gone upon ſome Progreſs or Expedition, which our Hiſtorians do not mention. Then the Parliament was again adjourn'd till Tueſday following, when the King being return'd, they again aſſembl'd. Sir William de Shareſhal the Lord Chief Juſtice, in the preſence of the King, Lords and Commons, declar'd that the cauſe of their Summons was, firſt, becauſe the King, having in the two and twentieth Year of his Reign held a Parliament, was then hinder'd from continuing it, as alſo from calling another, by reaſon of the late dreadful Plague, until this time: Alſo that the buſineſs of his Wars required their concurrence, becauſe the Peace was not punctually obſerv'd, and many domeſtick Matters were likewiſe to be taken into conſideration, for that Labourers refuſed to do their Service at the reaſonable and uſual Rates; and laſtly, becauſe the Treaſure of the Realm was exported. The Cauſes of the Parliament being thus opened, the King by the ſaid Chief Juſtice commanded the Commons to conſider and adviſe what was beſt to be done to redreſs theſe Evils.

The Statutes of Labourers and of Proviſors now made.

In obedience to which, and for the remedying of exceſſive Wages of Labourers, and all ſuch Artificers, there was then enacted that remarkable Statute, entitul'd de Servientibus, of the five and twentieth of this King, which the Reader may find in our printed Statute-Books, tho it be now obſolete: And it was then alſo enacted, that every man that purchaſeth any Proviſions of Abbies or Priories in the Court of Rome, both he and his Executors, &c. which do ſue and make Execution of ſuch Proviſions, ſhall be out of the King's Protection; and that a Man may do with them as with Enemies of the King and his Realm.

Beſides the King's Anſwers to the Petitions of the Commons (for which I refer the Reader to [1] Cotton's Abridgment) there were ſeveral things done, tho of leſs moment, that yet deſerve our notice, particularly the advancement of ſome Noblemen to higher Titles; for in [2] this Parliament the King promoted Henry Earl of Lancaſter to be Duke of the ſame Place, as an acknowledgment of the great Services he had perform'd for the Crown. But this was done by the general Conſent of the whole Parliament, and he was inveſted by the Cincture and a Sword, with Power to hold a Court of Chancery in the County of Lancaſter, and there to iſſue out Writs under his own Seal, as alſo to hold Pleas concerning civil Cauſes ariſing within that Dutchy. This deſerves ſomewhat more our conſideration, becauſe it is commonly beleiv'd, that Lancaſter was not advanced to be a County-Palatine till the time of King Henry the Fourth; yet this is certain, that as Prince Edward, by being created Duke of Cornwal ſome years before, was the firſt Duke that ever had been in England; ſo the Duke of Lancaſter was the ſecond that was advanced to that Dignity, which was afterwards beſtowed upon John of Gaunt, and the other Sons of King Edward the Third.

The E. of Lancaſter is made a Duke.

At the ſame time alſo the [3] Lord Ralph Stafford, for his great Services done the Crown, was in this Parliament advanced to the Title of Earl of Stafford, with a Penſion of one thouſand Marks, till the King could provide Lands of that value to ſettle on him and his Heirs.

The Lord Stafford made Earl of Stafford.

We ſhall now ſay ſomewhat of the Affairs of Scotland. [4] The King had the laſt Year ſent the Biſhop of Durham, and the Lords Stafford, Piercy and Nevil, his Commiſſioners, to treat with the Lord Robert Stuart, and other Nobles of that Kingdom, at York, concerning the delivery of King David out of Priſon, and making a firm and final Peace between the two Nations. But theſe Commiſſioners not being able to come to a Concluſion, after a tedious Treaty, K. David thereupon growing impatient of his Impriſonment, reſolv'd to return home, and try if he could perſuade his Nobility to raiſe his Ranſom, and agree to ſome other Terms of Peace with the Engliſh: So that upon his own offer he agreed with King Edward, that upon the delivery of the Lord John Stuart, Son and Heir to the Lord Robert, with ſeveral other young Noblemen as Hoſtages for his Return, in caſe the Treaty did not take effect, he was to be ſet free. In purſuance of which, the King granted Letters of Safe-Conduct for the Hoſtages, with Power to certain Commiſſioners to receive them, and to take King David's Oath for his Return, in caſe no concluſion were made. [5] This Commiſſion bears date 5*th* of September An. 25. of Edw. 3. and was to continue in force till the Quindene of Candlemas next following; and on the 3*d* of November it was again renew'd till the end of July next following; by which time the Hoſtages being come, according to the Agreement, and diſpos'd into the Caſtles of York and Nottingham, King Edward thereupon ſent his [6] Precept, dated the 5*th* of October, to Sir John Copland High Sheriff of Northumberland, to deliver the ſaid King to the Biſhops of Durham and Carliſle, the Earl of Northampton, the Lords Piercy and Nevil, or any two of them, to put him into the hands of his own Subjects, upon the conditions agreed on. As to foreign Affairs, the Truce was but ill obſerv'd this Year in France, each Nation taking what advantage they could upon the other: [1] For Sir John Beauchamp Governor of Calais finding the ways to that Place much infeſted by the French, marched forth of the Gariſon with three hundred Men at Arms, and two hundred Archers on Horſeback, and took much Booty in the adjoining Country for ten Leagues together; but in his return he was encounter'd by the Lord of Beaulieu with a Brigade of two thouſand French-men; which Lord notwithſtanding he ſlew, and had doubtleſs routed all his Company, but that before he had compleated the Victory, another ſtronger Party of the Enemy came upon him; ſo that he himſelf and twenty more Knights of England were taken Priſoners, almoſt all the reſt of his Men being ſlain; but Sir John and his Fellow Priſoners were ſoon redeemed, and ſent into England.

But for the preſent he was ſucceeded by [2] Sir Robert Herle ^ Captain of Calais, who [3] being recruited with a ſelect Body of Men commanded by the Lord Manny, marched forth into the French Territories, and having done a great deal of damage in the Neighbourhood, came off not only without loſs, but with a large Booty of Oxen and other Cattle; inſomuch that a fat Ox at Calais would hardly yield ſixteen Pence Sterling.

[4] About Eaſter King Edward ſent over thither the new Duke of Lancaſter, who ſoon after marching out of Calais along by the Sea-Coaſts of Artois and Picardy, burnt the Suburbs of Boulogne to the very Walls, and made an Aſſault alſo upon the Town it ſelf, but could not prevail, becauſe the Scaling-Ladders which he brought with him were too ſhort: However he fired all the Veſſels in the Haven, and then advanced along as far as Eſtaples on the River Chanche, which having plunder'd, he took a Compaſs to return back on the Right-hand, [5] where he did the like to Fauquenberg, and after that to Terouenne; only here many of his Men were hurt by the Townſmen, who fled into the Church, and from thence made a gallant Reſiſtance, till that alſo was taken, and the French-men for the moſt part put to the Sword. In the Havens of theſe Towns he fired above a hundred Veſſels of all ſorts, and then went on burning all about up to Arques, and the Gates of St. Omers; and having ſufficiently made known the Terror of his Arms, he return'd triumphantly with many Priſoners and much Booty to Calais. But ſoon after the occaſions of the late breach of the Truce between the two Kings being fully concerted, a further Truce was enter'd into with this condition, that either of the Kings might renounce it upon notice, whenever He pleaſed.

This Year alſo the late Differences with Spain were again compos'd, and a [6] Truce was concluded between Pedro King of Caſtile, and the King of England for ~~ſeveral~~ twenty Years; ſo that a free Trade and Commerce was again renewed, which had been for ſome time interrupted.

[7] Froiſ. c. 153.

But in Gaſcogne the King's Affairs met with various Succeſs; for to look back a little, on the firſt of April, before the laſt Truce was renew'd, the [7] Lord Guy de Neſle, Marſhal of France, march'd in a hoſtile manner with a great number of Men at Arms, ſpoiling and ravaging all Xaintogne as far as the Town of St. John d' Angely; but was at laſt met by Sir Walter Bently the King's Lieutenant, and Edmund Rous, a Norfolk Man, and Captain of the Caſtle of that Place, who with their Followers, making in all but ſix hundred Men at Arms, beſides Foot, encounter'd him valiantly, and had ſuch Succeſs, that they ſlew and routed the whole Body of the French, took Priſoners Sir Guy de Neſle himſelf, and Sir Arnold d' Endreghan, together with the Lord William de Neſle, the Marſhal's Brother, and ſix other Knights of Quality, and of Eſquires and Gentlemen about one hundred and forty. ~~Yet in~~ September ~~following~~ the French recover'd the Town and Caſtle of St. John d' Angely, after it had been poſſeſs'd by the Engliſh five Years, without one Stroke given or taken: For the Gariſon being left very thin, and without Proviſions, was fain to yield up the Place on reaſonable Conditions, becauſe they had not wherewithal to ſubſiſt. But it is time to return into England.

yet I find that not long after a truce between Edward King ~~of England~~ & John of France ~~[illegible]~~ was again renewed for one whole year to commence from the 11th day of Septemb to the 12th ~~[illegible]~~ of the same month in the ensuing year as appears by the Instrument concerning the Articles of it under the Seals of the [illegible] of Huntingdon and other commissioners therein named [illegible] King of ~~France~~ [illegible] date between Calais and Guisnes Sept 11. and was also proclaimed in Engl not long after as appears in Rot. The late notorious Breach of the Truce by the French in Gaſcogne, gave King Edward an occaſion to reſolve to renew the War upon France; and to that end, He had already iſſued out [1] Writs bearing date the fifteenth of November, for a Parliament to meet on the Feaſt of St. Hilary, or thirteenth of January following; but by reaſon that ſeveral of the Lords were not then come to Town, [2] it was adjourn'd for five days longer. When the Lords and Commons were aſſembl'd, the ſame [3] Sir William Shareſhal Chief Juſtice, who had declared the Cauſes of the laſt Parliament, was order'd to do the like in this, being to the ſame effect as had been done before: As firſt, he ſet forth the Uſurpation made by the late Philip of Valois in his ſeizing of the King's Rights and Poſſeſſions in Gaſcogne and other Places, and making an unjuſt War in thoſe Countries, beſides other Miſchiefs both by Sea and Land. Then he proceeded to ſet forth what had been done in former Parliaments by their adviſing the King to procure Allies abroad; ſince upon their promiſing to aid him with their Bodies and Goods, He had enter'd into ſuch Alliances, and made War upon his Adverſary, for He could not otherwiſe have a reaſonable Peace: And tho the King had often made Truces with Him, yet during thoſe Intervals, he intending to deceive and be too hard for the King, had broke them every way, proſecuting his Malice againſt Him and his Allies; and that ſince his Deceaſe, his Son John continuing the ſame Wrongs his Father had begun, had poſſeſs'd Himſelf of the Kingdom of France, and contrary to the laſt Truce confirm'd and ſworn to by both Kings, had already violated it in Gaſcogne and Bretagne, as alſo by Sea; and had lately ſent to the Scots to continue the antient Alliance made between the French and them, for the Deſtruction and Subverſion of the King and People of England.

Then at their[1] next appearing, Sir William charged the Commons on behalf of the King, that, to ſhorten their ſtay in Town, and for the quicker diſpatch of theſe matters, and others that might be laid before them by the King, they would immediatly go together to ſome Place at Weſtminſter, and chuſe four and twenty or thirty Perſons out of their whole number, to be on the morrow in the Painted Chamber, that the King might ſend thither to them ſome Great Men, to confer with them upon the buſineſs aforeſaid.

Then[2] on Friday all the Commons came before the Prince and the other Great Men, in the White Chamber, where Sir Bartholomew Burgherſh gave them an account of the Malice and Falſhood of the King's Adverſary of France; how He had broke the laſt Truce, which he declar'd much after the ſame manner as he had done at their firſt Meeting; and that the ſaid Adverſary, by all the ſubtile Contrivances his Council could invent, ſtill endeavour'd every where to diſturb the King and his Subjects; and therefore he ſaid, that the Commons ought diligently to adviſe what might be the beſt way for the King to oppoſe and check the aforeſaid Malice and Falſhood, for the Safety of Himſelf, his Kingdom and Subjects. Then preſently after this Declaration, Sir William told the Commons, if they had any Petitions of Grievances, or for the amendment of the Laws, they ſhould bring them into Parliament; and alſo acquainted the Prelats and Lords, that they were to attend the buſineſs of all Perſons, and of Petitions, in the Places where they were uſually aſſigned.

[3] Then the Commons held a long Conſultation with the * Community, or Body of the Peers, concerning the granting an Aid, whereby the King might oppoſe the Malice of his Enemy; and at laſt came to this reſult, to ſhew before the King and the Great Men in Parliament, that the Common People of the Land were much impoveriſh'd by the late mortal Peſtilence, as alſo by many other Burdens, Taxes, Taillages, and Payments that had been laid upon them: But yet notwithſtanding theſe Miſchiefs, they having regard to the neceſſary Defence that ought to be made for the Safety of the Nation againſt the violent Malice of the Enemies thereof, delivered to the King in full Parliament a Roll containing as well the Aid, which they had intirely and with one accord granted, as the Petitions concerning the Commons of the Land, to which they prayed the King to give a good and quick Anſwer. Whereupon He granted their requeſt, and thanked them for the Great Aids given Him before, and for that now gr[illegible]d, and for the Good-will which He had always found in his Commons before, and alſo now finds in this Affair.

To which the King's Anſwer was; [1] 'That as to Tax and Taillage, 'tis not the Intention of the King, or the Great Men, that they ſhould ever be charged without their conſents: And as to granting their other reaſonable Petitions, the King is pleas'd it ſhould be done.

Alſo, [2] that whereas the Juſtices aſſigned in divers Counties have judged many Men, that were arraign'd before them as Traytors, for divers cauſes not known to the Commons to be Treaſon; therefore the King by his Council, and by the Great and Wiſe Men of the Land, would pleaſe further to declare the Points of Treaſon in that Parliament. But to add ſomewhat of private Concern. In [3] this Parliament the Lord John Mattravers, who was thought to have had a hand in the murther of King Edward II. having ſome years ſince come in, and ſubmitted himſelf to the King's Mercy, and lately receiv'd his Pardon, now petition'd the Parliament to have it by them confirm'd; which in conſideration of his late faithful Service to the King in Flanders was granted accordingly, and he was again reſtor'd to his Honor and Eſtate, which had been long ſeiz'd in the King's hands.

The Pardon of the L. Mattravers confirmed in Parliament.

Before we leave this Parliament, I cannot but take notice that the diligent Abridger of the Records, which paſſes under the Name of Sir Robert Cotton, very well [4] obſerves, That there is an Error in the Clerk that entred the Rolls of this Parliament, under the laſt Year or Twenty fifth of this King, which could not be, for then this Parliament being held at the Feaſt of St. Hilary, muſt have been before the laſt, ſince this King begins his Reign from the firſt of January, and ſo there would not have been above a Month's time between the holding of this, and the beginning of the former Parliament: which was impracticable, beſides other ſufficient Reaſons, that you will find in the place above-cited: and further, the Writ of Summons on the Cloſe-Roll already mention'd, bearing date on the 15*th* of November in the 25*th* year of this King, for a Parliament to meet at the Feaſt of St. Hilary following, which was in the 26*th* of his Reign, muſt relate to this Parliament, and no other. I have taken notice of this, to let the Reader ſee, that there may be Errors ſometimes (tho very rarely) in the Parliament Records themſelves, which may notwithſtanding be corrected either by other Records, or the Hiſtory of the Time.

The Error of the Parliament Clerk corrected

I find nothing more as to our own Affairs worth taking notice of, only that [5] about the beginning of Auguſt, the Chief Staple, or Market for Engliſh Wool, was ſettl'd at Weſtminſter, by order of the King and his Great Council; where it continued for ſome years, till it was re-removed by the ſame Authority to Calais, to the great diſcontent of our Engliſh Merchants.

In Scotland King Edward's Affairs this year had various ſucceſs: For King David, who had been permitted to return home for a time, to try to raiſe Mony for his Ranſom, and alſo to perſuade his Subjects if poſſible to own the Superiority of the King of England over Scotland, found them inclinable enough to the former of theſe Demands; but as for the other, they plainly told him, That they would not upon any terms be ſubject to the Engliſh: upon which King David, not being able to perform that for which he went, return'd into England about the beginning of April, as appears by a [1] Commiſſion bearing date the 28. Martii, which was ſent to the Sheriff of Yorkſhire, to conduct the Scottiſh Hoſtages to Berwick, to be there 15 days after Eaſter, that being the day prefix'd for his return to that Town; from whence he went to London, and for ſome time remain'd a priſoner in England as he was before.

The Governor of Calais gets the Caſtle of Guiſnes, by corrupting the Deputy Governor.

But as to France, we ſhall find the Truce to have been very ill obſerv'd on both ſides: For King Edward was even with the French for taking the Caſtle of St. John d'Angely the laſt Year, ſince he now became Maſter of a Place of a much greater Conſequence, for the ſecuring his laſt Conqueſt of Calais; it was the Caſtle of Guiſnes (lying within five miles of it) the Head-Town of a County of the ſame Name, and being very ſtrong, was a great Bridle to the Gariſon of Calais; ſo that they could not go out to Forage on that ſide: and this King Edward got poſſeſſion of upon very eaſy Terms, and with no great difficulty, it being ſurpriz'd in this manner. [2] The Governor of Guiſnes being then at Paris, had left the care of it to Sir William Bauconray his Deputy; and the Governor of Calais laying hold of this Opportunity, having corrupted the ſaid Sir William, had the Caſtle betray'd to him for a ſum of Mony. Upon the taking of this Caſtle in time of Truce, when Complaint was made of it by the French King's Envoys to King Edward, his Anſwer was, That Philip his Father, by attempting to purchaſe Calais in that manner, had taught the Engliſh Commanders, that Buying and Selling was no Breach of the Truce.

K. Edward's witty Anſwer when it was complain'd of.

Villani gives ſomewhat a different Account of the taking of this Caſtle.

But [3] Villani, the Florentine Hiſtorian, gives a different Account of the Taking of this Place; as that it was not betray'd but ſurpriz'd on the ſudden, by the means of an Engliſh Soldier; tho the Story is related at large in Stow. Lancaſter, an Engliſh Archer, being a priſoner in that Caſtle, found means to eſcape to Calais, where giving ſome of his Comrades notice of a certain low Wall that ran croſs the Ditch for the uſe of the Fiſhermen, and was cover'd with not above two foot of Water, by which it was eaſy to get into the Caſtle, and ſurpriſe it; upon this Diſcovery, about thirty or forty ſtout Fellows, his Comrades, combin'd together to put this Deſign in Execution; who getting over the Ditch by this low Wall, ſcal'd the Walls with certain Ladders they brought with them for that purpoſe, and killing moſt part of the Gariſon, made themſelves Maſters of the Place, which was afterwards delivered up by the ſaid Lancaſter to King Edward's Order, who new fortified it, and therein put a good Gariſon, and ſo it afterwards became a ſtrong Frontier on that ſide. Which of theſe Relations is the trueſt, I will not diſpute; but the French Hiſtorians all agree, that it was betray'd; and, as a confirmation of it, further relate, that the Deputy-Governor who betray'd the Place, being ſometime after taken by the French, was for his Treaſon condemned at Amiens to be torn in pieces with Horſes.

[1] But the French by this Action looking upon the Truce to be broken, not long after revenged this Loſs in a great meaſure, cutting in pieces about two thouſand Engliſh, who had march'd from Calais as far as St. Omers to plunder the Country.

The L. Charny ſeizes on a Nunnery, and from thence he ſeizes the Caſtle of Guiſnes.

Soon after the taking of this Caſtle, the French being reſolv'd to recover it, the Lord de Charny, being newly ranſom'd from his Impriſonment, marched about Whitſontide with twenty thouſand Men into the Engliſh Territories, and ſeiz'd upon a Nunnery called La Baſtie, lying within a Bow-ſhot of the Caſtle of Guiſnes: this Place, tho the Engliſh had ſpared to fortify it out of pure Devotion, yet the French being Maſters thereof, removed the Nuns to another Cloiſter, and fortifying this, put a Gariſon into their very Church; and having gain'd this advantageous Poſt, which commanded the Caſtle of Guiſnes, they lay'd cloſe ſiege to it; from whence, tho the Beſieged made frequent Sallies upon the Enemy, yet they had little or no effect towards raiſing of the Siege, till at length the Gariſon of Calais joyning with thoſe of Oye, Marque and Hammes, made up a conſiderable Body of Men, with which falling upon the French at unawares in their Trenches, routed them, and kill'd a great many, and having raiſed the Siege, ſet upon the new Fort of La Baſtie, took it, and, diſmantling the Walls, level'd it to the Ground. And thus was the ſtrong Caſtle of Guiſnes, with the County belonging to it, ſecur'd in the Engliſh poſſeſſion.

[2] About the ſame time King Edward kept his Whitſontide in great Splendor at Weſtminſter, being attended by the Chief of his Nobility; and thoſe of France and Scotland that were then Priſoners, were ſplendidly entertain'd at that Solemnity. And eſpecially Count Charles of Blois, who was a near Kinſman to Queen Philippe, by whoſe Interceſſion he not long after obtain'd his Liberty.

The War in Bretagne carry'd on with good ſucceſs, and the Marſhal de Neſle routed by Sir Walter Bently, &c.

But we will now look into France, where we find that the War in Bretagne was ſtill carry'd on for the Advantage of the Engliſh Intereſt; [3] for the Lord Guy de Neſle, Marſhal of France, being now at Liberty, hoping to repair the loſſes he had ſuſtain'd, rais'd this Spring a conſiderable Army in Bretagne, where about the middle of Auguſt he was again valiantly encountred by Sir Walter Bently, Sir Robert Knolles, and other Engliſh Captains, near Mauron, between Rennes and Ploermel; and after a long and doubtful Fight, from four in the afternoon till it was dark, the Engliſh being but three hundred Men of Arms, and ſix hundred Archers, the French tho above four times their number, were utterly diſcomfited, ſlain or taken priſoners; the Chief of whom was the Marſhal de Neſle their General, together with thirteen Lords, above one hundred and forty Knights, and as many Eſquires, and five hundred Men of Arms, beſides common Soldiers that were not number'd; as alſo above one hundred and thirty Lords and Knights, as appears more at large from Sir Walter Bently's own Relation to the Lord Chancellor of England, ſet down at large in [4] Robert Aveſbury's Manuſcript Chronicle. This proved a great blow to the French Intereſt in thoſe parts, and was not to be eaſily repair'd.

Certain Noblemen of Bretagne come over to treat about the delivery of Count Charles.

[1] Soon after this Defeat, certain Noblemen of Bretagne, who took part with Count Charles of Blois, came over into England with Letters of Safe-Conduct, to treat of a Peace between the King and their Lord, who was ſtill a Priſoner in England; as alſo concerning his Diſcharge, which was concluded on theſe Conditions: That the Earl upon payment of forty millions of Florins in part of his Ranſom, ſhould have his Liberty to return home, leaving his Sons as Hoſtages for the remainder. And there was that expectation of a perfect Reconciliation between the King and him, that a Treaty of Marriage was now alſo ſet on foot between his eldeſt Son, and one of the King's Daughters; upon the Concluſion of which, Count Charles was quietly to enjoy the Dutchy of Bretagne. But this came to nothing, by reaſon of the freſh Hoſtilities that were committed [2] by Count Charles when he was at Liberty, againſt King Edward's Forces in the Iſle of Jerſey, whom ſome time after landing he defeated, and took poſſeſſion of the place for himſelf; which treacherous dealing ſo far incenſed the King, that he broke off all further Treaty with him.

Yet all further Treaty is broke off, by reaſon of the Count's ſeizing the Iſle of Jerſey.

This Iſle is called in our Author the Iſle of Triſtrem, but why I know not.

The Duke of Bavaria arrives in England, and marries the D. of Lancaſter's Daughter.

In the mean while in England, there was nothing but Feaſting and Jollity; for [3] William Duke of Bavaria, Son to Lewis the late Emperor of Germany (and in Right of his Mother, Earl of Hainault, Holland and Zealand) came into England, and by the King's Leave married the Lady Mathilda, Eldeſt Daughter to Henry Duke of Lancaſter, and the Relict of Ralph Eldeſt Son of the Earl of Hartfort, who dying three Years before, left her a Beatiful Young Widow. The Duke her Father was then travelling towards Pruſſia, to make War againſt the Heathens in thoſe Parts; but being taken Priſoner in Germany by the ſecret Practice of Otho Duke of Brunſwick, [4] he was forc'd to redeem himſelf by paying three hundred Scutes of Gold for his Liberty; ſo that before he could be diſcharg'd, there was a Truce made in Pruſſia, between the Chriſtians and the then Infidel Pruſſians; whereupon he was fain to return homeward with ſome Regret: But this Expedition begot a mighty Quarrel between the Duke of Brunſwick and him, which was like to have ended in a ſingle Combate, of which I ſhall give you a ſhort Account.

[5] The Duke of Lancaſter being in his Return, firſt inform'd by a certain Knight at Cologne, that it was the Duke of Brunſwick who had thus caus'd him to be arreſted, took an opportunity to complain of this Action before the Marqueſs of Juliers and other Noblemen, as they walked together in the great Church of that City; ſaying, That ſuch a diſhonorable Treatment of a Stranger and Nobleman that never injur'd him, was unworthy the Duke's Honor and high Quality; which words being not long after related to him, by ſome that were there preſent, he took it for ſo provoking an Affront, that preſently after the Duke of Lancaſter's Return into England, he ſent him a Challenge in writing under his Seal, wherein he affirm'd the Words ſpoken of him were falſe, which he offer'd to make good by fighting with him Body to Body, either between the Caſtle of Guiſnes and St. Omers, or elſewhere as the King of France ſhould appoint. the King his Maſter, as alſo a Safe-Conduct from the French King, went immediately over to Calais, and being met at Guiſnes by the L. de Clermont, Marſhal of France, with a Noble Retinue of Men at Arms (whom King John had ſent for that purpoſe) he was by them conducted to Paris, where he was honorably received by the King, as alſo by his Kinſman the young King of Navar: and his Adverſary the D. of Brunſwick being now alſo arrived, a Day was appointed for theſe two Noble Combatants to fight it out before the King of France and his Principal Nobility; then the Liſts being ſet out in the Field call'd Le Pré aux Clerks, without the City (an innumerable multitude of People being preſent) both the Dukes came into the Field compleatly armed, and according to the Cuſtom of that time were to fight on Horſeback, with their Swords and Lances. When all the Ceremonies uſual in ſuch caſes were perform'd, and the Combat was juſt ready to begin, whether Duke Otho's Heart fail'd him, or that his Conſcience told him his Quarrel was not juſt, I will not determine; only that upon his ſhewing ſome ſigns of Fear and Confuſion, he was adviſed by his Friends to withdraw his Challenge, and to ſubmit his Quarrel to the Judgment of the King of France; which the Duke of Lancaſter, being full of Hopes and Courage, at firſt refuſed, ſaying, That he was ready to defend the Juſtice of his Cauſe; and that it would be a high Reflection both upon himſelf and the Engliſh Nation, if he ſhould now depart without performing what he came thither for. But for all this the Duke of Brunſwick utterly renounced his Quarrel, and refuſed the Combat, reſolving wholly to ſubmit himſelf to the Arbitrament of the King of France; to whom tho that Duke was more acceptable upon account of his having eſpouſed the French Intereſt, yet the Engliſh Duke did not want Friends; for he had the King of Navar, the Earl of Flanders, and divers others of the principal Nobility to abet his Cauſe, who told him that upon his Adverſary's renouncing the Quarrel and departure out of the Field, he might without any loſs of Honor quit it alſo. After which the King at a great Entertainment, by the help of his Nobles, partakers on both ſides, reconciled theſe two Dukes, and took up the Quarrel between them for ever.

Which is accepted by the D. of Lancaſter, who thereupon goes into France to fight him.

The Liſts being ſet out, and the Combat ready to begin, the D. of Brunſwick declines it, and offers to ſubmit to the Judgment of the Fr. King.

Which the D. of Lancaſter refuſes.

Yet at laſt the King undertakes to reconcile them.

I have been the more particular in this Tranſaction, that the Reader may obſerve how jealous Men of the higheſt Quality were in thoſe days of any Word or Action, that might reflect upon their Honor; and tho they thought it lawful to do it by ſingle Combat (eſpecially between Princes who did not own each other's Authority) yet did they not ſpill each other's Blood in private Duels, but openly before their own Prince, or ſome Other as was agreed between them, who were to give Judgment which of the Parties were vanquiſhed. But to conclude this Story, the French King was ſo taken with the Noble Carriage of the Duke of [1] Lancaſter, that He offered him a very great Preſent of rich Jewels; yet he would accept of no more than one Thorn from the Crown which (was then believ'd) our Savior wore at his Crucifixion; which our Author tells us he afterwards beſtowed upon the Abby of Leiceſter. Then the Duke having taken his Leave of the King of France, return'd into England a little before Chriſtmas, and was kindly receiv'd by the King, and all his Royal Relations.

Having nothing of greater moment wherewith to begin this Year, I ſhall make ſome Obſervations on the Weather. [2] This Winter prov'd ſo extreme cold, that the Froſt continued from the ſixth of December till the twelfth of March, about which time it was broke by a furious Hurricane or Tempeſt of Wind, the like whereof had not been ſeen in England; for it tore up the Roofs of Houſes and Leads of Churches, overthrew Mills, Walls and Trees to the Ground, and did very much miſchief in ſundry Places: Beſides which there happen'd after it an unuſual Drought, ſo that from the beginning of March to July little or no Rain fell upon the Earth, whereby all manner of Seeds being loſt, there enſued a great Dearth of Fruits, Corn, and other Grain; inſomuch that England, which was commonly before ſufficient for it ſelf, was now fain to ſeek Aſſiſtance from other Countries; which being made known to William Duke of Bavaria, and Earl of Hainault, he out of his hearty Love to the Engliſh Nation, ſent ſeveral Ships laden with Wheat to London, to the mighty refreſhment of the People; [3] and ſoon after there were alſo great Supplies of Corn brought from Ireland, which being diſtributed into the Inland Parts, prevented a Famine, that would otherwiſe have happen'd.

The Cheſhire men ſubmit, and are ſeverely fin'd, and the Ring-leaders puniſh'd.

About this time the Cheſhire men committed ſome great Inſurrection or Riot [4] upon the Servants or Officers of the Prince of Wales and Earl of Cheſter, tho the occaſion I do not find in my Author; only that the King being extremely incens'd againſt them, and reſolving to make them ſubmit to Law, or to the Sword, ſent forth Sir Richard Willoughby and Sir William Shareſhal, his Juſtices Itinerant at Cheſter, and at the ſame time order'd ſufficient Forces under the Command of the Prince his Son, attended with other Lords, to go down and prevent any Inſurrection that might happen upon that account. But when the Cheſhire-men found they were in fault, and that there was no contending againſt ſo great a Force, they ſubmitted themſelves, and compounded with the Prince for a Fine of five thouſand and ſixty Marks, upon condition that the Juſtices in Eyre ſhould not ſit among them: But when they believ'd themſelves wholly acquitted, the Juſtices ſat anew by the Statute of Trayle-Baſton, whereby they levy'd a great deal of Mony by Fines, &c. and many Lands and Tenements were ſeized into the Prince's hands; whereupon he returned into the South Parts.

the Parliament was adjourn'd till the ſeventh of October, [1] when the Prelats and Lords being again aſſembl'd in the White Hall, the Commons were called up, and Monſieur Bartholomew de Burgherſh, Lord Chamberlain, told them, that the King, thinking how He might beſt eaſe his People, that had been often charged with Impoſitions, and great Aids by reaſon of the War againſt his Adverſary of France, who detain'd his Rights and Heritage of that Crown from him, had ſent lately ſome of the moſt Noble and Excellent Peers of his Realm, viz. the Arch-biſhop of Canterbury, the Duke of Lancaſter, and other Prelats and Great Men, to Guiſnes, to treat with the Deputies of his Adverſary in preſence of a Cardinal, whom the Pope had ſent thither as a Mediator; and that after this Treaty, He had ſent his Confeſſor to the Pope, to let him know, "That conſidering the " many People that had been killed in this War, and deſiring to ſpend " the reſt of his time in another more holy War, to the Honour of " God, if his Adverſary would make reſtitution of the Dutchy of " Guyenne to Him, as intirely as any of his Anceſtors had enjoy'd it, " to hold it freely without any Homage or Service, He would be " willing after the end of the War, to reſign his Title to the Crown " of France. And that the Pope had moreover been deſired to ſound the French Adverſary's Inclinations towards a further Treaty; yet with Proteſtation, that if He ſhould not accept it, all his Rights ſhould be intirely ſav'd to Him, as if no ſuch Offer had been made, of which Meſſage the King not having as yet received any Account from the Pope, He had ſent his Chaplain, Maſter William Wittleſey, Arch-Deacon of Huntington, to know what had been done in this Affair, who brought back nothing worth the reporting.

He deſires a continuation of the Subſidy of Wools, which is granted for three Years longer.

Wherefore it ſeemed convenient to the King and the Great Men of his Council, that He ſhould prepare Himſelf for War againſt his Adverſary, as well for the Defence of England, as to recover his Rights, for which He ſhould have a great Sum of Mony. And the ſaid Chamberlain ſhew'd them further, that the late Tax or Subſidy of Wool, Leather, and Wool-fels, ending at Michaelmas laſt, it was not the King's intention to lay any new Tax or other Charge upon his People; yet He requeſted the Prelats, Great Men, and his Commons, to grant Him the Subſidy of the ſaid Wool, Leather and Wool-fels, for ſome longer time. Upon which Requeſt, after ſome deliberation had been between the ſaid Prelats, Great Men, and Commons, they unanimouſly agreed, and granted to the King the Subſidy of Wool, &c. to receive it as it had been taken formerly, for three years from Michaelmas laſt paſt, if the War ſhould continue ſo long; upon condition, that the Mony ariſing from this Subſidy, ſhould be ſafely kept for the War, and not imploy'd to any other uſe.

But for the better explanation of what had been reported in this Council concerning the Treaty above-mention'd with the French King, the Reader may take notice, [2] that the new Pope Innocent had the laſt Spring ſent Guy, Cardinal of Bologna, as his Legat, to promote a Treaty of Peace between the Kings of France and England: And beſides this Cardinal the Pope ſent divers other Nuncios to both Kings, in order to make a final Peace between them: So that at laſt it was agreed in a Meeting of the Commiſſioners on both ſides, between Calais and Guiſnes, that the King of England ſhould reſign and renounce all the Right He had or claim'd to the Crown of France, transferring it intirely to the French King and his Heirs, in conſideration whereof the ſaid King ſhould receive and enjoy the whole Dukedom of Aquitain, with the City of Calais, and the whole Counties of Artois and Guiſnes, for Himſelf and his Succeſſors Kings of England, without doing any Homage, or making any acknowledgment for the ſame, to the Kings of France, or without holding them in any ſubordinate manner, otherwiſe than He held the Crown of England it ſelf, namely of God alone. To theſe Conditions thus agreed on, King Edward gave his Conſent; and for a firm Concluſion of the Premiſes, Ambaſſadors were to be ſent, as well from Him, as from the French King, to the Pope's Court at Avignon, a Truce being agreed on in the mean while to be kept in England, France, Gaſcoigne and Bretagne, ~~till Easter~~ next enſuing, during which time it was hop'd a full and final Peace would be eſtabliſh'd. But to conclude this Affair, tho ſome of the ſame Perſons abovemention'd were ſent afterwards Ambaſſadors to Avignon, yet all they had now done came to nothing, as you will find hereafter.

England affording us nothing remarkable in the beginning of this Year, we ſhall therefore ſay ſomewhat of the Affairs of France, ſince they had ſome influence over thoſe at home. [1] The King of Navarre, King John's Son-in-law, a Perſon of a ſtrange mixture of good and evil Qualities, being now return'd into France, began to embroil the Kingdom with freſh Troubles; for he again purſued his Pretenſions to divers Earldoms (which were then otherwiſe diſpoſed of) eſpecially to that of Angoleſme, which the King had lately beſtow'd upon Charles de la Cerda of Spain, and then Conſtable, who diſſuaded the King from giving him ſatisfaction in any of the reſt. Whereupon the Navarre Prince retired diſcontented to his Caſtle of Eureux, and knowing the Conſtable was then at his Caſtle da l'Aigle, he undertook an Enterprize as bold as bloody; for carrying along with him about a hundred Horſe-men, he on the 16th of January made a ſudden Aſſault upon it, and taking the Place, murder'd the Conſtable in his Bed; and when he had done thus, had the Inſolence to juſtify the Fact in Letters to the King's Council; and then raiſing men and fortifying his ſtrong Places, he ſollicited the neighbouring Princes to aſſiſt him.

[1] Froiſ. c. 154. Mezeray ad hunc An.

The [2] King was forced to diſſemble his Reſentments, and gave him fair words to bring him to Paris; but he was too cunning to be ſo caught, nor would he come thither till he had got the King's Pardon, and one of his Sons as a Hoſtage for his Safety: And all the Satisfaction he was to make for this, was, firſt to ask his Pardon before the Pope's Legate, and a Parliament of the Peers at Paris; which he did in a ſtudied Diſcourſe, made up rather of Complaints and Excuſes than of Acknowledgments of his Crime. However, the Conſtable had order to arreſt him for Form's ſake, whilſt they conſulted what Sentence to give; ſo he was at the interceſſion of the Queens Dowagers to the two late Kings, declar'd pardon'd and diſcharged, the Legate having firſt made him a grave Admonition, ſetting forth the greatneſs of his Fault.

for which he obtaining his pardon

Yet even this gentle Reprimand ſo exaſperated him, [3] that he preſently left the Parliament, without taking any leave of the King; and making a Journey to Avignon, he lay waiting for the coming of the Duke of Lancaſter and the reſt of the Engliſh Plenipotentiaries, who were expected there to treat of a Peace before the Pope. And that I may put all things concerning this Affair together, I ſhall here farther add, [4] that upon the arrival of the ſaid Duke at Avignon about the beginning of the next Year, he enter'd into a private Conference with him; and after ſome Complaints of ſeveral great Injuries and Damages he had ſuſtained from the King of France, he aſſured the Duke by an Oath, that he would enter into a ſtrict Confederacy with with King Edward; and for the confirmation of it, further promiſ'd, that ſo ſoon as the Truce was ended he would join him at the Iſle of Jerſey with all the Forces he could raiſe: But how well he obſerved that Engagement, you will find in due time.

Another Parliament held, and the Cauſes of it.

We ſhall now return to the Affairs of England, where on the fifteenth of March the King iſſued out Writs of Summons [1] for a Parliament to meet on Monday after the Feaſt of St. Mark, or the eight and twentieth of April following; which being accordingly [2] aſſembl'd in the Painted Chamber, Sir William Shareſhal publickly declared before the King, Lords and Commons, that the Parliament was called for three Cauſes: Firſt, for eſtabliſhing the * Staple within the Realm, and for confirmation of the Ordinances made at the laſt Great Council. Secondly, how they might treat of a Peace with France; for that by War the King ſaw his Subjects greatly waſted: And Thirdly, for receiving of Petitions, and redreſſing of Grievances; all which without a Parliament could not be effectually done.

Sir B. Burgherſh ſhews the King's Proceedings in order to a Peace, and asks their Aſſent.

Then [3] it was further ſhew'd to them another day by Sir Bartholomew Burgherſh, that there were great hopes of Peace between the King and his Adverſary of France, by means of certain Commiſſioners to be appointed on both Parts; yet the King would not conclude any thing without the Aſſent of the Great Men and his Commons. Wherefore he demanded of them on behalf of the King, whether they would aſſent and agree to a Pe[illegible], if it might be had by Treaty?

The Commons Anſwer thereto.

To which the Commons anſwered with one accord, That what Iſſue it ſhould pleaſe the King and Great Men to make of that Treaty, ſhould be agreeable to them. Then the Commons were asked again, if they would aſſent to a perpetual Peace, if it might be had? who all unanimouſly anſwered, † Yea, Yea. Whereupon Maſter Michael Northburgh, Keeper of the Privy Seal, commanded Sir John de Swynely, the Pope's Notary, that he ſhould make thereof a Publick Inſtrument, which was to be carried to Avignon to be laid before the Pope.

But I cannot here forbear obſerving, that Parliamentary Proceedings were not then reduced to that Form and Regularity, as they have been ſince that time; for we find the Commons to have here given their Conſent vivâ voce, and in the preſence of the Lords, to what the King ſhould do. As for the redreſs of Grievances, I do not find any thing then done, and therefore ſuppoſe there were none, but what had been remedied in the foregoing Parliament; yet there were many wholeſome Statutes made, for which the Reader may conſult our Printed Statute-Books, as alſo the Abſtract of them at the end of this Reign.

The former Judgments in Parliament againſt the Lord Mortimer and E. of Arundel revers'd.

As for private matters, all that is worth our noting was, that the [4] Lord Roger Mortimer, Grandſon to the Great Roger Mortimer, who was attainted and executed three and twenty Years before, was now reſtored in Blood, and the Judgment given againſt his ſaid Grandfather was revers'd, as being contrary to Law. The like Favour alſo [5] Richard Fitz-Allen, Son to Edmund Earl of Arundel (who had been attainted in the beginning of this Reign) obtain'd on behalf of himſelf and his ſaid Father. Which Examples may ſerve to ſhew us, that it is the Duty of following Parliaments to correct and reverſe whatſoever hath been unjuſtly and too ſeverely enacted by thoſe that preceded.

The Ambaſſadors appointed by the King for this purpoſe were ſome of the moſt noted for their high Quality or Learning, as [2] William Bateman Biſhop of Norwich, Michael Biſhop of London, Henry Duke of Lancaſter, Richard Fitz-Alan Earl of Arundel, ~~the Lord~~ Sr Guy Brian, ~~with ſome others, whoſe Names I do not find~~. Theſe being accompany'd by many Perſons of Quality, and a magnificent Retinue, went to Avignon about the latter end of this Year, where they arriv'd upon Chriſtmas-Eve, being met without the City by ſeveral Cardinals, Biſhops, Noblemen, and others ſent by the Pope, who alſo Himſelf received them with great outward kindneſs and civility, tho like a true French-man He prov'd much more inclinable to the Intereſt of France than that of England in this Treaty, as you will find by and by.

To this Propoſal the Earl of [4] Armagnac, the Duke of Bourbon, and the reſt of the Ambaſſadors of France could return no other Anſwer, but by downright denying and retracting all that had been agreed on at that Treaty, altho divers of them there preſent had ſolemnly agreed to theſe Articles under their Seals, in the preſence of the Cardinal of Bolognia. The Sum of what theſe Ambaſſadors alledg'd for their juſtification was, "That they would gladly have a Peace, if it might "be upon equal Terms; but as for the cutting off Aquitain with the "other Territories demanded to be held without any Homage or "Dependence on France, neither their King nor they themſelves "could give their Conſents, that they ſhould by any means be wholly alienated from their former Dependance on the Crown of "France; ſince the King and they themſelves had already ſworn to "retain them in the ſame ſtate they now were, to the utmoſt of their "power: yet if the King of England would renounce his Pretenſions, and ceaſe to bear the Arms of France, they were content "that the Feudatory Dominion of the ſaid Dutchy and Territories "ſhould remain to King Edward after the ſame manner as his Anceſtors had held them, viz. ſaving the Sovereignty of France over "the King of England and his Heirs, who ſhould do Homage for "them.

To theſe new and unexpected Demands the Duke of Lancaſter reply'd in the Name of the reſt, “ That as for the Oath whereby “ they pretended to be ſo ſtrictly bound never to alienate thoſe Pla- “ ces from their Subjection to the Crown of France, they might ſoon “ for the ſake of Peace be by his Holineſs abſolved from it: And “ ſince the King of England their Maſter had ſo good a Right to the “ whole Kingdom, He was reſolved freely and abſolutely to enjoy, “ and have fully reſtor'd to Him, that part of it which was indeed “ his own already; otherwiſe that both the Title and Arms of France “ which He had already taken, He would never relinquiſh for the “ fear or pleaſure of any man living. Neither was it reaſonable that “ He ſhould do Homage to that Perſon over whom by Hereditary “ Right He claim'd a Superiority; yet if they would propoſe any “ more equal and reaſonable Terms of Agreement, and would be “ more conſiſtent with themſelves, and conſtant to their own Con- “ ceſſions than they now ſeem'd to be, the King their Maſter, as a “ Lover of Peace, would be ready to embrace them. To which the French Lords in a heat reply'd, “ That if they had nothing elſe to “ propoſe, their King and all good French-men were both ready and “ able to defend their Country againſt the Engliſh for ever. And ſo they offer'd to riſe up and be gone; but thro the Mediation of the Pope and his Cardinals, their Heat was ſomewhat qualified, and at laſt they agreed ſo far, as that the Truce ſhould be prolonged until Midſummer following; and in the mean time the Pope promis'd to do his endeavour to promote the Peace, and would for that end again ſend his Nuncios to both Kings, to require them to diſpatch other Commiſſioners to propoſe ſome Conditions of Peace that might prove more equal and acceptable to both Parties.

But in the mean time [1] all the Pope could do, was to perſuade the preſent Ambaſſadors of both Crowns to conſent to prolong the Truce till Midſummer following, and ſo they broke up for that time. Then [2] the Duke of Lancaſter (having with ſome difficulty eſcap'd the Snares the French had laid to ſurprize him) returned with all the reſt of his Company into England, except [3] William Bateman Biſhop of Norwich, who died at Avignon: He was a Prelat very well skill'd in the Canon and Civil Laws, and founded Trinity Hall in Cambridg for a Seminary for Profeſſors in thoſe Faculties.

[4] T. W. Aveſbury ad hunc An. The Engliſh Hiſtorians are more expreſs in their Relations of this matter.

This is Froiſſart's Account of this Tranſaction; but our [4] own Hiſtorians are more plain and expreſs in this matter, and ſay, that when the Ambaſſadors of England appear'd before the Pope, in hope He would confirm the former Treaty at Guiſnes, it all came to nothing thro the Fraud and Deceit of the French, and the ſecret Favour and Connivance they found from his Holineſs Himſelf. Which is very probable, ſince we do not find by any Author, that He any ways ſeemed concern'd at the French Inconſtancy, or blam'd them for departing from what they themſelves had already agreed to. And this will appear much plainer, if Polydore Virgil's Relation of this Affair be true (tho I know not from what Author he had it) that the Pope having heard the Allegations of the Ambaſſadors of each King, and found they both required that which was indeed indiviſible, to wit, the French Crown; his Judgment was, that both Kings ſhould for the future deſiſt from making War upon each other, ſince they had already done ſuch Miſchiefs, as might ſufficiently warn them from falling into the like again. And tho Polydore may be out in the former part of his Relation, that King Edward inſiſted then upon no leſs than the whole Crown of France, yet the other part of it might be true enough, that He enjoyn'd both Parties to lay down their Arms, until He could decide the Controverſy between them; which was indeed to give the Advantage to the French King, who detain'd thoſe Rights from King Edward, that could never be recover'd but by the Sword.

The French take little notice of this Tranſaction, and the reaſon of it.

The French Hiſtorians both Antient and Modern, take little notice of this great Tranſaction before the Pope, becauſe I ſuppoſe not making for their King's Advantage; only [a] Du Cheſne ſlightly touches it, and ſays, That the Ambaſſadors of France and England having met this Year before the Pope, about the Concluſion of the Peace between their Maſters, the Treaty broke off, becauſe the Demands of the Engliſh were ſo unreaſonable: but omits that which was certainly urged by them at that time, viz. That thoſe Demands were no more than what had been already agreed on at a former Treaty near Calais. As for all our Hiſtorians near that time (as well in Print as in Manuſcript) they agree, that the Year before there was a Concord or Agreement concluded between the Kings of England and France, and that confirm'd by Oath, which being reduced into certain Writings Indented, there wanted nothing but their putting their Seals to them; by which King Edward was freely to enjoy all his Lands in Aquitain, on condition He would renounce all his Right and Claim to the Crown of France. But how this Treaty came to break off, I need not repeat; but ſhall only give you the Authority of an Antient Manuſcript Author in the Vatican Library at Rome, cited by [b] Odoricus Rainoldus, who expreſly lays the breaking off this Treaty to the King of France: the Paſſage is to this effect, That in the time of this Pope Innocent, Guy Cardinal of Bolognia, by the conſent of the Pope, and at his own deſire, went into France, to treat of a Peace between the ſaid King of France and Edward King of England; for the concluſion of which Treaty, the Duke of Bourbon with other Ambaſſadors on behalf of the King of France, and the Duke of Lancaſter with others on behalf of the King of England, came to Avignon in the Sixth Year of this Pope, to finiſh and compleat thoſe things, which had been already ordain'd and agreed to before by the ſaid Cardinal, concerning the Peace between the two Kings; but when they came before the Pope, they could not agree, ſo that their Ambaſſadors went away in diſcord from the Court to their ſeveral Countries: and this was done thro default of the King of France (as was commonly ſaid) He then denying thoſe things which had been treated on, and Sworn and Sealed to by ſome of thoſe very Ambaſſadors, in the preſence of the ſaid Cardinal, by the French King's conſent, and that of his Council; to which our [c] Author adds as follows. "What dreadful Slaughters King John "brought upon himſelf and Country, by thus revoking the Articles "of Peace made with the Engliſh Commiſſioners, will appear hereafter, "ſince now the War broke forth afreſh, whereby France was embroi-"led for ſo many Years.

the four and twentieth Year of his Age, ſhould paſs over into Gaſcoigne, there to carry on the War againſt the French King; but of this I ſhall ſpeak further by and by.

An Account of the great Fray at Oxford between the Townſmen and Scholars, of whom many were kill'd.

In the mean while, for want of Affairs of greater moment, I ſhall give you an Account of the great Quarrel, that happened in the beginning of this Year between the Scholars and Townſmen of Oxford, in which many of the former were killed; the occaſion of which was, [1] That on the Tenth of February, certain Scholars came to a Tavern called Swinſtock, which was then and is ſtill the Sign of the Mermaid, at Quatervois (from the Four Ways or Streets that meet there, now corruptly called Carfaix) where not liking their Wine, they called the Vintner and ask'd for better; but he inſtead of complying with their deſires, gave them rude and ſawcy Language, with which they being provoked, one of them ſtruck the Pot about his Ears; whereupon he ran down, and not only rais'd his own Servants but all the Neighbours, who came into his Aſſiſtance: ſo that in a ſhort time great part of the Town, reſolving to make it a general Quarrel, rang out the Bell of St. Martin's (then, as now, the Town-* Church) whereupon the Chancellor of the Univerſity went to them, and did his endeavor to perſuade them to be quiet, promiſing them all reaſonable Satisfaction: but when nothing would do, and that he and thoſe that were with him were ſhot at by their Arrows, he cauſed the Univerſity Bell of St. Mary's to be rang alſo; and then the Scholars and Townſmen being armed with Bows and other Weapons, had a Scuffle, until Night parted them. But as yet no great harm was done; but the next day, the Countrymen near Oxford, to the number of about two thouſand, came in to the Aſſiſtance of the Townſmen, with a black Banner born before them; whereupon the Scholars fled to their Colleges and Halls, but the enraged Multitude breaking into ſome of the weaker Houſes or Hoſtels, ſlew many of them whom they flung into their Bog-houſes, and then tore and deſtroy'd their Books and Writings, and carried away their Plate, and what elſe they pleaſed; and there were the Names of more than eight and twenty Univerſitymen ſlain and wounded, not long after given into the Biſhop of Lincoln, beſides thoſe who being ſecretly buried, were reckon'd at near forty more.

The Townſmen break into their Houſes, kill many of the Scholars, and deſtroy their Books and Writings.

The King upon complaint of this Riot ſeizes the Liberties of the City.

On Complaint of this Riot, the King (then at Woodſtock) ſeized the Liberties of the City; the greater part whereof were afterwards granted to the Univerſity, which they enjoy to this day: however for that time the Univerſity was in a manner diſſolved, all Scholars (except thoſe of Merton College) going to their Friends and Relations, where they continued for a Year or two after. In the mean while the Biſhop of Lincoln interdicted the City from having any Maſs ſung in it before the Layety, and the King ſending his Juſtices thither to ſit upon this Riot, there were [a] divers both of the Scholars and Townſmen Indicted, and John Bereford the Mayor with the two Bayliffs were committed Priſoners to the Tower, who being alſo turn'd out, a new Mayor and Bayliffs were choſen; and the High Sheriff of the County was alſo diſcharged, and another put in his Place, becauſe he had not come in to the Aſſiſtance of the Scholars as he was required. But to put an end to this troubleſome Affair the Iſſue of it was, That the Univerſity reſign'd her ſelf and Privileges into the King's Hands, and the Townſmen did the ſame; but much more particularly, for they did not only do that, but by a Solemn Reſignation ſurrender'd up all their Liberties, Perſons and Goods moveable and immoveable, with their Guilds or Companies, and all their Rights, entirely to the King's Diſpoſal; and this they did (as they confeſs in their Surrender) becauſe if they ſhould be proceeded againſt by any way of Law, and a ſtrict Examination of their Cauſe, it would tend to their greater Confuſion and Puniſhment, &c.

The Univerſity and Town both reſign their Privileges into the King's hands, and ſubmit to His Majeſty's Judgment.

Theſe [a] Surrenders being made before the Biſhop of York and Wincheſter, and others of the King's Council, were accepted of by the King; and as for the Univerſity, He, upon a full Hearing, dealt very graciouſly by it, and pardon'd all that the Scholars had done, either in the ſaid Tumult or before, as his Letters Patents teſtify, bearing date the Twentieth of May, and ſtill extant among the Archives of that Univerſity. But as to the Townſmen, it did not go ſo well with them; for tho ſeveral of the Nobility interceded for them, yet this matter held until the Seventeenth of July following, and then the whole was again ſolemnly heard before the King's Council at Weſtminſter: they having conſideration of the Premiſes, to avoid the Decay and Ruin that might otherwiſe enſue to the ſaid Town, made this final Concluſion betwixt the Parties, "That the Commonalty of the ſaid Town ſhould be bound to pay to the Maſters and Scholars damnify'd in the ſaid Tumult, for Amends and Reparation of their Injuries, and Loſſes ſuſtained (Death and the Maim excepted) Two hundred and Fifty Pounds Sterling; beſides their Goods taken away were forthwith to be reſtored: this Mony was to be pay'd to the ſaid Chancellor, Maſter and Scholars by the Feaſt of St. James's, or elſe ſufficient Sureties given for the Payment thereof at certain Terms, as the Parties ſhould agree upon: in Conſideration whereof, the Perſons impriſon'd were releas'd upon Bail, until the next Seſſions of Goal-Delivery, on condition, that the ſaid Sums of Mony be pay'd, or Surety be put in for the Payment as before; or elſe the Bodies of the ſaid John Bereford and John Norton were to be return'd to Priſon, within three Days after the Feaſt of St. Peter ad Vincula or Firſt Day of Auguſt, there to remain in manner as before they did. And it was further agreed by the Deputies of the Univerſity, That all Townſmen who were Indited for ſuch Felonies and Tranſgreſſions above-mention'd, ſhould yield themſelves to the King's Priſon, to be try'd by Law, and all others that were now impriſon'd ſhould be let out, upon ſufficient Bail, that they would appear to be try'd by Law at the next Seſſions of Goal-Delivery. This was the Subſtance of the Order or Sentence of the Council, which I ſuppoſe was punctually obey'd.

He pardons the Scholars by his Charter.

The whole matter again heard before the King's Council, and their final Sentence againſt the Townſmen.

I muſt alſo take notice, That to this Day the Mayor and Sixty three of the Burgeſſes of Oxford, are oblig'd to come to St. Mary's Altar or Communion-Table, on the Feaſt of St. Scholaſtica the Virgin, or Tenth of February (the Day on which this Riot and Murther was committed) and there to offer at the High Altar Sixty three Pence, which were antiently appointed for ſo many Maſſes to pray for the Souls of ſo many Scholars as were then found to be killed in this Tumult. But I do not find this to have been any part of the above-recited Sentence of the King's Council, and therefore ſuppoſe it to have been ſome time afterwards impos'd upon them by the Biſhop of Lincoln, before they could be abſolv'd from his Excommunication; otherwiſe it is not probable, that the Mayor and Aldermen would ever have ſubmitted themſelves voluntarily to ſo mean an Acknowledgment. But I ſhall nowreturn to Matters of more Publick Concernment.

A little after Whitſontide, or about the end of May, when the Truce between the two Kings was near expiring, they began again to put themſelves into a poſture of War; and King [1] Edward to ſecure his Territories in France, reſolv'd in a great Council at London to ſend over the Prince his Son, as his Lieutenant into Aquitain, with a thouſand Men at Arms, and fourteen hundred Archers; and in order thereunto, the King iſſued three ſeveral [2] Commiſſions to the Prince all of the ſame Date; by the firſt of which he made him his Lieutenant of that Province, and all other Places in France, whither he ſhould happen to march for the Recovery of his Territories poſſeſs'd by the Rebels: A ſecond gave him Power to make Leagues and Alliances with all Perſons of what Degree ſoever, to retain Men into his Service and pay them: The third was to give him Authority in the King's ſtead to receive the Homages and Fealties of the Nobility and others within the ſaid Dutchy of Aquitain. ⅄

The Prince ſets Sail for France with his Forces.

Then there being got ready a ſufficient [3] Navy to tranſport the Prince and his Forces, he, attended by the Earls of Warwick, Oxford, Salisbury and Suffolk, ſet Sail from Plymouth on the laſt of June, being bound for the River of Garonne. But whilſt they purſue their Voyage, we will look into France, and ſee what the King of Navarre has acted there in purſuance of his late Agreement with the Duke of Lancaſter at Avignon. In the [4] beginning of this Year, he ſent over (among others) his Uncle Giles of Champagne to the Duke with Letters, earneſtly beſeeching him to come ſpeedily into Normandy to his Aſſiſtance, and to receive his Oath of Fidelity, to ſerve King Edward againſt all Men. Then the Duke by the King's Order muſter'd up a good Fleet of forty Sail, which was got ready at Rutherhive (now Redriff) furniſh'd with three Months Proviſions; the Duke of Lancaſter being to go Admiral, and alſo Chief Commander of a great many choice Men at Arms and Archers, yet the Place for which they were bound was kept ſecret. But tho he ſail'd from Greenwich on the tenth of July, yet the Winds continuing in the Weſt or Southweſt, he did not arrive at Sandwich till the fifteenth of Auguſt, and got with great difficulty as far as the Iſle of Wight; [5] where (as ſome Authors relate and [6] further appears on Record, that) the King Himſelf with his Son the Duke of Clarence and John of Gaunt, went on Board the Fleet not in a publick manner but privately, without any State, becauſe it ſhould not be commonly known: then they ſet Sail for the Iſles of Guernſey and Jerſey, where He was to meet the King of Navarre, and ſettle all points for carrying on the War againſt the French King; but after the Fleet had lain cruiſing thereabout for ſome time, waiting for the King of Navarre, and he failing in his Promiſe to come thither at the time appointed, and the Winds proving contrary and tempeſtuous, the whole Fleet return'd back to Portſmouth; and the King and his Sons went on Shore, and ſtay'd there till He receiv'd certain Intelligence (about the middle of October) of the King of Navarre's Reconciliation with his Father-in-Law of France; and that if the Engliſh went over thither, they they ſhould be treated as Enemies. Thereupon the Duke return'd to the King, but the Men and Fleet were reſerved for another Expedition, that was preſently after undertaken.

But to give a more ſatisfactory Account of the reaſon of this Failure of the K. of Navarre in his Oath and Promiſe, ſo ſolemnly made: you are to take notice, [1] that when K. John and his Council ſaw that his Son in Law had now got together a good Body of Men, which he had chiefly brought from his own Kingdom, and that he had fortify'd divers Places in his Territories in Normandy, and thence began to ſpoil the adjacent Country, and was juſt ready to give the Engliſh Footing in it; they thought it high time to make the beſt Terms with him they could: and Charles the Dauphin knew ſo well how to ſweeten him, that by complying with moſt of his Demands, He for the preſent ſeemed ſatisfied, and diſbanding his Forces, accompany'd the Dauphin to Paris; but it was impoſſible long to hold or oblige ſo fickle and inconſtant a Prince, as you will find the next Year.

But however the King of France, to prevent any Deſcent of the Engliſh [2] into Normandy, had already diſpos'd his Forces in ſeveral Places and Ports along the Coaſt: but they lying there moſt part of this Summer, burthened and waſted the Country almoſt as bad as the Enemy; till at laſt, all the Forage and Proviſions being conſum'd, they were forc'd to march off; inſomuch that when King Edward ſhortly afterwards landed in thoſe Parts, the French King had no Forces there able to oppoſe Him.

Pr. Edward marches with his Army from Bourdeaux, and over-runs all the French Territories.

Prince Edward, being arriv'd in Gaſcogne, after He had ſpent ſome Months in ſettling the Affairs of that Country, and increaſing the number of Forces He had brought over with Him: [3] on the 5th of October marched from Bourdeaux, attended by the Earls that came along with him, as alſo by Sir Bartholomew Burgherſh, the younger, Son to the King's Chamberlain (who was then lately dead) together with the Lord Liſle, and ſeveral other Barons of a like Martial Temper. The Army was drawn up in three Battalions, and conſiſted in all of about ſixty thouſand Men; ſo that notwithſtanding the Earl of Armagnac, Lieutenant for the French King in thoſe Parts, and Gaſton Phœbus Earl of Foix, with other Chief Noblemen of France, commanded a greater Army, yet durſt they not encounter the Prince in the Field, either for fear of him, or (as Mezeray ſoftens it) out of Jealouſy of each other: wherefore the Prince finding no oppoſition, over-ran all the Country at his pleaſure as far as Beziers and Narbonne, taking and deſtroying very many ſtrong Towns and Caſtles; all which are particularly enumerated by * Sir Thomas de la More; tho the Names of the Places are ſo corruptly written, as one cannot well tell what they were; for which cauſe, as alſo for the dryneſs and prolixity of the Relation, we think better to omit it: but by a [4] Letter of Sir John Wingfield's, who was in this Expedition, written to a Nobleman of England, it appears, that the Prince and his Army then burnt and deſtroy'd the Town of Plaiſance in Rovergne, together with the Country round about; as He did alſo in the Counties of Eſterac and Cominges, where He took and burnt the great Town of St. Bertrand. The like they did in the County of Lille, marching thro which, they paſſed the River Garonne above Tholouſe, but left that City, becauſe the Conſtable of France and the Count de Clermont were there with a Potent Army. Then paſſing into the Country of Carcaſſone, they burnt the City that bears the ſame Name; and going from thence to Narbonne, they did the like to that City; ſo that the King of France had never receiv'd a greater loſs, during all the War, of Cities and good Towns, which yielded Him conſiderable Revenues, than by this Expedition. The King took with Him in this Expedition two of his Sons, viz. Lord Lionel of Antwerp Earl of Ulſter, and Lord John of Gaunt now Earl of Richmond; the former then in the Seventeenth Year of his Age, and the other in the Fifteenth; together with Henry Duke of Lancaſter, the Earls of Northampton and Stafford, and Sir Walter de Manny, with many Young Noblemen and Gentlemen.

And diſſuades K. John from coming to a Battle, whereupon King Edward returns to Calais.

[2] Then on the Firſt of November, the King having heard that his French Adverſary with his Army was come to St. Omers, marched towards that City with all his Forces; but when He was arrived between Guiſnes and Ardres, [3] there came to Him the Marſhal D'Endreghan, the Lord Bouciquault and others from King John, that under pretence of diſcourſing him, they might take a full view of all his Forces; and accordingly they return'd with ſuch a Report of his Strength, that the French King was now determin'd not to hazard a Battle with Him, but rather to retreat before him breaking the Bridges, and gathering up or deſtroying all ſorts of Proviſions, that ſo the Engliſh might be forced for want thereof to return back for that time. Which Deſign had that Succeſs, and K. Edward was ſo ſtreighten'd thereby, that after He had ravaged and deſtroyed Bolognois, as far as the Town of Heſdin, which he could not take; He was obliged to return to Calais, His Army havin drank nothing but Water for three Days together, and all other Proviſions being extreme ſcarce. Here the French [4] Writers from Froiſſar (for I am reſolved to diſſemble nothing) ſay, That King John by th Marſhal D'Huthain and certain other Knights, offer'd King Edwar either to fight Him Body to Body, or Army to Army, whenſoever H Himſelf ſhould appoint; but that K. Edward declin'd the Offer, and ſ went home again for England. This ſeems very improbable, becau King Edward was not now many Years older, nor leſs Valiant tha when He challenged this King's Father to a ſingle Combat; and i plainly appears by the French King's Retreat at firſt, that He declin' fighting. action better deſerves our Credit, viz. that on the eleventh of November after the King's Return to Calais, the Conſtable of France and others met the Duke of Lancaſter, the Earl of Northampton and Sir Walter Manny, at the end of the Cauſway of Calais, and by Letters of Credence from their King, offer'd Battel to the King of England on Tueſday following: Then the Engliſh Lords anſwered by their King's Command, that it was His Intention, as much as He could, to avoid the effuſion of Chriſtian Blood; and therefore deſired to fight Body for Body with his Adverſary, ſo as the whole Right to the Crown of France might be decided by this Battel between them two: And if this was not approv'd of, that each of them ſhould take to Him his eldeſt Son; and if He lik'd not that, then both to chuſe two, three or four Knights, the neareſt to them in Blood, to be join'd with them and their Sons, that ſo the Right to the Kingdom of France might be finally determin'd, and that He who was conquer'd ſhould yield it to the Conqueror. Which Offers the French refuſed, ſtanding to their Propoſal of giving Battel on Tueſday. The Engliſh offer'd to fight the next day, or Saturday: The French ſtill perſiſted in their firſt Offer, which the Engliſh accepted, upon condition, that if the French could not bring their King to a Battle on that day, they ſhould render themſelves Priſoners to the King of England; as in like manner they would render themſelves Priſoners to the King of France, if they brought not then their King to conſent to a Battel on that Day. But the French Conſtable refuſed this Offer, and the Engliſh Lords thought they only trifled with King Edward, that by delay and putting him to great Expences, He might be weary of the War. The King ſtaid and expected the French all Tueſday, but none of them came. This Relation deſerves our notice, as being not only more probable, but is alſo written by an Author of that time; and the Reader may uſe his Judgment in the choice which to believe, either our Engliſh or the French Hiſtorians, whoſe beſt Authority is that of Froiſſart, who, I confeſs, ſeldom writes to the diſadvantage of King Edward or his Cauſe. But this is moſt certain, that the [1] Engliſh Noblemen then with the King, ſeeing that the French had no intention to fight, as they at firſt pretended, but only by delays to ſpin out time, and put their Maſter to charges, thereby to make both Him and them weary of the War, adviſed Him to think of returning home: So that all that could be further done at preſent was, the ſtriking up a ſhort Truce between the two Kings, to continue till Eaſter. However the King ſtaid till the 17*th* of November, when having paid all the Strangers that came to his aſſiſtance their Wages, and ſeeing there was no more to be done on that ſide the Water, He embark'd for England, being incited to make the more haſte, by reaſon of what the Scots had lately acted againſt Him during his Abſence.

Gentlemen, whom they kept Priſoners in order to a Ranſom. Then early the next morning before day the Scots (encouraged by this Succeſs) approached the Town of Berwick, and when the Watch was aſleep, ſet their Ladders to the Walls, and mounted and enter'd the Place: Thoſe few Engliſh whom they found awake and able to reſiſt, they fell upon and ſlew, tho not without loſs to themſelves of divers Knights and Officers, whoſe Names it were needleſs to relate. But tho the Scots thus ſurprized the Town, yet they could not take the Caſtle, becauſe the Bridg being drawn up, the Gariſon had quickly notice of what they had done; ſo that it held out till King Edward could come to their relief, which He did with all poſſible ſpeed as ſoon as ever He came out of France, and could hold a Parliament at Weſtminſter [1] on the 12th of November, or Monday after the Feaſt of St. Martin, according to the Summons that had bin iſſued juſt before his laſt going over.

Wherein Sir Walter Manny declares the Succeſs of the King's Affairs.

This Parliament [2] having bin by reaſon of the King's abſence, and ſome other Cauſes, put off by ſeveral Adjournments till the five and twentieth of November following, they were then told by Sir William Shareſhul the Chief Juſtice, that it was his Majeſty's pleaſure, that Sir Walter Manny ſhould declare to them the preſent State of the King's Affairs, as being beſt able to do it, and which he did to this effect. He firſt gave them an account of the late Treaty before the Pope, and how it had been broke off thro the fault of his Adverſary of France: Then he proceeded to the Negotiation that had been between the King of Navarre and the Duke of Lancaſter at Avignon, to meet the ſaid Prince at Jerſy, and of the reaſon of the failure of that Deſign. Then Sir Walter concluded with a ſhort Relation of the King's late Expedition into France, and the Iſſue of it, as it has been already related, and the reaſon of his ſo ſpeedy Return.

Sir W. Shareſhul requires the Commons to conſider how to ſubdue the Scots, and attain a Peace with France.

After this Relation, [3] Sir William Shareſhul ſpake again to them, and required the Commons to weigh and conſider the King's unwearied conſtancy in labouring for their Defence, and that He was now ready to repel the Inſolence of the Scots, who had lately ſurprized the Town of Berwick (as News had been then brought to Him) and he willed them alſo forthwith to adviſe, how He might be the beſt enabl'd, not only to gain a compleat Victory over that ſtubborn People, but alſo how to attain an advantageous Peace with France, which He greatly deſired for His own Honour, and their Quiet and Benefit: and then gave them time till Friday following to give in their Anſwer, and in the mean while to prepare their Bills and Petitions, and to bring them into Parliament. On which day the Commons came into the Preſence of the King, the Prelats and Great Men, into the White Chamber; and after a ſhort Conference with them, unanimouſly granted the King the Subſidy on Leather, Wool, and Woolfels for ſix years next coming; ſo that during that time the King ſhould not put any other Impoſitions or Charges upon the Commons. And then they brought their Petitions before the King, who returned His Anſwers to them, which together with the Statutes that were then made, I need not here recite. I have no more to add concerning this Subſidy or Cuſtom upon Leather, Wool, &c. only that it was ſo conſiderable, that Rob. Aveſbury obſerves, that upon a juſt calculation the King could could during theſe ſix Years expend more than a thouſand Marks every day in the Year.

The Parliament being ended, the King goes for Scotland.

When the Parliament had thus diſpatch'd the King's Buſineſs and their own, they broke up about the end of November, ſo that it did not hold above four or five days; and as ſoon as it was over King Edward having got ready his Forces, took his Journy for Scotland, and reſted not till He came to Newcaſtle upon Tine, where he kept his Chriſtmas. ✗ but ~~before~~ when he ~~went~~ arrived at Durham, he sent out writs to the sheriffs of York [illegible] Derby, Lincoln and Leycestershire to make proclamation, that all men [illegible] arraying from 16 ~~years~~ [illegible], should be ready with [illegible] their [illegible] for said [illegible] renunciation [illegible] Rot. Anno Dom. MCCCLVI.

The King arrives before Berwick, and lays cloſe Siege to it.

The Scots ſurrender it on Conditions.

So ſoon as that Solemnity was over, He[1] departed thence with his Army to Berwick, and came thither the fourteenth of January; and his Navy being alſo arrived, He beſieged it both by Sea and Land, and the Caſtle ſtill holding out for him, He enter'd with his Guards, deſigning to let down the Draw-bridg, and aſſault the Town that way, while the Army from without ſhould attempt the Walls. Sir Walter Manny, (who arrived there ſome time before the King) was alſo at the ſame time imploy'd in ſpringing a Mine by certain Miners he had brought out of the Foreſt of Dene, thereby to get entrance that way, if Force ſhould fail. Upon this the Scots within being terrified with theſe dreadful Preparations, and ſeeing it impoſſible to hold out againſt ſuch powerful Forces, and ſuch various Attacks, began to capitulate, deſiring only to be ſecured of Life, Limb and Liberty, and they would forthwith yield up the Town; which Conditions the King accepted, and they marched out accordingly. But [2] the Scotiſh Hiſtorians (who ſeldom fail to write for the advantage of their Country) relate, that when the Scots within the Town heard how King Edward was coming in Perſon to its relief, they diſmantl'd the Walls, ſet fire on the Town, and ſo made their eſcape with all the Spoil they had gotten, which is not at all likely, ſince our Hiſtorians give us ſo many pregnant Circumſtances to the contrary, that it is improbable it ſhould have been otherwiſe than as they write.

The King marches further into Scotland.

However King Edward being now repoſſeſs'd of the Place, having left behind him ſufficient Forces both for the defence thereof, and to repair what was wanting in the Fortifications, [3] marched with his whole Army further into Scotland, reſolving (if poſſible) to reduce that Nation entirely to his Subjection. [4] Whilſt he continued at Roxburgh, King E. Baliol, who attended Him in this Expedition, being weary of the long Oppoſition of the Scots, and finding that He was never likely to enjoy more than the empty Title of a King, and that he was alſo in Years and without Iſſue, therefore upon theſe Conſiderations, ~~about the end~~ upon the 20th of January, ✗ granted and confirm'd for Him and his Heirs, to Edward King of England and his Heirs for ever, the Kingdom, Government, Title and Crown of Scotland, together with the Iſles, and all manner of Royalties, Dignities, Prerogatives, &c. and all other things which belong'd to that Crown, with its Apurtenances: ✗ and then he put him in ~~poſſeſſion~~ thereof by the ſurrender of his Golden Crown, and delivery of ~~Poſſeſſion~~ by ſome of the Soil of the Kingdom, &c. in conſideration whereof King Edward was to allow him two thouſand Pounds Sterling for his Life, to be paid quarterly. There were ſeveral long [5] Inſtruments drawn up about this Grant, as alſo an Exemplification of the main Indenture of Agreement between the two Kings, dated at Bamburgh Caſtle the twentieth of February following. The Scotiſh Nobility make as if they would ſubmit to King Edward, but do not.

Whilſt King Edward continued thus at Roxburgh, [3] Earl Douglas with many of the chief Nobility of Scotland came to Him, and treated with Him, as if they deſigned to ſubmit to his Terms; and accordingly a Day was appointed for a full and final Agreement, in order to which the King allow'd them eight Days reſpite: But in the mean while the crafty Scots convey'd the beſt of their Moveables beyond the Frith; and then William Earl Douglas ſent the King word, That he would never ſubmit to his Peace while he lived. King Edward being thus deluded, marched on with his Army divided into three great Battalions, burning and deſtroying the Country round about Him, as He paſs'd, until He came to Haddington; but the Scots had carry'd off or ſpoil'd all ſorts of Proviſion, ſo that for fifteen days together the Engliſh could get little Meat, and no Drink but Water, a very thin Diet at that cold time of the Year. But the Scots were always ready, both on their Flank and Rear, to cut off whoſoever went forth from the Army to forage. While King Edward thus tarried at Haddington waiting for his Navy, wherein were the Proviſions for his Army, his Soldiers did their utmoſt to ſpoil the Country, tho it turn'd to very little advantage, for the Scots had already removed whatever was conſiderable: Wherefore the King and his Forces were fain to return home, after having endured a great deal of hardſhip in Scotland for want of Victuals.

The King purſues the Scots.

The King's Navy which carried the Proviſions ſuffer'd much by a Tempeſt.

But that which chiefly contributed to their Neceſſities, was, [4] that the King's Navy being to attend the Army with Proviſions, ſuffer'd much damage by a great Tempeſt, whereby moſt of the Ships were either deſtroy'd or diſpers'd, and not only the Men, but the Proviſions loſt. This Hector Boethius aſcribes to the Sacrilege of the Engliſh in robbing the Church of our Lady at Haddington, and alſo complains of the great Wickedneſs which King Edward's men then committed in robbing and burning Churches and other Religious Houſes: but this is not very probable, ſince the King was always averſe from Sacrilege, and is related by our Hiſtorians to have cauſed ſeveral of his men to have been hang'd at other times for the like Crime.

He had already upon good Conſiderations voluntarily reſign'd up all his Right to King Edward, and it was now too late to repent; or if He had, it would have been to no purpoſe; for He was ſo odious to the Scots, who never ſubmitted to Him but for fear, that had He not been ſupported by the King, He had been long ſince intirely ruined, having been deprived of all his Eſtate both in France and Scotland: So that being tired out with the long oppoſition of ſo ſtubborn and reſolute a People, He now went into England, where he lived quietly for the reſt of his Life, which was about ſeven Years, upon the Penſion of two thouſand Pounds per Annum, which was (as I have already ſaid) allowed Him by the King, in conſideration of his Reſignation of the Crown of Scotland; by which notwithſtanding the King reap'd no more advantage, than what his Grandfather Edward the Firſt had long ſince done by the like Reſignation of John Baliol, Father to this Edward.^ all I can find more upon [illegible] concerning the late [illegible] King of Scots [illegible] Kingdom to K. Simon Sudbury, Auditor of the Pope's Rota, is ſent to renew a Treaty of Peace with France.

So ſoon as [1] the King could return to London, He there met Maſter Simon Sudbury, Auditor of the Pope's Court call'd the Rota, being lately arriv'd as a Nuncio from his Holineſs, with Letters offering again to renew the Treaty of Peace between Him and the French King, and further to ſend two Cardinals Legats for that purpoſe. But after ſome weeks conſideration the King returned a civil Anſwer to the Pope's Letter, giving Him to underſtand, that He was always deſirous of Peace, whenever it might be had upon ſafe and honourable Terms; yet tho He had often conſented to ſuch Treaties as his Holineſs had propoſed, He had always found no other Iſſue from them, but fruitleſs Delays and loſs of time, to his great prejudice: and what Succeſs his Envoys had met with in the very laſt Treaty, his Holineſs very well knew. He therefore beg'd his Pardon, if being now compel'd to carry on the War to the utmoſt of his Power, He could not without great danger to the whole State of his Affairs comply with his Holineſs's Deſires. This Letter was dated on the ſecond of May this Year. ^

Having done with the Affairs of England, we ſhall now look into France, which produced freſh Diſturbances this Summer, and by their Civil Diſſenſions gave great Advantage to the Engliſh, who by that means, as well as a great Succeſs in Battel this Year, had more than one Victory over the French. The occaſion of theſe Diſturbances was, that King [3] John having been lately forced for the Maintenance of the War, to impoſe great Tallies and other Impoſts upon his Subjects, as alſo an annual Tax upon all Lands, Benefices, Offices and Sallaries (even to the Wages of Servants) all over France; theſe extraordinary Subſidies, tho granted by the Aſſembly of Eſtates, cauſed Tumults and Seditions in divers Places, eſpecially at Arras. [1] Froiſ. c. 156.

After which the King of Navarre began to raiſe freſh Troubles, upon the common pretence of all Reformers, the Redreſs of Grievances, and the Good of the Publick; but the French King having notice of his Deſigns, had laid a Snare to entrap Him; and notwithſtanding all his Cunning, [1] He was enticed by the Dauphin to the Caſtle of Rouen, together with Lewis Count of Harcourt, and ten or twelve more of their Confederats: But they were no ſooner got thither, and the King had notice of their Arrival, but He came upon them on the ſudden, and entring a Poſtern, ſurpriz'd them as they were juſt going to Dinner in the Hall of the Caſtle. The King only made his Son-in-law the King of Navarre a cloſe Priſoner; but as for the Count d' Harcourt and four other Lords, that Prince's chief Confidents, He ordered them to be carried in two Carts without the City, and there to be beheaded in the open Field without any manner of Proceſs: And as for the King of Navarre, He was content to ſend Him under a ſtrict Guard to the Caſtle of Galliard, but being often threaten'd with Death, He was removed from thence to divers other Priſons.

So violent a Blow as this had very bloody Effects; [2] for Philip Brother to the King of Navarre, and Geoffry Brother to the Count d' Harcourt, ſeizing upon divers ſtrong Places in Normandy, call'd in the Engliſh to revenge the Outrage that had been done to their two Brothers: tho I cannot here omit, that this Lord Geoffry is related by the [3] French Hiſtorians to be ſo touched with remorſe for what he had done by bringing the Engliſh into Normandy, and the Miſchief that follow'd it at the Battel of Creſſy, that not long after he preſented himſelf to King John with a Halter about his Neck, begging Pardon for his late Treaſon; which tho the King then graciouſly granted, yet it ſeem'd the next Provocation made him again relapſe into the ſame Crime. But to proceed in our Hiſtory, the two [4] French Lords laſt mention'd, having got together divers Troops in the Iſle of Coutantine in Normandy, ſent to the Duke of Lancaſter, [5] then newly arrived as Lieutenant of Bretagne, for the young Earl of Montfort to come to their aſſiſtance, which ~~He~~ immediately did, together with the Earl himſelf at the Head of above four thouſand men, and had ſo good ſucceſs, that he raiſed the Siege of Ponteau de mer belonging to the King of Navarre, as alſo that of Breteville, and other Places, which were then beſieged by the French; and not contented with this, he took the City of Verneuil by Storm, and plunder'd and burnt great part of it. But whilſt he laid cloſe Siege to the Caſtle, upon the News of the King of France's approach with a great Army, He raiſed the Siege, and marched off; and (as [6] one of our Writers relates) the French King following him as far as Conches, ſent two Heralds to him to bid him not ſpoil the Contry as he had done, but to ſtay and give Him Battel; which the Duke accepted of, and ſtaid there expecting the coming up of the King of France, who he heard was not above five Leagues off; but upon the receiving of the News of Prince Edward's Ravages in Gaſcogne, King John let the Duke alone, and immediately marched towards thoſe Parts to put a ſtop to the Prince's further Succeſs. ſhould dare to ſtay to give them Battel; and therefore I rather give credit to what * Froiſſart and the other French Hiſtorians relate, that King John purſued him for two Leagues beyond L' Aigle; but then finding that the Duke and his Men had taken ſuch thick Foreſts, that they might thereby eaſily entrap Him into ſome diſadvantage, the Paſſages being ſo dangerous to the Purſuer, He returned back to ſtop the furious Career of the Prince of Wales. But this is agreed by all, that the [1] Duke then retired to Montebourg in Coutantine, and there continued till he heard of Prince Edward's Victory at Poictiers; and from thence he went to Hennebond in Bretagne, where he for ſome time continued with the Counteſs of Montfort.

Who retires into Bretagne.

It is now time to give you an account of the Actions of the Prince of Wales, [2] who having imploy'd the Winter Seaſon in repairing and fortifying the City of Bourdeaux, and other Towns and Caſtles in Gaſcoigne, and cauſed great Quantities of Gold and Silver to be coin'd, according to a Commiſſion from the King his Father, for the payment of his Soldiers; preſently after Candlemas, [3] ſent the Captal de Buche with ſufficient Forces into the County of Perigort, which ſo ſoon as the Earl of it heard, he deſired the Cardinal his Brother to uſe his Intereſt with the Pope to obtain a Forbearance from the Prince for the City of Perigort, that it ſhould not be aſſaulted: and for this Favour he offer'd the Prince a great Sum of Mony. But tho the Pope alſo wrote to him for that purpoſe, yet his Anſwer was, that the King his Father was rich enough, and wanted neither Gold nor Silver; and therefore he was reſolved to perform what he had come over for, which was, to reduce the King his Father's Rebels in Aquitain to their former Allegiance. So the Captal having received Orders to beſiege that City, it was taken by him within a few days: And not long after, viz. on the ſixth of July, the Prince in Perſon began [4] his March from Bourdeaux with an Army of twelve thouſand men, whereof only three thouſand were natural Engliſh: but moſt Writers agree, that his Forces amounted to little more at this time than eight thouſand men, which was for certain the utmoſt Number he had at the Battel of Poictiers; and * Froiſſart reckons them to be but two thouſand Men at Arms and ſix thouſand Archers. With this ſmall, but well choſen Army (having left the Lord Bernard de la Bret his Lieutenant in Gaſcoigne with ſufficient Power) the Prince march'd thro Quercy and Auvergne, where He found plenty of all things, burning, plundering and deſtroying all before him in hoſtile manner; tho what ſhould be the reaſon that the Prince ſhould bring ſo great an Army into the Field the laſt Campagn, and ſo ſmall a one now, I cannot underſtand; unleſs it were, that He ſuppos'd the French King being taken up in Normandy, would not be able to give Him any great Diſturbance in thoſe Parts; but if it were ſo, this falſe Conſideration had like to have proved his Ruin, had it not been for his extraordinary Valour and good Fortune, as you will find hereafter.

The third, conſiſting of thirty thouſand Foot and Light Horſe, was led by the King Himſelf; and here were the Prime Nobility of France. When the Army was thus drawn up, the King made thoſe that were about Him a ſhort Speech, telling them, "that whilſt they were at Paris, "and on their March, He had heard them ſpeak very big words, "what they would do to the Engliſh, whenever they came in their "way: That now they were not far off, and therefore He would "quickly lead them thither; and now He hoped to ſee ſutable "effects of what they had ſo long threaten'd.

He makes them a ſhort Speech.

In the mean while, [1] Prince Edward ſeeing there was no way to eſcape without fighting, was reſolved to make the beſt He could of the great Diſadvantage He had in Numbers, and to do that by Policy and prudent Conduct which could not be obtain'd by Force; and to this end being now come into the Fields of Beauvoir and Maupertis, within two ſmall Leagues of Poictiers, He there choſe out a Place for the Encampment of his Army (which were chiefly Foot) where He knew He could not be aſſaulted without great diſadvantage to the Enemy: It was among Incloſures ſet thick with Vines and Buſhes, and here He reſolved to ſtay, and expect the Arrival of the Enemy. But as for the Number of the Engliſh, and the Order in which they were drawn up, I ſhall refer you to the Account [2] which the Lord of Ribemont gave of it, who being with other French Lords ſent out to view the Number and Order of the Engliſh Army, at his return made this Report to the King: "That as far as they could "judg there were not eight thouſand in all, drawn up in one Body "or Battalion, but very wiſely order'd: For the Hedges being all "lin'd with their Archers, none could march by without great Dan"ger: That there was but one Avenue or Paſs which led to the "Place, which was alſo lin'd on both ſides with Bows, and could "not receive above four Horſemen abreaſt: At the end of this Lane "ſtood a Body of Men at Arms all on foot, within a long ſquare Bo"dy of Archers before them; ſo that it would be very hard to enter "upon, and break them. Then the King asking his Advice, what was beſt to be done on this occaſion; his Anſwer was, that he thought the chief of the Nobility ſhould alight and fight on foot, except eight hundred of the choiceſt and beſt arm'd Horſe, who ſhould firſt enter the Lane, to break the Ranks of the Archers; upon which the Men at Arms ſhould march in boldly after them on Foot, and then fight the Engliſh hand to hand; only the German Cuiraſſiers were to remain ſtill on Horſe-back, to aſſiſt the Mareſchals of the Army, if need ſhould be. This Advice was well received by the King, and He order'd it to be put in execution.

When the Armies on both ſides ſtood thus ready prepared for a Battel, the [3] Cardinal of Perigort came once more to King John, and kneeling before Him, deſired leave to go to the Engliſh-men, and ſee if he could get them to yield themſelves upon Conditions. The King gave Him his Conſent, provided he would make a ſpeedy return. Then the Cardinal immediately rode away to the Prince of Wales, whom he found at the head of his men, within the Encloſure of a Vineyard, where after a ſhort Salutation he told him, that conſidering the great diſadvantage upon which He was now like to fight, he hop'd he would give him leave to endeavour to compoſe Matters between the French King and Him. The Prince reply'd, that He was willing to agree to any thing, that might conſiſt with his own Honour and that of his Country. Whereupon the Cardinal return'd back to the French King, and deſired a Truce until the next Morning, to ſee if he could in the mean while compoſe matters between them; which at laſt the King conſented to, tho with ſome Reluctance, for ſeveral of his Council oppoſed it.

The high Demands of the French King.

All [1] that Day being Sunday, the Cardinal ſpent in riding to and fro between the two Armies, but without any Succeſs, the French Demands were ſo high; for King John at firſt inſiſted to have four of the Principal Engliſh Noblemen at his Mercy, and that the Prince and all the reſt ſhould yield themſelves his Priſoners: this haughty Demand was received by the Prince with Scorn and Diſdain; yet He freely offered, That if He might be permitted to march back with his Forces to Bourdeaux, He would reſtore all the Caſtles and Places He had taken this Summer, together with the Priſoners, and would alſo ſwear not to bear Arms againſt the French for Seven Years after; and alſo (as ſome Authors have it) to pay all the Charges the King had bin at in this Expedition, but this He would by no means accept; and his laſt peremptory Demand was, That the Prince and an hundred of his Principal Noblemen and Knights ſhould ſurrender themſelves Priſoners; but that all the reſt might go whither they pleaſed, or elſe He would uſe his utmoſt Advantage againſt all of them, the Prince's Perſon only excepted. To which unworthy Motion, the Prince replied with a contemptuous Smile, That He hoped to Conquer; but if not, He could but die, yet would never yield to loſe his Honor, which He valued above his Life. So when the Cardinal ſaw that all his Endeavors for Peace were in vain, having laboured all Night until it was dark, he retired to Poictiers, intending to renew his Mediation the next Morning, as indeed he did, until it became ſo ungrateful to the French, that they threatned if he would not deſiſt, not to have any farther regard to his Character; ſo that leaving their Camp, he went to Prince Edward, and gave Him an Account how He had found his Enemy not to be farther perſuaded: however theſe Delays proved ſomewhat to the Advantage of the Engliſh, who during that Day and the Night following, made new Ditches, and Hedges about their Archers, to render them more ſecure againſt the French Horſe.

The Prince encourages his Men. His Speech to them.

[2] When the Engliſh Prince ſaw that He muſt have a Battel, He preſently mounted his Horſe, and rode thro the Ranks, and put them in mind, "That tho they were but a ſmall number in reſpect of their Enemies, yet Victory was in the hands of God, and was not always "to be gain'd by a Multitude; which if they obtain'd, they ſhould "win perpetual Honor, or if not, they could but die, which all of "them ſooner or later muſt expect; and concluded that England "ſhould never pay his Ranſom, ſince for his part He reſolved either "to die or Conquer. Theſe and the like Courageous Speeches highly raiſed the drooping Spirits of his Soldiers, ſo that the Prince had nothing more to do, but to put his Men in Battel Array; and [3] when He had divided his ſmall Forces into three ſeveral Bodies, beſides theſe He order'd the Lord John de Greilly (commonly called the Captal of Buſche) to march with three hundred Men of Arms, and as many Archers on Horſeback, and ſecretly to coaſt round about an adjoyning Hill, to be ready to fall upon the Back or Flank of the Enemy in the heat of the Action, which he did accordingly; and lying in Ambuſh buſh among the Buſhes till the Armies were engaged, he then did the Enemy no ſmall prejudice.

In the mean while [1] the Engliſh kept themſelves quiet and ready to receive the firſt Charge of the French, which was began by the three hundred Select Horſe, that were order'd to break in upon the Archers; which they endeavouring to do, met with that ill ſucceſs, that many of them were killed or wounded, tho ſome of them got within the Encloſure, as far as the ſquare Body of Archers that ſtood before the Prince; but theſe poor French Gentlemen being not timely aſſiſted, were either killed with Arrows, or cut in pieces by the Men at Arms. Then one of the main Bodies of the French Army being commanded by the two Marſhals of France, would have enter'd the Encloſure at a gap, and thought to have come in upon the backs of the Engliſh Van-guard, led by the Earl of Warwick; but the Earls of Saliſbury and Suffolk, who brought up the Rear, obſerving it, preſently ran up to ſtop their entrance, which they did with ſo good effect, that it produced a terrible Conflict who ſhould have the better, till the Engliſh Archers ſtarting up from behind the Hedges, ſhot ſo furiouſly upon the Enemy, that at laſt the whole Battalion was put to flight, and the Marſhal D'Endreghan being taken Priſoner, the Marſhal de Clermont was there ſlain, together with the Earl of Dowglas, and ſeveral Scotiſh Commanders, who had brought about three thouſand Scots to that Battel, but they were all either routed or killed. Thus the Marſhal's Battalion was wholly diſcomfited, and fell foul on one another; and thoſe who were behind, not being able to advance forward, were forced to retire back upon the ſecond Battalion that was led by the Dauphin, and much diſordered them. Whilſt the Engliſh thus charged the French in the Front, the Captal de Buſche came down the Hill on their backs with his Archers and Men at Arms, whereat the Engliſh were ſo mightily encouraged, and the French ſo confounded, that by a freſh Volly of Arrows which the Archers then gave them, they alſo began to give way, and the Engliſh by little and little gain'd Ground upon them.

At [2] this time, when the Lord John Chandois ſaw the firſt Battalion of the French routed, and the ſecond like to follow it, he adviſed the Prince (who had hitherto ſtood upon the Defenſive) to mount his Horſe, and advance towards the main Battalion of the Enemy, where the French King was, for there lay the whole Streſs of the Fight; which He immediately did, commanding his Standard-Bearer to march, when in their way thither they came where the Duke of Athens and the Conſtable of France were engaged with a ſmall Squadron of Engliſh; but upon the Prince's coming up to their aſſiſtance, the Duke himſelf was ſlain, and his Men put to flight. Then the Prince falling upon the Body of German Horſe, under the Conduct of the Earls of Saltzburg, * Naſſau and Neydo, they were immediatly ſhatter'd and broken; the Archers ſhooting ſo wholly together, that none durſt abide them, the Earl of Naſſau was taken Priſoner, but the two other Earls were ſlain outright, as were many other Knights and Eſquires of their Party, few or none in that hurry being taken to ranſom. Then the Dauphin's Battalion (as I have already ſaid) being hard put to it, when they ſaw the Prince alſo approaching to charge them in the Flank, the Dauphin himſelf thought it not beſt to ſtay any longer, but immediately

The Prince receives the charge of K. John.

[1] When the French King ſaw that his three Sons had left the Field, and that the Engliſh were like to gain the Day, He then immediately commanded his Standard-Bearer to march forward, vowing that He would not forſake the Field, till He had his Revenge, unleſs He was either ſlain, or taken Priſoner. Then the Prince with his ſmall and almoſt tir'd Battalions, was forc'd to receive the Charge of King John's, conſiſting of twice his number of freſh Men; and here the Fight was renew'd with greater Fury than ever, and the Prince and his Forces would in all probability have been loſt (tho they defended themſelves with all the Gallantry imaginable) had not the Earls of Warwick, Saliſbury and Suffolk juſt then return'd with their Squadron from the perſuit of the French that fled; but yet the Engliſh Archers were ſo put to it, that their Quivers being ſpent, they were forced to pick up Arrows in the Field from among the Bodies of the Dead; and [2] theſe being not ſufficient, many of the Soldiers took up Stones that lay in the Field to fling at the Heads of their Enemies: ſo that there was a fierce and deſperate Engagement on both ſides, until at laſt by the Valour of the Engliſh-men at Arms, but chiefly by the Skill and Gallantry of the Archers, the French Army was entirely defeated, moſt of them quitting the Field without fighting a ſtroke; [3] but K. John, behaving himſelf moſt valiantly with a weighty Battel Ax in his hand, was taken by ~~a Knight~~ of Artois called ~~Sir~~ Denis de Morbeque, to whom he gave His Gantlet, a sa Token that He was his Priſoner; and with Him was alſo taken his Youngeſt Son Philip, who, tho but about thirteen Years old, now ſhar'd in his Father's Misfortune; and not far from the King's Perſon, the Valiant Lord Charney his Standard-Bearer, as alſo the Earl of Damartin, with divers other Lords and Perſons of Quality were ſlain; yet the Lords that were taken Priſoners were far more numerous, than thoſe that were killed; the Chief of whom were the Earls of Eu, Tankerville and Ponthieu, with the L. James of Bourbon, and divers other Earls and Barons, whoſe Names you may find in my [4] Author, as well as thoſe that were ſlain.

When [5] the Prince had thus perform'd the Parts both of a Prudent General, as alſo of a Valiant Soldier, and that the Fight was now over, He ſat down to repoſe Himſelf under a ſmall Pavilion pitched on purpoſe in the Field; where the News was brought Him by the Earl of Warwick and Lord Cobham, whom He had ſent to ſcowr the Field, that the French King was taken Priſoner, and that there was ſuch contending between thoſe who laid Claim to Him, that He was in ſome danger of his Life, by their ſtriving who ſhould have Him; whereupon the Marſhals of the Field immediately ordered, that no Man ſhould touch or approach his Perſon: Then being mounted, they conducted Him and his Son Philip to the Prince of Wales, who receiv'd them with great Honor and Reſpect; yet He was not at all elated at this Extraordinary Succeſs, [6] but cauſing Wine and other Refreſhments to be brought, He Himſelf would needs ſerve the King with Drink, who afterwards was ſafely kept in his own Quarters.

The gerat Battel at Poictiers, with the cauſes of the Victory

Thus was this Memorable Battel won in the Fields of Beauvoir, about two Leagues from the City of Poictiers, on the nineteenth Day of September, being Monday; it began about Nine in the Morning, and ended on the Engliſh ſide, and the Defeat of the French.

ended a little after Noon; which Victory as it was chiefly owing to the great Conduct of the Prince, and Courage of his Commanders and common Soldiers, ſo was it alſo to be aſcribed to the Raſhneſs and Temerity of King John, and his principal Counſellors, who rejecting all reaſonable Conditions, being blinded with Paſſion, inſtead of hemming in that ſmall Body of Engliſh, and forcing them to ſurrender for want of Proviſions, as they muſt have done in a ſhort time (who were already in great want thereof) the French King with the Fury of a Lion rather than a General, muſt needs ſet upon the Engliſh in their Entrenchments, and thereby meet with that remarkable Defeat, which ſo great an Arrogance juſtly deſerved.

There [1] were ſlain at this Battel divers of the Chief and ~~the~~ moſt Valiant of the Nobility of France, among whom were the two Dukes of Bourbon, beſides many Counts and Barons, five, or (as ſome ſay) ſix thouſand Men of Arms, thoſe of the common ſort not being number'd, tho ſome reckon them about eight thouſand more; but the Chief Noblemen were afterwards buried in the Convent of the Jacobines at Poictiers: yet the Slaughter was far leſs here than at Creſſy, becauſe the Engliſh were not half ſo numerous now, and the Prince durſt not perſue the Chaſe too far, till He had compleated the Victory; by which time all of the meaner ſort had quitted the Field, and thoſe of the better were either ſlain or taken. The place of Battel was left free to the Engliſh, and more [2] than an hundred Warlike Banners or Enſigns were brought away in Triumph. When the Engliſh were all return'd from the Chaſe, they found how they had twice as many Priſoners as themſelves, the Chief whereof were the French King, and the Lord Philip his Son, [3] Seventeen Earls, beſides Barons, Knights and Eſquires to the number of Fifteen hundred, or (as others ſay) two thouſand Men of Arms; wherefore 'twas thought fit, becauſe of the great charge and danger of keeping ſo many Priſoners, that they ſhould put ſeveral of the leaſt conſiderable of them to Ranſom in the field, and their bare Paroles taken for the Mony; for they found the Engliſhmen and Gaſcoigners very courteous, many being let go only upon their words, to return again between that and Chriſtmas to Bourdeaux, with their appointed [4] Ranſoms, which were very eaſy and reaſonable; for the Engliſh ſaid, they would not ſet ſo high a Price upon a Knight or Gentlemen, but that he might ſtill be left able to live after his Rank, and to follow the Wars in an Equipage agreeable to his Quality.

But to ſay ſomewhat more of the Engliſh, I do not find how many of them were killed in all; but certainly they were not many, ſince I do not ſee them particularly mention'd, no more than I do the Names of any Perſons of Quality that fell that Day: But as for thoſe who were moſt remarkable for their Valour, they were theſe, the Earls of Warwick, Suffolk, Saliſbury, Stafford, Sir James Audeley, and Sir John Chandois, &c. who behaved themſelves very bravely; but beyond others the Earl of Warwick, Sir James Audeley and Sir John Chandois; ſince [5] the Firſt of theſe not only put the Enemy to flight, but alſo reliev'd the Prince when He was in the greateſt Danger; and the Second attended by four of his Eſquires began the Fight, and (according to a Vow that he had made) boldly engag'd with that part of the French Army that was led by the Mareſchals de Clermont and D'Endreghan, till being quite ſpent with loſs of Blood, he was forc'd to be carry'd out out of the Field: But as for the laſt of theſe, he never ſtir'd from the Prince's Perſon, but by his Valour and Advice was a great means to gain the Victory; and for the Prince Himſelf, Froiſſart ſays, He was as courageous as a Lion, and took pleaſure to fight with and chaſe his Enemies; ſo that his Courage and Conduct was that day moſt remarkable and extraordinary. But to return to our Relation,

[1] Id. c. 169.
The Engliſh uſe their Priſoners well.

[1] That night the Army encamped hard by the Place of Battel, having diſarmed all their Priſoners, and appointed certain in every Quarter to ſtand to their Arms, beſides the uſual Watches: and every man made much of his Priſoners; for whoever had taken any Priſoner that day, he had him clear to himſelf, either to acquit or ranſom him at his Pleaſure; except only the French King and his Son, [2] or whoever elſe, whoſe Ranſom exceeded ten thouſand Crowns: For by Law of Arms, thoſe whoſe Redemption was valued at more than that Sum, belonged to the King. The [3] Night after the Battel, the Prince order'd a noble Supper to be provided for the French King, and the Priſoners of the higheſt Quality; and this might be eaſily done, for tho the Engliſh were in great want of Proviſions before the Fight, they were now Maſters of the French Camp, in which there was plenty of all things: But the Prince was ſo courteous and well-bred, that He not only cauſed the French King to ſit down at the Table with Prince Philip his Son, and the Lord of Bourbon and ſeveral other Princes of the Blood bearing him Company, whilſt the reſt of the Lords and Knights ſat at other Tables; but He would needs alſo wait on the King at Supper, and being deſired by Him to ſit down, his Reply was, That He was not worthy to ſit down with ſo great a Monarch as his Majeſty was.

But when for all this He perceived, that the King's Countenance was much dejected, He endeavour'd to raiſe his Spirits by ſpeaking to this effect: “ [4] That his Majeſty being one of the braveſt of Chriſtian Kings, had no cauſe to be penſive or concern'd: For tho his Arms had not been favour'd by Him, who is the Diſpoſer of Victory, yet his Gallantry muſt be acknowledg'd, and his Royal Dignity ſtill preſerv'd inviolable: That tho among ſo many Battels He had been in, ſome had ſucceeded otherwiſe than He expected, the Inſtability of Fortune would have it ſo, which ſometimes baffles Multitudes, and gives Victory to a few, notwithſtanding the Oppoſition of the greateſt Forces.

“ That as in relation to Himſelf, He promiſed that the Realm of France ſhould always find Him grateful to her which had produced and nouriſhed ſo many of his Progenitors, and towards his Majeſty (if He would permit him to glory in that Title) He would ſtill ſhew himſelf a moſt obſequious and reſpectful Kinſman: That as to the King his Father, there were ſo many Reaſons to create Love and Friendſhip between his Majeſty and Him, that knowing his private Thoughts and Affections, He (the Prince) could not but have great hopes of their coming to a ſpeedy and reaſonable Agreement: That as for Himſelf, He wiſhed the King might no longer own Him for his Son, when He ceaſed to expreſs the ſame Honour, Reverence and Reſpect to his Perſon, as to that of the King his Father.

Anno Dom. MCCCLVI.

This wonderful Submiſſion in a conquering young Prince, little more than five and twenty Years of Age, [1] did melt the captive King into Tears; and when the French Lords ſaw the Prince ſo humble in ſo high a Gale of Proſperity, and heard the generous Language He ſo obligingly utter'd, they began to whiſper among themſelves, that He had ſpoken bravely, and that in all probability He would prove a moſt accompliſhed Prince, if God would grant him Life. When [2] King John ſaw that He was not unhappy in falling into the hands of ſo obliging a Conqueror, tho inwardly afflicted in mind, yet He forced Himſelf to a civil Smile, and looking kindly on the Prince, He ſaid, "That "ſince (to his ſorrow) it had been his chance to have been over-"come, yet it was ſome alleviation of his Grief, that He had not "behav'd Himſelf unworthily, and that He was fallen into the hands "of ſo valiant and courteous a Prince; who thereupon did what He could to comfort Him with all the kind and obliging Expreſſions that were poſſible, as by admiring his Vertue and extolling his Valour above that of the chiefeſt of his Commanders. After which King John ſpoke little, [3] but highly commended the Valour of the Lord Audeley, who having behav'd himſelf very gallantly, was then grievouſly wounded. Then after ſome civil Diſcourſe with the Prince, He roſe from Supper, and was conducted to his Pavilion.

I have been the more particular in this Relation, becauſe it is one of the greateſt Examples of Humility and Generoſity that we find recorded in Hiſtory, and is an excellent Example for conquering Princes to obſerve on any like occaſion.

The day following [4] the Prince order'd his whole Army to march, with their Priſoners and Baggage, with which they were ſo laden, that He not thinking it ſafe again to venture ſo noble a Prey, marched by the City of Poictiers without aſſaulting it, or committing any Act of Hoſtility in his Return; during which they alſo met with no Reſiſtance, the whole Country was ſo terrified with the late wonderful Succeſs. So that by many days eaſy Marches thro Poictou and Saintogne, He paſſed the River Garonne at Blaye, and from thence went to the City of Bourdeaux, [5] where the Prince wrote Letters to the King his Father, to give him a full but modeſt account of his Victory, promiſing the next Spring (God willing) to return with his Priſoner into England, hoping by that time to provide a ſufficient Fleet for that purpoſe. When King Edward received this News, it is not to be queſtion'd but He was highly pleas'd, and not only returned thanks Himſelf to God for ſo ſignal a Victory, but [6] alſo enjoin'd the Arch-Biſhops of Canterbury and York, that for eight days together they ſhould thro their ſeveral Provinces cauſe publick Proceſſions and Prayers to be made for the Souls of thoſe who fell in the late Battel; and alſo to return ſolemn Thankſgiving to God for ſo ſignal a Victory vouchſafed unto the Engliſh Nation.

But I ſhall now give you ſome account of what happen'd in the other Parts of France in the mean while. [3] The Duke of Lancaſter continued in Normandy all the time of the Prince's late Expedition, and together with Prince Philip of Navarre, x ~~and~~ the Lord Geoffry of Harcourt, would fain have got to the Prince, but fearing that the Paſſages of the Loire were ſo ſtrictly guarded, that there was no getting over, they were fain to continue at Monteburgh; but [4] upon the News of the Victory of Poictiers, the Duke return'd into Bretagne, to aſſiſt the Counteſs of Montfort, and about the end of this Year laid Siege to the City of Rennes: It being then the midſt of Winter, the Soldiers endured great Hardſhips, tho the Place was taken at laſt, after a long Siege, as you will find anon.

Great Confuſions in France.

In the mean while the Affairs of France fell into great confuſion and diſorder; [5] for the Dauphin having under the Title of the King's Lieutenant, not long after his Impriſonment ſummon'd an Aſſembly of the Eſtates of the Kingdom, upon a Declaration to them of the common Dangers and Neceſſities thereof, he found, that which is always the effect of a careleſs and bad Government, nothing but Remonſtrances monſtrances and Complaints: Nor would they grant any Aſſiſtance for the Redemption of the King from his Captivity, unleſs the Dauphin would turn out the Arch-Biſhop of Rouen from being Chancellor, Simon de Bucey from being firſt Preſident, with ſix or ſeven other of the principal Officers of State, whoſe Goods they would alſo have confiſcated, as the Authors of all their late Oppreſſions: and farther, that He ſhould ſet the King of Navarre at liberty, and govern all Affairs by a Council of their choice. But the Dauphin durſt not conſent to ſo great an Alteration in the State, without the King his Father's Conſent; and He being wrote to on purpoſe about it, returned anſwer, That He had rather continue Priſoner to an honourable Enemy, than return home and be a Slave to his own Subjects. Whereupon the Dauphin was forc'd to diſſolve the Eſtates, without doing any thing for which they were aſſembl'd.

[1] Froiſ. c.172. The Ld Geoffry de Harcourt is met by the Dauphin's Forces, and kill'd on the Place.

All the good Succeſs that the impriſon'd King's Affairs met with this Year, was, [1] that during the ſitting of the Eſtates, Complaints being made to the Dauphin, that the Lord Geoffry de Harcourt ſent out Troops from his Caſtle of St. Sauveur le Vicomte, ſpoiling the Country to the very Suburbs of Caen and Eureux; the Dauphin was ſo far aſſiſted by the Eſtates, as to ſend out ſome Commanders with ſufficient Forces to reduce him, who meeting with him and his Men near Coutance, defeated them, and ſlew him on the Place, tho he made a ſtout Defence; for he was ſenſible, that it was much more honourable for him to die in the Field by the Sword, than by an Ax upon the Scaffold: Upon which theſe Parts of Normandy were pretty well quieted for a time, the Party of the King of Navarre being almoſt intirely reduced. The Death of this Lord was a great diſappointment to that Prince, as alſo to the King of England, [2] to whom he left a great Eſtate in Normandy by his Teſtament, diſinheriting his Nephew, Son to the Earl of Harcourt, becauſe he had not join'd with him to revenge the Death of his Father.

I find nothing to have happened in the beginning of this Year worth obſerving, [3] till the end of April, when Prince Edward, having got ready a ſufficient Navy for tranſporting his Royal Captive into England, left the Dutchy of Aquitain under able Lieutenants during his Abſence, and ſet ſail from Bourdeaux with certain Lords of Gaſcoigne, and a great number of Engliſh Officers and Soldiers. The French King was in a Ship by Himſelf, leſt He ſhould receive any diſturbance; but He was ſo well guarded, that there were no leſs than two hundred Men at Arms and two thouſand Archers diſpos'd in other Ships round about Him; for the Prince was afraid that the Eſtates of France would ſet out a Fleet to reſcue Him out of his Hands. But after a tedious Paſſage of eleven days at Sea, [4] they landed on the fifth of May at Sandwich, or as [5] others relate more truly, at Plimouth in Devonſhire, from whence they went by eaſy Journies to London, where [6] King John made a publick Entry mounted on a ſtately white Courſer, the Prince of Wales riding by his ſide upon a little black Nag, [7] being received by Henry Picard Lord Mayor of London, and all the Companies in their beſt Liveries, their Shops and Streets as they paſſed along being ſet out with their richeſt Plate and Tapiſtry, and alſo adorned with their choiceſt Weapons and Armour: and the Concourſe of People was ſo great to behold ſo unuſual a Spectacle, that that the Cavalcade held from three of the Clock in the Morning till High Noon, about which time the Prince got to Weſtminſter-Hall, where He preſented unto the King his Father, then ſitting on his Royal Throne, the Perſon of King John his Priſoner: Yet Edward could not long retain the ſevere Aſpect of a Conqueror; for when the French King came near the Throne, and bowed with ſuch a manly Submiſſion as became his preſent Fortune, the King was immediatly touched with a due conſideration of the Inſtability of human Affairs by the ſight of ſo great a Prince, whom He now beheld in this low Condition; and ſo riſing haſtily from his Throne, He met and careſs'd Him with as much Honour and Reſpect, as if He had only come to give him a Viſit. Nor did this great King make uſe of this ſolemn Entrance of his Royal Captive as a matter of his own Triumph, but rather of a devout Proceſſion; for by his Order, [1] that very day the Clergy of London went forth to meet the Prince with their Croſſes, ſinging Anthems in a ſolemn Proceſſion; and after that, for two days together, publick Supplications and Prayers with Thankſgiving, were celebrated thro the Cities of London and Weſtminſter.

[2] Id. ib. The French K. is lodged in the Savoy, with the reaſon of its Name.

Then King Edward treated the French King and his Son with the reſt of the French Priſoners after a Princely manner, ordering an Apartment for the King in his own Court, [2] till the Houſe now call'd the Savoy could be prepared for Him, being at that time a moſt ſplendid and magnificent Structure, belonging to the Duke of Lancaſter, and ſo called from its firſt Founder Peter Earl of Savoy, Father to Boniface Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, who was Uncle to Eleanor, K. Henry the Third's Queen. So ſoon as this Palace could be got ready, the King was carried thither, where He was honourably attended, and often viſited by the King, Queen and Prince, who provided all ſorts of Exerciſes and Diverſions to take off his Melancholy for the loſs of his Liberty, tho without any great effect. Thus was King John and his Son, and the chief of the Captive Nobles of France entertain'd in England, whilſt divers of the other Priſoners of leſs note, were preſently releas'd upon King John's giving his Security on their behalf, and the reſt were ſeverally beſtowed in ſafe Cuſtody.

[4] H. K. Col. 2616.

But we ſhall now paſs to ſomewhat more material in Bretagne, ſince England affords us nothing elſe worth our notice. [3] The Duke of Lancaſter having beſieged the City of Rennes ever ſince the beginning of Decemb. the laſt Year (as has been already related) the Siege ſtill continued great part of this Summer, but with ſmall effect; for beſides the natural Strength of the Place, Count Charles of Blois had put a ſtrong Gariſon into it, under the Viſcount of Rouen, with other Noblemen of Bretagne. In the mean while Count Charles himſelf being in theſe Parts, was very ſolicitous to raiſe the Siege, and beſides his own Forces, daily importun'd the Regent of France for a ſtrong Reinforcement; but the Regent had his own hands ſo full, that He was not at leiſure to do any thing conſiderable: So the City began to be greivouſly ſtraiten'd; but when the Siege had continued for near nine Months, [4] Count Charles approached the Place with ten thouſand Men to raiſe it; but he found the Duke ready to receive him in the Field, and yet at the ſame time able to make good the Siege with another part of his Army, and ſo perceiving it not likely to ſucceed, he retired. Upon which the Beſieged ſeeing their Caſe almoſt deſperate, took the firſt opportunity by means of a the Biſhop then in the Town, to treat with the Duke, and being kindly received, they at laſt agreed to deliver the Town on theſe Conditions: That the Inhabitants, upon the Payment of a hundred thouſand Scutes of Gold to the Duke for the Charges he had been at in the Siege, ſhould be ſafe as to their Bodies, Goods and Eſtates; and that then they ſhould deliver up the Town to ſuch Captain ~~or Officer~~ and Soldiers. as the Duke ſhould appoint to receive it: All which was perform'd accordingly. ~~And thus the Duke of Lancaſter became poſſeſs'd of this ſtrong Caſtle and Town, when it had been in the hands of the French for above a dozen Years.~~

The Town ſurrender'd on Conditions.

But the City did not continue in the Poſsession of the English, for immediately after they agreement, the Duke of Lancaster receivd the Kings Letters, giveing him notice of the [illegible] had been already concluded [illegible] the [illegible] Adversary of France and therefore commanded him to raise the Seige of [illegible] Place. but the Duke having finisd the agreement and received the money agreed on by the Town, all he could do farther was to deliver [illegible] the [illegible] for the [illegible] of the ~~King~~ Count De Blois

And indeed this Succeſs happen'd very luckily; for not [1] long before there came a Cardinal from France, to put the King in mind of the Agreement that had been made at Bourdeaux between his Son the Prince of Wales and King John, that upon the renewing a Treaty of Peace that was then reſolv'd on, the Siege of Rennes ſhould be rais'd: and at that very Juncture came hither from the Pope the abovemention'd Cardinals of Perigort and St. Vitalis to aſſiſt at the ſaid Treaty, which was then to be ſet on foot. Theſe Cardinals were preſented to the King at Weſtminſter-Hall, as He ſat in great ſtate upon his Throne; then one of them began his Diſcourſe with a Text out of the Pſalms, Honor Regis Judicium diligit, i. e. The King's Honour loveth Righteouſneſs. After which they propoſed what was intruſted to them by their Commiſſion, which was to this effect: That King Edward ſhould have the Lands reſtor'd which his Predeceſſors had held in France, on Condition that Peace and Concord might be ſettled between the two Crowns. To which King Edward anſwered briefly, That altho ſome of the Lands of his Predeceſſors had been loſt for a time, yet He doubted not of recovering them again, when it ſhould pleaſe God; but that He would have nothing to do with them, unleſs they came to the point in hand, concerning the Crown of France, which He claim'd. They anſwered, their Commiſſion extended not ſo far; and ſo the matter reſted, till they could hear from the Pope again, which they did not before the nine and twentieth of Auguſt. But in all theſe Treaties the Pope appeared notoriouſly partial to the French King's Cauſe; and that his Holineſs ſent theſe Cardinals hither for his own Intereſt more than to promote the publick Peace, appear'd by the Bull they brought over with them, enjoining every Biſhop by Papal Authority to make a Viſitation throughout their ſeveral Dioceſſes, and to pay their Procurations to the Legats: And it was ſaid, that this Sum was by the Pope intended for the aid and ſuſtaining of the French Intereſt; and indeed this pretended Peace-making was ſo chargeable, that at Michaelmas theſe Cardinals had of the Clergy of England Four-pence out of every Mark, as well of Spiritual as Temporal Eſtates; and yet no final Peace was made, ~~only at laſt with much ado they procured a Truce~~ onely the a truce. [illegible] concluded with [illegible] ~~[illegible]~~ France & Edward in France between the two Kings, and all their Allies ~~(except the Lord Philip of Navarre and his Friends, as alſo the Counteſs of Montfort, and the Lord Charles of Blois) to endure till the Feaſt of St. John Baptiſt, or the four and twentieth of June, which was to be in the Year 1359.~~ and was to commence from the day of the date, viz: the 23d of March, to Easter day enſuing & from thence for two years ~~[illegible]~~ viz: till Easter 1359. as appears by the Letters, or Instrument of this Treaty, under the Seals of the sd Cardinals & the Kings: viz: R's Coll: Protectors, as also of the Earls of [illegible]wick and Suffolk for ~~[illegible]~~ other noblemen for King Edward. and the Cardinall of Rouen, & the Bp. of Sens, with other French Lds for King John. this [illegible] dated at Bordeaux A.D. 1356.

of the Realm of England, being the Annuity of a thouſand Marks granted by King John of England to the Court of Rome, when He reſign'd his Crown to the Legate Pandulphus. But to this Propoſal the King returned a courageous Anſwer, That He would never pay any Tribute to any Man whatſoever, becauſe He held his Kingdom without ſubjection to any one, but only to God. But ſince this Relation is found in no other Author except Knighton, I much doubt the truth of it; for we ſhall find this very Pope to make the ſame Demand within two Years after, which it is not likely He would have done, had He received ſo reſolute a Denial at this time.

K. John is remov'd to Windſor Caſtle.

Upon this Truce the [1] French King had leave to remove with his Family to Windſor Caſtle, where He and his Son the Lord Philip diverted themſelves with Hunting and Hawking; but the other Priſoners continued ſtill at London, and they had liberty to go to Court when they pleas'd, only they gave their Paroles to be true Priſoners, and by no means to endeavour their Eſcape.

The Q. of Scots endeavours the ranſoming of her Husband.

David King of Scots having been ever ſince the Battel of Durham Priſoner in England, there had been by the earneſt Mediation of his Queen Joan, Siſter to King Edward (who had her Brother's leave to come into England laſt Year) ſeveral Treaties ſet on foot for the ranſoming her Husband; and near two years ſince it was ſo far advanc'd [2] by Commiſſioners on both ſides, who had met at Newcaſtle, that the Articles were agreed on, and reduced into Writing; the chief of which were, That King David ſhould be ranſomed and ſet free for ninety thouſand Marks of Sterling Silver, to be paid in nine Years, by equal Payments; and that during that time there ſhould be a firm and inviolable Truce between the two Kings and the Subjects of their reſpective Dominions. But this Treaty (as divers others had done before) came to nothing, becauſe the Scots would not conſent to all the Terms and Conditions propoſed for their King's Releaſe. Yet this Year the Treaty was again renewed with better ſucceſs, x ~~by the Interceſſion of the Cardinal Legate; for on the third of October Commiſſioners on both ſides met at Berwick~~: On the behalf of King Edward were John Arch-Biſhop of York, Thomas Biſhop of Dureſme. Gilbert Biſhop of Carliſle, Henry de Piercy, Ralph de Neville, Henry le Scrope, and Thomas Muſgrave: And for the Lord Robert Stuart then Guardian of Scotland, and the Prelats, Lords and Commons of that Kingdom, William Biſhop of St. Andrews, Thomas Biſhop of Cathneſs, Patrick Biſhop of Brechin Chancellor of Scotland, Patrick Earl of Marche, Robert de Irſkin and William de Levingſton Knights; where it was agreed (among & other matters of leſs moment) to this effect.

Commiſſioners appointed to treat with thoſe of Scotland concerning this Affair.

IV. That none of the Subjects of both theſe Kings ſhould take Priſoners, or exact Ranſoms of any Perſon, Town or Country belonging to either of them during the ſaid Term.

V. That for the true Payment of the abovesaid Sum, according to this Agreement, the King of Scots ſhould ſend hither twenty Hoſtages particularly named in this Article, being the Sons and Heirs of the Earls, and other great Men of Scotland.

VI. That for the better ſtrengthening and enforcing the ſaid Agreement, upon the delivery of the King of Scots, three of the eight Earls therein named ſhould alſo become Hoſtages for Him, and ſhould inſtantly remain in England till three others of the ſaid Eight ſhould come in their ſtead, and in exchange of them: And this from time to time, till the whole Sum of one hundred thouſand Marks were entirely paid; beſides which the ſaid King of Scots, with the Prelats and Great Men therein named, being preſent at his deliverance, ſwore and obliged themſelves by their Oaths to ſend the ſaid twenty Hoſtages therein named, without any fraud or delay; yet with liberty to exchange them for others, as there ſhould be occaſion: And that if any of them went away without leave of their Keepers, they were to be ſent back again.

VII. That if the Mony was not paid at the Terms agreed on, the King of Scots ſhould then return into England, and render Himſelf Priſoner, there to remain till all the Arrears of his ſaid Ranſom were diſcharged; but in caſe He were any ways hinder'd from coming hither, that then He ſhould ſend in his ſtead three others of the eight Earls therein mention'd (beſides the three that were here before) who were all to remain till full Payment was made as aforeſaid.

VIII. By the 8*th* Article it was agreed, that if any Caſtle or Town were taken by either of thoſe Princes Subjects during this Truce, they ſhould be immediately reſtored; and if it was not then done, the King that fail'd in the performance ſhould forfeit forty Pounds Sterling to the other for each day that ſuch Place was detain'd after demand made thereof.

IX. The 9*th* provides for the ſending freſh Hoſtages in the ſtead of thoſe that ſhould die before the King's Ranſom was paid.

X. By the 10*th* the King of Scots, with his Lords and Prelats and Merchants make themſelves liable to the Cenſures of the Church, on failure of Payment of the ſaid Mony, and in that caſe farther oblige themſelves to the Pope or his * Auditor in the Sum total above-mention'd, to be applied to the uſe of the King of England, beſides the Sum of ten thouſand Florins to the ſaid Chamber of the Pope: and they alſo covenant not to recall their Procurators, whom they had appointed for that purpoſe; and the ſaid King, Prelats, Lords and Merchants, do each of them acknowledg themſelves obliged as principal Debtors to pay the ſaid Sum at the Place and Time agreed on.

XI. The 11*th* being of no great moment, I omit.

XII. The 12*th* provides, that none of the People of Scotland ſhould either by themſelves, or any other, procure Letters from the Pope contrary to this Agreement; and that if any ſuch be granted, they ſhould not be accepted, or any ways made uſe of by them.

XIII. But in caſe the Prelats of Scotland ſhould be negligent, or durſt not do it, or be otherways hinder'd from putting the Pope's XIV. The 14*th* I paſs by for the ſame Reaſon as before.

XV. The 15*th* provides, that if the King of Scots ſhould die before the full payment and diſcharge of the ſaid Sum of one hundred thouſand Marks due for his Ranſom; yet neverthleſs all the ſaid Obligations ſhould remain in full force againſt all the Parties ſo obliged, and the Hoſtages not be diſcharged until the whole Sum be fully paid.

XVI. By the 16*th* it is mutually agreed, that the Rebels of either King ſhould not be receiv'd, maintain'd or ſupported by the other, their Miniſters or Officers.

XVII. The ſeventeenth gives the King of England Power by his Letters Patents to arreſt the Merchants of Scotland in Flanders, or elſewhere beyond Sea, for the payment of the aforeſaid Sum.

XVIII. The eighteenth chiefly concerns the Prince of the Orchades, otherwiſe called John of the Iſles, from being liable to have the ſaid Ranſom levied upon his Lands and Territories. But it is further there recited, that for the better aſſurance of the Matters aforeſaid, the Lords Piercy and Neville having full Power, have ſworn to theſe Alliances on behalf of the King of England and the Prince of Wales his eldeſt Son; as alſo the King of Scots hath ſworn on the Holy Evangeliſts truly to obſerve and accompliſh all the Points aforeſaid, without any Fraud or Deceit, and alſo to cauſe their Subjects to obſerve the ſame, to their power; and the above-mention'd Prelats and Lords of Scotland, have likewiſe ſworn to the ſame purpoſe as far as in them lies.

XIX. By the nineteenth it is agreed, that the ſaid King and Prince on their Parts, and the King of Scots on his part, ſhould confirm this Indenture by their Letters Patents under their Great Seals, and ſhould ſend them to Berwick by the Feaſt of St. Martin next enſuing, or within eight days after: In teſtimony of which, to that part of this Indenture remaining with thoſe of England, the Biſhops and other Commiſſioners for Scotland put their Seals; as did alſo the Arch-Biſhop and other Commiſſioners on behalf of the Engliſh, on ~~the Day and Year aboveſaid~~: And in ~~purſuance thereunto~~, theſe Articles were not long after reduced into Letters Patents bearing date at Weſtminſter Oct. 5. this Year, as further appears by the Rolls of [1] Scotland in the Tower.

He muſtering up his Forces, marched to the City of Avignon, and there put the Pope and his Cardinals into ſuch a terrible fright, that He was forced to compound with him for the ſum of forty thouſand Crowns, to ſave the Country from being pillaged; and beſides he obliged Him to give him Abſolution, and to treat him at His own Table, with the ſame Reſpect as if he had been a Sovereign Prince.

The Caſtle of Evreux is ſurprized.

Near the ſame time [2] about ſix hundred Men at Arms and ſome Archers belonging to ſeveral Gariſons, both in Bretagne and Gaſcoigne, joyning together, went into Normandy, and revolting from the French, took part with Philip Brother to the King of Navarre, and quickly after ſurprized the ſtrong Town of Honfleur; upon which the Lord Robert of Clermont marched againſt them with eight hundred Men of Arms, and five thouſand Foot, making a briſk Aſſault upon the Town, but with ill Succeſs, for he loſt there five hundred Men; yet ſtill he endeavoured to carry the Place: but whilſt he lay there, Sir Robert Knolles and Sir James Pipe, who were the Duke of Lancaſter's Lieutenants in Normandy, came ſuddenly upon the Frenchmen's backs, and with the ſlaughter of a thouſand more of them, put the Marſhal and the reſt to flight. And by the way I cannot but obſerve of this Sir Robert Knolles above-mention'd, that [3] Walſingham tells us, That he thrived ſo well in theſe Wars, that from a poor common Soldier, he arrived to the Riches of a Noble Man; and he muſt certainly have been a Man of great Courage and Conduct, being afterwards employ'd by the King in his Wars, and within a few Years after by the King and the Prince his Son, in the moſt Conſiderable Commands both at home and abroad. Not long after this, [4] the ſtrong Caſtle of Evreux, belonging to the King of Navarre, was ſurprized by the contrivance of the Sieur de Granville, and the aſſiſtance of ſome of the Principal Burgeſſes and Townſmen, who joyn'd in that Deſign; and killing the Governor, made the Gariſon Priſoners.

And then to let Him ſee, that He muſt become a perfect Citizen, if He would expect their Favour, he made Him wear their Livery, and clapping his own party-coloured Cap upon the Dauphin's Head, took His (being embroider'd with Gold) and put it upon his Own, and ſo abruptly taking his Leave, left the Dauphin's preſence, who tho ſufficiently mortified with this Affront, was alſo forced to pardon the Citizens for thus diſpatching his moſt truſty Servants.

The effect of his Speech.

Not long after this, [1] the King of Navarre was reſcued from his Priſon in the Caſtle of Arleux in Picardy, by the contrivance of ſome of his People, and by the conſent of the Lord of Picquigny, to whoſe care King John had committed the Cuſtody of that Prince: The Dauphin [2] was highly ſurpriz'd at his Eſcape, fearing nothing ſo much as his Reſentment for the Death of his Friends, and ſo long an Impriſonment; neverthelеſs being prevail'd on by the Importunities of the Council of State, and the Interceſſion of the two Queen Dowagers, the Dauphin was forced to grant him his Safe-Conduct to come to Paris, where he was lodged at the Abby of St. Germain des Prez without the City. Then ſome Days after, toward the end of November, He gave publick notice that he would make an Harangue to the People in the place of the Liſts, which lay between the Abby of St. Germans and Le Pré aux Clercs; where a vaſt multitude being aſſembled to hear Him, He mounted [3] the Scaffold from whence the King uſed to behold the Tourneaments, and from thence made a Pathetick Speech to the Prelats, Knights and Students of the Univerſity in Latin, ſetting forth, with that Eloquence he was Maſter of, the Injuſtice of his Impriſonment, and the Tyrannical Execution of his Friends, together with the Zeal He had ſtill expreſs'd for the Publick good of the Kingdom; but above all his particular affection to Paris, the Capital City thereof. This flattering Speech had the greater effect upon the People, becauſe they were ſenſible He had been treated with too much Rigour; and the next day He was receiv'd into the City with great Rejoycing: whereupon the Council of State, the Provoſt of the Merchants, and the Univerſity it ſelf, all joyned in their Importunities to the Dauphin to make Him ſatisfaction for the Injuries that had been done Him; which that Prince was forced to agree to. But when the King would have reenter'd thoſe Places that had been taken from Him, thoſe that held them for the King of France, refuſed to deliver them; which together with ſome new Diſcontents, gave an occaſion to break out into an open War the Year following. I have been the more particular in the Relations of the Troubles of France, not only becauſe they are very extraordinary, but alſo to ſatisfy thoſe Readers, who perhaps giving too much credit to a Modern * French Author, may believe that England (and particularly London) had been the greateſt, if not the only Scene of popular Tumults and Commotions.

* Pere D'Orleans Revolutions d'Angleterre.

In the beginning of this Year, [1] King Edward iſſued forth his Royal Proclamation throughout England, That all Foreign Knights and Gentlemen from any part of the World, who had deſire to come to the Feaſt of St. George, to be ſolemnly held by Him on the twenty third of April at Windſor, ſhould have his Letters of Safe-Conduct to paſs in and out of the Realm at their pleaſure for the ſpace of three Weeks, without the leaſt Impediment or Danger, there to partake of thoſe Martial Honors and Prizes, which ſhould attend the Exerciſes of thoſe Solemn Juſtings and Tourneaments, that He then intended to celebrate; ſo that preſently after, there came over into England the Duke of Brabant, with many great Lords and Knights of Germany, Flanders, France and Scotland; the Queen of which Kingdom came alſo into England, to viſit her Brother, and to be a ſpectatrix of theſe Martial Entertainments, which were ſaid to be made to ſet forth the King's Grandeur, as alſo to divert the Captive King of France, who yet ſeemed not much tranſported with theſe Shews, the Expence of which He thought muſt chiefly be defray'd by his Ranſom; wherefore [2] He ſaid merrily, That He never ſaw ſuch Great Entertainments without an after Reckoning. But the Charge was at preſent born by the Subjects of England; * for the King not long after ſet forth a Proclamation, whereby He ſummoned all thoſe who poſſeſſed Lands or Rents to the value of forty Pounds per Annum, to appear before Him, there to receive the Order of Knighthood; and by the Fines which moſt Perſons refuſing to accept that Dignity then pay'd, He raiſed a great ſum of Mony.

The K. ſummons all that held Lands to 40 l. per An. to be made Knights.

So ſoon as theſe Solemnities were over, [3] King Edward removed his Court to London, and there began to treat ſeriouſly with King John about a firm and laſting Peace, which was generally hoped for, yet it was long before matters could be brought to any tolerable iſſue: [4] for King Edward required Homage of that King for the Realm of France, as holding it of Him, whoſe Right it was; and upon this Condition He profer'd him his Liberty, and a perpetual Friendſhip: but this King John, having not loſt his Courage by Adverſity, utterly refuſed, ſaying, He would leave the Kingdom of France as free to his Children, as He had receiv'd it from his Father; and that as to Himſelf, He ſhould always prefer the Preſervation of France before his own Life. This Generous Magnanimity in a Captive Prince, gave King Edward occaſion not only to commiſerate his Calamity, but alſo more tenderly to reſpect and honor Him, as a Perſon worthy of a better Fortune: ſo that at laſt, eſpecially by the Interceſſion of the Prince of Wales, who was reſolved to made good the Promiſe that He had made to him the Night after he was taken Priſoner, it was agreed, That upon the French King's Releaſe, [5] ſeveral Countries and Territories (ſome of which were already in the Engliſh poſſeſſion) ſhould be given up to King Edward, free from any Homage or other Duty to be done for them, and He ſhould thereupon for ever renounce his Claim and Title to the Crown of France. But King John was alſo to pay the King of England for his Ranſom three millions of Crowns of Gold, which amount to Five hundred thouſand Pounds Sterling; a vaſt ſum in thoſe days.

But ſince theſe Articles did not then take effect, I ſhall refer the further mention of them to another Place, and here only take notice, that theſe (or much the like) were the next Year ſent over to the Dauphin, to be communicated to the Eſtates of the Kingdom; and what reception they then met with, you will find hereafter.

In the mean while the Agreement between the two Kings was eſtabliſhed by Oaths interchangeably made, and with their mutual kiſſing each other: yet for all this on one ſide or other, Sincerity was ſuppoſed to be wanting; the Writers of theſe Times repreſenting thoſe matters according to their particular Intereſt or Inclinations; [1] ſuch as favour the French lay the blame upon King Edward, as that He fomented the Commotions in France, and that He might put the breach of the late Agreement upon the French, hinder'd them from raiſing of the Mony for their King's Ranſom; and that He ſecretly aſſiſted the King of Navarre with Men, to enable Him the more to embroil that Kingdom, that He might at laſt ſubdue it for Himſelf.

The various repreſentations of theſe matters by Writers of different Parties.

[1] O. Raynold. ad hunc An. M. Vill. L. 8. c. 101.

But theſe Relations ſeem to be the effects of Malice or Miſtake; for as to any ſtopping or hindrance of the raiſing of the Mony, [2] Knighton tells us, That ſoon after the Departure of the Cardinals out of England, there came certain Perſons from France with Twelve hundred thouſand Crowns (tho I ſuppoſe it ſhould be but ſixty thouſand) in part of Payment for their King's Ranſom; but King Edward refuſed the Mony, becauſe they had not brought the Hoſtages with them for the reſt, as it had been agreed on. But they in their Defence anſwered, that a great part of France was ravaged by the Engliſh, contrary to the Form of the Agreement, ſo that the People of France durſt not go to their own Houſes. To this the King reply'd, That ſuch Engliſhmen who made War in France after the Agreement made, were Outlaws and Robbers, out of his Protection, nor would He juſtify them; but that He was not in the fault, appears by the Dauphin and the Eſtates of France, refuſing to perform the Terms which their King had now agreed to, as you will find hereafter.

[2] Id. ib.

We ſhall now look into France, and obſerve the ſad condition of that Kingdom; [3] for about this time the Common People or Peaſants, having been cruelly uſed and pillaged by the Nobleſſe or Gentry, and reduced to Beggary and Deſpair, took what Arms they could light on, and gathering together in great Companies, ſwore to extirpate all the Nobility. This Fury began in Beau-voiſin, where the Peaſants having choſen for their Head a certain Fellow of their own Condition, called Gailliet, they then named themſelves La Jaquerie; for the Derivation of which Nick-name, ſince the French Authors themſelves differ about it, I ſhall not pretend to give it you; it is ſufficient they were ſo cruel and miſchievous, that had the Towns and Cities joyn'd with theſe Levellers, there had been an end not only of the French Nobleſſe, but the Monarchy too; but by good fortune they ſhut their Gates againſt them, fearing to be plunder'd; and tho they ſeiz'd on Senlis, and ſome other weaker Towns and Caſtles, yet their endeavours upon ſtronger Places proved altogether in vain; and they now became ſo odious for their horrid and brutiſh Cruelties, that the Gentry of all the three Parties, French, Engliſh and Navarrois, combin'd together againſt them; and the King of Navarre defeated that Body of them that was headed by Cailliet, who being taken and crown'd with a red-hot Trivet, was then executed; and not long after the Dauphin cut in pieces above twenty thouſand more at ſeveral times; ſo that this Rebellion was quaſhed on the ſudden.

The King of Navarre defeats a great Body of them.

The[1] reſt of this Year was ſpent in Quarrels and Civil Wars between the Dauphin and the King of Navarre, who had again taken Arms, becauſe (as I ſaid before) his Towns and Caſtles in Normandy were not reſtor'd to Him, according to the late Agreement; wherefore joining with the Faction of the Provoſt of the Merchants, He was again admitted into the City of Paris, where He made another Speech to the People, who thereupon declar'd Him their General; which ſo provok'd the Nobleſſe, who looked upon themſelves as ſlighted, that they join'd themſelves more firmly to the Dauphin in order to beſiege Paris: but the Heads of the Faction being advertiſed of it, obliged the Univerſity to go to that Prince and intercede for them, offering any Satisfaction that He could in reaſon deſire. But this He utterly refuſed, unleſs He might have twelve of the chief Mutineers deliver'd intirely to his Mercy; whereupon they confederated more firmly than ever, and joining themſelves with the King of Navarre, made a vigorous Reſiſtance, and fortified the City anew againſt the Dauphin.

But[2] He ſoon found means to break this good Correſpondence, for ſome of his Party within the Town raiſed Jealouſies in their Heads againſt the King of Navarre, becauſe He retain'd ſo many Engliſh in his Pay; whereupon the ordinary Townſmen riſing on the ſudden, kill'd above three hundred of them; but Marcel, the Provoſt of the Merchants, being wholly of the King of Navarre's Faction, reſcued the reſt under pretence of putting them in Priſon, and then let them eſcape in the Night, who getting to the reſt of their Countrymen that were then quarter'd at St. Denis, reveng'd their Deaths upon all the Pariſians they could meet with; who being highly provok'd at this, conſtrain'd the King of Navarre and the Provoſt to lead them out of Town to be reveng'd on the Engliſh. But they having notice of their coming (whether by Treachery of their Chiefs, or otherwiſe, I cannot determin) laid an Ambuſh for them, into which the Citizens falling, above ſix hundred of them were kill'd upon the ſpot, which ſo enrag'd the reſt, that they put the King out of all Command, and would not admit Him again into the City; and as for their Provoſt, they had been in that ſuſpicion, that upon his going about to let in that Prince and his Engliſh Soldiers into the City, he was taken in the Act, and being quickly diſpatch'd by ſome of the Dauphin's Party, his Body was drawn by the Heels about the Streets, and after the Execution of ſeveral others his Accomplices, the Dauphin was again admitted into the City, and own'd as Regent of the Kingdom.

Yet notwithſtanding theſe advantageous Terms, Philip the King's Brother refuſed to be included in this Treaty, plainly telling Him He was under an Incantation; and preſently leaving his Party, rode away to St. Saveur le Vicount, where he was kindly received by the Governor, who highly applauded his Conſtancy to the Engliſh Intereſt. The French Hiſtorians relate this ſudden change of the King of Navarre's Mind, as a particular Favour of Heaven at that time; but I ſuppoſe there was no greater Myſtery in the matter, than that finding He was not like to have any aſſiſtance from K. Edward (who was jealous of his Pretenſions to the Crown of France) and that he was offer'd good Conditions from the Dauphin, he thought it beſt to accept them.

~~But~~ Al tho this Peace gave ſome eaſe to Paris, [4] yet it yielded very little Relief to the neighbouring Provinces; for the Gariſons of thoſe Places that had held them before for the King of Navarre, to the end that they might continue their Plundering, declar'd themſelves for the Engliſh. Thus the Lord d' Ambreticourt and Heynalder ravaged Champagne, by the means of divers Caſtles which he was poſſeſs'd of on the Rivers of Marne and Seine, until Broquard de Feneſtrage, a Knight of Lorrain, who then ſerv'd the French, commanding a ſtrong Party, defeated and took that Lord Priſoner in a great Fight near Nogent ſur Seine, and thereby freed the adjacent Country; tho it had no great effect, becauſe there were ſo many more left of the ſame Trade, among the chief of whom we may reckon [5] Sir Robert Knolles, who from a common Soldier (as I ſaid before) had by his Valor raiſed himſelf to great Riches and Reputation, and about this time made an Expedition from the Borders of Bretagne with a ſmall Army of three thouſand Men; and marching along by the River Loire till he came into Berry, he paſs'd on burning and ravaging the Country: So that long after in memory of Him, the ſharp Points and Gable-ends of overthrown Houſes and Churches were call'd Knolles's Miters. But before his Paſſage into Berry, he burnt and plunder'd the Suburbs of Orleans on the Loire, none daring to come forth of the City againſt him; and his Name was ſo terrible at that time, that he had viſited Avignon, and made even the Pope and Cardinals redeem themſelves, had he not received Intelligence, that divers Noblemen of France had raiſed a powerful Force againſt him, from whom he and his Party retired in time into the Marches of Bretagne, from whence he ſet out.

Let us now return to the Affairs of England, and here we ſhall find as much Peace and Tranquillity as there were Wars and Commotions in France; for [1] the King of Scots by the Conſent of his Nobility came hither about All-hollantide to give King Edward a Viſit, and He offer'd to accompany him whither He pleas'd in his Wars, provided his Kingdom might be eas'd in ſome meaſure of the great Ranſom which had been ſet upon Him by the King: He alſo deſired a free Trade between the Merchants of both Nations, and that the Scotiſh Scholars might come ſafely to ſtudy in our Univerſities. Moſt of which Requeſts being but reaſonable, K. Edward granted; but as for his Service in the Wars, He ſaid, He hoped there would be no occaſion of making any farther War in France, there being now great hopes of Peace between the two Nations. Yet King David continued ſeveral Months in England together with his Queen, and during his ſtay here, there were divers amicable Viſits made between Him and his Brother of France; ſo that K. Edward kept his Chriſtmas with them both at London, where at a great Entertainment made on purpoſe, He ſat between the two Kings at one Table; but not, as [2] one of the Scotiſh Hiſtorians relate, as Captives, in a vain oſtentation of his good Fortune; for it appears by our Hiſtories as well as Records, theſe two Kings were never Captives together in England at any one Chriſtmas; King John being brought Priſoner into England in May, and King David was releaſed the September following: Nor was it any mark of Arrogance in King Edward kindly to invite both theſe Princes (one of whom was his Brother-in-law, and the other his near Kinſman) to an Entertainment at this Solemnity: and He might very well ſit in the middle between them, tho the moſt honourable Place, not only to avoid any Competition about Precedency, but as taking Himſelf for true King of France, and David of Scotland as a Homager to England; nor do we find theſe Princes took it ill at his hands, ſince they ever after continued to expreſs a great Kindneſs and Reſpect for Him, as long as they lived. This Paſſage properly belongs to the next Year (according to our Account) tho to continue our Relation of theſe Affairs without interruption, I have put it under this.

As for Eccleſiaſtical Affairs, I cannot but take notice, how that this Year [4] that great Controverſy between the Clergy and the two Univerſities of England, and the four Orders of Mendicant Friers, was ſolemnly debated before the Pope by Richard Fitz-Ralph Arch-Biſhop of Armagh, and Primate of Ireland, and repreſented as a great Prejudice to all the ſecular Clergy; for the Friers truſting to their Privileges, not only inſinuated themſelves into the Houſes of dying men, but alſo enticed away young Scholars from the Univerſities and publick Schools; ſo that many Perſons forbore ſending their Sons to either of theſe Places, for fear they ſhould be inveigled away by ſome of thoſe Orders, where they were bred up in great Ignorance, Lazineſs, and Superſtition. But notwithſtanding all the Remonſtrances of this worthy Prelate, theſe Orders all joining together, ſo prevail'd by their joint Purſes, that the Pope, inſtead of reſtraining or ſuppreſſing them, further enlarg'd and confirm'd their Privileges.

[6] Du Cheſne p. 681.

The late [5] Agreement between the Kings of England and France was now again renewed and more ſolemnly confirm'd at a new Treaty held at London between King Edward with his Son the Black Prince, and King John with the Lord James of Bourbon, about the beginning of this Year. The Conditions were theſe:

I. That [6] Aquitain ſhould remain intirely to King Edward and his Heirs for ever, together with Gaſcoigne, Poictou, Touraine, Santogne, Perigort, Quercy, Limoſin, Angouleſmois, Calais, Guiſnes, Boulonis, and the Earldom of Ponthieu, without any Reſort, Homage, or Tribute to be paid therefore, even as abſolutely as He held his Kingdom of England.

II. That King John ſhould pay four Millions of Crowns of Gold for the Ranſom of Himſelf, and the other French Lords, Priſoners in England; that is to ſay, three Millions for Himſelf, and a fourth for his Lords.

III. In conſideration of all which, King Edward was to give up and wholly remit all his Right in and to the Dutchy of Normandy, Anjou and Maine; and to renounce and lay aſide the Claim He had to that Crown; and never after take upon him the Stile, Quality or Title of King of France.

This [a] Agreement was ſign'd and ſealed by both the Kings on the twenty fourth of March, and a Copy thereof ſent into France by the Lord James of Bourbon, and the Lord Arnold d' Endreghen, which latter was ſtill a Priſoner, but had now obtain'd leave to go over upon his Parole to ſollicit his Ranſom, and to carry the above-recited Articles; [t] with which theſe Lords immediately went to Paris, and deliver'd them to the Dauphin and the King of Navarre, who was now again reconcil'd to him, and engag'd in the French Intereſt; and this Prince's Opinion was, that the Eſtates of the Kingdom ought to be conſulted in ſo weighty an Affair. Theſe being preſently aſſembl'd, ſoon agreed in their Reſolution, that the Terms propos'd were too hard and grievous to be born or aſſented to; with whom the Dauphin and the King of Navarre alſo concurring, they return'd their final Anſwer by the ſame Lords that brought them, That the Articles above-mention'd were ſo highly prejudicial to them and their Country, that they had much rather endure far greater Miſeries than they had already done, than ever ſuffer ſo conſiderable a Loſs and Detriment to the Realm of France; and that they could not either in Honour or Conſcience deſire the Liberty of their King, when it could not be effected without enſlaving the Kingdom.

These Articles are ſent to the Dauphin and K. of Navarre, who thereupon call an Aſſembly of the Eſtates.

Upon [a] the return of theſe Meſſengers, not only King Edward, but the French King was very much concern'd at theſe Proceedings; and highly blaming his Son's and the Eſtates unkindneſs to Him, plainly told King Edward, that He fear'd there was no way to conquer this obſtinacy of his Subjects, but by Arms; only He bewail'd his own Misfortune, who had no way left to regain his Liberty, but by the Succeſs of his Conqueror: And King Edward Himſelf being much incens'd at this Treatment, openly proteſted, that He would before the end of Winter enter France with a powerful Army, and ſtay there till He ſhould put an end to the War either by his Arms, or elſe by making an honourable Peace. Whereupon He again ſent over to the Dauphin, bidding Him look to Himſelf; for as ſoon as the Truce was ended, x He would give Him a Viſit at Paris, to ſee how able He was for a War, which Himſelf had thus pulled upon his own Head. At which time He made greater Preparations than ever He did before; about which we ſhall now leave Him imploy'd for a while, and relate what was done in the mean time in France, where the War being ſtill carried on by the Companions as hotly as ever, one of the chiefeſt of whoſe Leaders was the ſame Sir Robert Knolles abovemention'd, that had even during the Truce in the former Year, as alſo in this, poſſeſs'd himſelf of a great many ſtrong Places in Bretagne and Normandy; for which fearing he ſhould be call'd to a ſevere account by the King, he had no way to make his Peace, but by the mediation of ſome Friends at Court; when about the time the Truce expir'd, [3] he offer'd the King to ſurrender up all he had got, both Towns, Caſtles, and other Booties, into his hands, without any Conditions: By which frank and handſom Submiſſion he ſo much gain'd his Favour, that He not only pardon'd him, but alſo made him a Grant of divers Caſtles and Lordſhips, in conſideration of his great Valour and Abilities, as alſo that he had caſt himſelf entirely upon the King's Goodneſs. And tho Sir Robert was about Michaelmas following taken Priſoner by the French, yet he was ſoon after reſcu'd by his Friend Hanekin Francois, who came that way by chance.

Beſides him I may alſo mention [1] Sir Peter Audley, Governor of the Caſtle of Beaufort in Champaigne, who had lately like to have ſurprized the City of Chalons in Burgundy, and did a great deal of miſchief to the French in thoſe Parts, till at laſt he [2] died in his Bed this Year. After whoſe Deceaſe the Engliſh-men and Almains thereabouts (who now continued the War in King Edward's Name) reſolved to make choice of Sir [3] Euſtace d' Ambreticourt, a valiant young Heynalder, for their Captain, that had many Caſtles and ſtrong Places under his Command, but was lately taken Priſoner in a Fight, and a great many of his Men kill'd by Sir Broquard de Feneſtrages, a Knight of Lorain, who commanded in thoſe Parts under the Dauphin. Then Sir Euſtace, being ranſomed by the joint Contribution of the Engliſh Gariſons in thoſe Parts, who deſired him for their Commander, did not long afterwards a great deal of miſchief to the French, by taking many of their Towns, as you will find the next Year. Thus was France cruelly afflicted, not only by the War between the two Kings, but alſo during the Truce, when they ſuffer'd almoſt as much as if the War had ſtill continued.

But in Flanders the French Affairs met with ſome better Succeſs; [4] for the Common People of thoſe Parts were ſo far prevail'd upon by their Earl Lewis, that declaring abſolutely for the French, they expel'd the Engliſh Merchants ~~into~~ Brabant; and thoſe Citizens of Bruges who ſtood firm to the Engliſh, were either impriſon'd or put to death by the Earl's Command. At which Proceedings King Edward was ſo provok'd, that He iſſued out a Proclamation, commanding all Flemings to depart the Realm by the latter end of July next enſuing: And then at the expiration of the Truce, the French were alſo warn'd to depart the Kingdom.

Nothing elſe happen'd worth the noting this Summer, but [5] that the Lord John of Gaunt, Earl of Richmond, the King's third Son, being now in the nineteenth Year of his Age, by virtue of a ſpecial Diſpenſation from the Pope, married the Lady Blanche his Couſin, ſecond Daughter to Henry Duke of Lancaſter; the Marriage Feaſt being kept at Reading in Berkſhire with great Pomp. And I muſt here obſerve, that after the Death of her Father, and her elder Siſter without Iſſue, this Earl John was in her Right created by the King his Father Duke of Lancaſter.

[6] Froiſ. c. 205. A great many Men of Quality come to Calais to ſerve the King as Voluntiers.

King Edward [6] ſpent the reſt of this Summer in making vaſt Preparations for his Voyage into France, upon the News of which a great number of Lords, Knights, and other Voluntiers of Quality came to Calais, expecting the King's coming over, who not arriving ſo ſoon as they look'd for (for his Preparations requir'd a great deal of time) they ſtaid there ſo long till moſt of them had ſpent all they had; which the King hearing of, and fearing they ſhould return home and deſert Him, ſent over the Duke of Lancaſter with four hundred Men at Arms and two thouſand Archers, to lead them forth into the French Territories. So ſoon as the Duke could get over to Calais, he preſently perform'd what he was ſent about, and marching towards St. Omers, paſſed it by, and advancing about ſixteen Leagues farther, paſſed the Somme; but aſſaulted the Town of Bray upon that River, and there receiving a Repulſe with the loſs of Sir Thomas Murrers a Banneret, and others, he roſe from thence, and went on further upon the ſame Stream, till he came to Cerecey, which having taken without any great difficulty, and there refreſh'd his men who were in great want of Proviſions, he repaſſed the River again at the ſame Place as he had done before, and upon the News of King Edward's arrival returned back towards Calais about the beginning of November.

Anno Dom. MCCCLIX.

The D. of Lancaſter arrives there with ſome Forces, and marches into the French Territories.

~~But~~ we ſhall now look back into England, and ſee what the King did there before his going over into France, and renewal of the War; in order to which [1] He gave command, that the French Priſoners ſhould be kept in divers ſtrong Caſtles, and King John and his Son be confin'd to the Tower of London, and not allow'd that Liberty they had before enjoy'd; of which ſome of our Hiſtorians give this Reaſon, that it was for fear leſt King John, if kept near the Sea-Coaſt, ſhould be reſcued by a French Fleet and Army, which they then threaten'd to ſet out: And this I look upon as a more likely Reaſon of this Procedure than what [2] H. Knighton relates, that He was uſed with this Severity, becauſe of his Inſincerity and Double-dealing with King Edward: For this Author tells us particularly, that when the Engliſh Ambaſſadors were returning from Avignon, having compleated the Buſineſs they went about, 'twas diſcover'd that King John, contrary to his Oath, had ſent Letters into France, importing, that whatſoever He had agreed to with King Edward, was only for convenience-ſake, in the preſent circumſtance of his Affairs; but it was never his Intention to part with one foot of the Land in France to the King of England: and the Bearer thereof was taken at Sea, and upon ſearch theſe Letters were found about him, ſealed with King John's Privy Seal; and that upon this double-dealing, King Edward thought fit to confine Him more cloſely. But it does not ſeem at all agreeable to the French King's Character of a Man of Honour, to be guilty of ſo mean a Treachery; neither does any other Writer report this Action, except this Author: Yet t~~he reſt of~~ his Account may be true (tho wrong plac'd in point of time) that King Edward thought fit to commit that King to the Cuſtody of the Lord Deincourt at [3] Somerton-Caſtle; whereas He was i~~ndeed~~ firſt ſecured in the Caſtle of Hertford, under the Cuſtody of the Lord Roger Beauchamp, from whence He was the Year following again removed to the Tower of London; in all which Removals his Son Prince Philip ſtill accompanied Him.

bring that Kingdom to accept thoſe reaſonable Terms, which had been already offer'd.

Then [1] K. Edward having muſter'd his Army, which was very great, conſiſting in all of above a hundred thouſand Men, marched from Calais upon the 4*th* of November, being accompany'd with the Prince his eldeſt Son, the Lord Lionel his 2*d* Son, with their two Brothers, John Earl of Richmond, and the Lord Edmund of Langeley; beſides whom there were alſo the chief of the Nobility of England, viz. the Earls of Marche, Warwick, Suffolk, Stafford and Salisbury, with others needleſs to be here recited; and of Barons the Lords Piercy, Neville, Spencer, Chandois, Cobham, and Grey of Codonor, with many others, whoſe Names I alſo paſs over. There were likewiſe two Biſhops who attended him, John Sinwell of Lincoln, and John Hatfield of Durham; beſides divers Noblemen of Flanders and Brabant, as Sir Henry Eam, and Sir Frank van Hall, who had been always of King Edward's ſide, and now brought each of them two hundred Lances in their Retinue, with divers other foreign Noblemen. Then the King divided his Army into three ſeveral Battalions, that ſo they might be in leſs want of Proviſions and Forage; the firſt whereof He led Himſelf, the ſecond was commanded by his Son the Prince, and the third by the Duke of Lancaſter, who in his return met the King between Calais and the Abby of Liques. In this Order the Army paſſing by the City of Arras, marched thro Artois, where they found the Country wholly deſtroy'd by the continual Wars, and that little Proviſion which was left, carried into the wall'd Towns; ſo that had not the King brought all ſorts of Victuals along with Him, his Men might have periſh'd for Hunger: Yet the Horſes were much put to it for want of Hay and Provender, for it being now the beginning of Winter, there was but little Graſs or other Forage left; and the Weather ſoon after the King's arrival proving very rainy, the Ways grew bad and troubleſome both to Horſe and Man; but He was reſolved to bear with patience what He could not prevent: However the King marched on by eaſy Journies, till He came into a dryer Country, as far as Bapowne in Artois, and having paſſed thro that Province, turn'd into Cambreſis, where finding greater plenty of Proviſions, He ſtaid ſome days to refreſh his Men; and then He marched forwards into La Tierache, foraging and ſpoiling the Country as He went.

He then return'd to the King, whom he found at the Abby of Tenny, and from thence He marched to the City of Rheims in Champagne, before which He immediatly ſitting down, blocked it up with all his Army. Within it were John de Craon Arch-Biſhop of that City, the Earl of Porcien, and other French Noblemen of thoſe Parts, to whom (as Villani* relates) King Edward ſent a Summons by his Heralds, proferring them very advantageous Conditions, if they would ſurrender that City, that He

He might there receive the Crown of France; but their Anſwer was, that they had but one lawful King, to whom they reſolved to continue faithful unto Death. But by the way, I cannot believe that King Edward would at this time make any ſuch Demand, ſince his coming over was not to recover the Crown of France, but to force the French Nobility to conſent to thoſe Articles that had been already agreed upon in England between their King and Himſelf: For what advantage could the bare Ceremony of a Coronation have given Him over thoſe, who when that had been performed, would ſtill have oppos'd his Title, and diſown'd his Authority? However this Siege continued many weeks, tho the City received no great Damage; for the King forbore to make any Aſſault upon it, either becauſe He would reſerve his Forces for ſome more conſiderable Enterprize, or out of ſome other Conſiderations, which at this diſtance of time I ſhall not take upon me to determin; ſo that He was contented with keeping it block'd up moſt part of this Winter, to wit, from the end of November till the beginning of Lent; and then finding the City was not to be taken either by Force or Famine, He thought fit to raiſe the Siege, as you will find hereafter.

But ſince this did not fall out till the next Year, I ſhall conclude this with what was perform'd in the mean while by the Duke of Lancaſter, [1] who commanded a ſtrong Detachment of Horſe and Archers; and being accompany'd with the Earls of Richmond and Marche, advanced farther into the Country, to take in certain Caſtles and other Places of Strength. The firſt they came to was the ſtrong Caſtle of Cernoy en Dormois, to which they gave a briſk Aſſault. Here the Lord of Mucidan, a Gaſcoigne Nobleman (who was very well belov'd for his Courteſy and Courage) being kill'd with a Stone, the Engliſh were at that time repuls'd; yet all the Lords there preſent were ſo concern'd at his loſs, that they ſwore never to ſtir from thence till they had taken the Place; whereupon renewing the Aſſault, the Gaſcoigners ſcal'd the Walls, whilſt the Engliſh Archers ſhot ſo thick upon the Enemy, that not being able to ſtand to make any Defence, the Caſtle was taken by Storm, and the Gariſon (except two Captains) all put to the Sword.

[2] From thence they marched two Leagues further to Autry en Dormois, lying on the River Aiſne, which was accounted ſtronger than Cernoy; but before they came thither the Inhabitants were fled. From thence they went back to St. Menehou, a Town in Champaigne, which upon their approach the Townſmen deſerted; whereupon the Engliſh General returned to the Camp before Rheims, and gave the King an Account of their Succeſs in this Expedition. Nothing elſe happen'd of moment all the reſt of this Year, only that about this time [3] King Edward received a ſmall Defeat by the taking Priſoner a Lord of Gomegines a Hainalder, and the killing and routing of his Party, thro his inconſiderate Raſhneſs in marching away before with a few men to forage, and leaving the main Body of them behind him in a Village called Hercigny; where after his being taken, they were all made Priſoners by the Count of Roye and the Lord of Robſart. This happen'd towards the latter end of December; [4] but to make ſome amends for this Loſs, the Lord Burgherſh went with a Detachment from before Rheims, and laid Siege to the Town and Caſtle of Cormicy, the former former of which was taken by ſurprize in the Night; but the latter proving too ſtrong to be won by Aſſault or Battery, the Walls being very thick, he was forc'd to imploy certain Pioneers to undermine them, which they did with ſo good Succeſs, that having dug under the chief Tower of the Caſtle, they ſupported it with Props; and being juſt ready to ſet fire to them, the Lord Burgherſh thought fit to give the Governor notice of it, who coming out upon ſafe Conduct, and having gone into the Mine, and ſeen the danger the Place was in, preſently ſurrender'd, upon condition that He and the Gariſon ſhould remain Priſoners; and ſo they were brought away to the Camp before Rheims.

The Methods taken by the Dauphin to hinder K. Edward's Progreſs.

The Siege there ſtill continuing, [1] the King kept his Chriſtmas before it, but without making any conſiderable Progreſs toward taking of the Place. We ſhall now ſee what the Dauphin and the Eſtates of France had been doing in the mean time for the Defence of their Country, when they had ſo powerful an Enemy in the very Bowels of it. In the firſt place, ſetting aſide all private Differences and Factions, the Dauphin with the Lords of his Council, gather'd a vaſt number of Men at Arms to Paris, and put ſtrong Gariſons into the Cities and Fortreſſes which they ſuſpected King Edward had an eye upon; for being warn'd by the late ill Succeſs of his Father, and the great Loſſes of his Grandfather, He reſolved no more to give the King of England Battel, but rather to keep Him ſhort, by removing all manner of Proviſions into the ſtrong Places; and in the mean while to act only on the defenſive, well knowing that Hunger and Delay muſt cool the Courage of the valianteſt Soldiers, and that the Treaſures of the richeſt Kings would be exhauſted by ſo tedious a War: And this wary and politick Proceeding met with better Succeſs than the more ſharp and downright Methods that had been before taken.

All Men from 16 to 60 are commanded to be array'd to oppoſe the French.

In the mean while [2] the French, to divert the War from their own doors, as alſo to revenge the Injuries they had ſuffer'd, gather'd together in the Ports of Normandy a mighty Navy, conſiſting of a hundred Sail of Ships and twenty thouſand Men. Theſe under [3] the Conduct of the Earl of St. Paul ſail'd for England, and landing at Rye and Haſtings, plunder'd thoſe Towns, and kill'd the Inhabitants. [4] The like they did at Winchelſea, which they plunder'd and burnt, killing the Men, and raviſhing the Women after a moſt cruel and ſhameful manner. [5] England being alarm'd at theſe Devaſtations, there came out a Proclamation from the Lord Thomas of Woodſtock, and the Council, requiring that all Laymen whatſoever, between the Age of ſixteen and ſixty, ſhould be array'd for the Wars, and of theſe the luſtieſt and beſt arm'd ſhould be ſent to the Cinque Ports to the King's Admirals, for the defence of the Kingdom: And the Arch-Biſhops alſo and Biſhops thro their reſpective Dioceſſes, granted great Indulgences to all thoſe who would go to Sea againſt their Enemies; particularly, that every of them might chuſe his Confeſſor at his pleaſure. Thus by a pious Fraud (a good effect of a falſe Motive) were Men then encourag'd to do their Duty, and defend their Country when it was in danger. The Biſhops and Clergy alſo, tho they could not ſerve in Perſon, yet found men ſufficient to fight in their ſtead, according to the value of their ſeveral Dignities and Promotions; but before theſe great Forces could get together, the French French not daring to proceed farther, were gone on board, and ſail'd away for France, which they did in ſo much haſte (upon the News of the Country's coming in upon them) that in their going on board many of them were drown'd, which with thoſe that were alſo kill'd by the Country Militia amounted to above four hundred men. Then upon the departure of the French, the [1] City of London, with the other Ports of the Kingdom, ^ made up a Fleet of above a hundred Sail, on board of which were fourteen thouſand Men at Arms and Archers, who reſolving to be reveng'd for the late Inſults of the French, ſail'd over to the Coaſt of France, and ſcowr'd the Seas from Bologne to Harfleur in Normandy; and landing wherever they pleas'd, they ravaged, burnt and ſpoil'd the Country, yet without taking any Place of note, or ſo much as meeting with the French Fleet, as I can find. But we ſhall now give an account of King Edward, and the reſt of his Actions, before the great Treaty of Bretigny.

[2] The King had lain about two Months before Rheims, in all which time He never offer'd to aſſault the Place, either becauſe He thought it would be in vain, or elſe to ſpare the Lives of his Subjects; but being at laſt tired out with the tediouſneſs of the Siege, eſpecially becauſe Forage was ſo difficult to be got this Winter-time, and finding his Men began to loſe their Horſes, and to want Victuals themſelves, He therefore raiſed the Siege, and marched towards Chalons in Champaigne. But paſſing by that Place, He proceeded towards Troyes, and encamped about Mery ſur Seyne; his vaſt Army covering the Face of the Country for about eight Leagues together. While the King lay here, the Lord Mortimer went with the Vanguard to attempt St. Florentine; but after a furious Aſſault made upon it in vain, he gave it over. About this time the King came up to him, and departed from thence to Tonnerre in Burgundy, which City He took by Aſſault; but the Caſtle He could not gain, tho He often ſtorm'd it; for there was in it the Lord Moreau de Fiennes, with a very ſtrong Gariſon: So having ſtaid there five days to refreſh his Army with Wine and other Proviſions, He paſs'd over the River Armanſon, and took the Town of Noyers without any difficulty. From thence He marched to Mont-Real, and ſo to Avallon on the River Couſſon, where He tarry'd from Aſh-Wedneſday to Midlent, becauſe of the great Convenience He found there of getting Proviſion for his Army, which was brought Him from Flavigny, a neighbouring Town that had lately been taken by John Alanſon, one of his Officers: And here the King had ſome leiſure to divert Himſelf with Hawking and Hunting, having brought his Hawks and Hounds along with Him.

Then the Prince of Wales paſſed with his Battalion by a little Town on the Loing in Gaſtinois, called Moret, till He came to the ſtrong Fortreſs of Le Pleſſis aux Tournelles, which was then an Engliſh Gariſon, but had been beleaguered by the French for ſome time; who having fortified their Camp with a ſtrong Tower fenced with Ditches, gave many fierce Aſſaults on the Engliſh. And tho the French heard for certain, that the Prince of Wales was coming that way, yet they had ſuch confidence in their Works, that they would not ſtir from the Place: but they paid dear for their Preſumption; for the Fifth day after the Prince's Arrival their Tower was taken, and moſt of them within the Works put to the Sword: no more than Forty ſeven being taken alive, moſt of whom were Noblemen and Perſons of Quality, whoſe Names I paſs over.

Upon the King's approach near Paris, the Dauphin offers a Treaty by the Pope's Legate.

Then [2] on the laſt of March (being the Week before Eaſter) the King advancing forward with his Army, drew near to the City of Paris, and encamped at Bourg la Reine within two Leagues of it, his Army being quarter'd at Longemeau, between Mont-lehery and Chaſtres, and all the Towns thereabout as far as Corbeil. At the ſight of this formidable Army, Charles the Dauphin and Regent of France, began to make ſome Overtures towards a Treaty, eſpecially becauſe King Edward in Reverence of the approaching Feſtival intended not formally to begin his Siege till after Eaſter: hereupon, [3] by the ſpecial Interceſſion of Father Simon de Langres, Provincial of the Jacobin-Fryars, and Legat from Pope Innocent VI. King Edward yielded to admit of a Treaty to be held at the Maladerie, or Hoſpital of Longemeau, on the Good Friday following, the Solemnity of the Day being look'd on as an enforcement to ſo pious an Undertaking: at which time and place there appeared as Commiſſioners for King Edward, Henry Duke of Lancaſter, the Earls of Warwick and Northampton, with the Lords Manny and Cheney; and for the Regent appeared the Lord Moreau de Fiennes, Conſtable of France, Mareſchal Bouciquault, with divers other Lords to the number of Six. whoſe Names we paſs by, as we do alſo the Debates of this Treaty, ſince they came to no manner of effect.

The Treaty is again renewed.

Wherefore [4] King Edward, to bring the French to hearken to the Terms propos'd, marched on Eaſter Tueſday to the City of Paris: whereupon on the Friday following, being the tenth of April, at the earneſt Importunity of the foreſaid Simon de Langres, and of Androine de la Roche Abbot of Clugny, who was then newly come from the Pope for that purpoſe, another Treaty was appointed to be held; but neither yet could matters be brought to any good iſſue, ſo they parted leaving all things in the ſame ſtate, as when they firſt met. On the Sunday following King Edward drew up his Army into three Battalions, each of which was divided into three Bodies; and then He forthwith ſent the Duke of Lancaſter with his Heralds to the Regent of France, who was within the City with a great Army, to demand Battel of Him; [1] aſſuring Him that if King Edward ſhould loſe the Day, He would never after claim or aſſume any Right or Title to the Crown of France. But for all this the Cautelous Regent declin'd to anſwer his Challenge; which when the King heard, He was very much diſpleas'd, and upon the Lord Manny's Requeſt ſent him forthwith a great many Knights that had been newly Dubbed, who together with other Forces were to ſet fire on the Suburbs, to provoke the French to come out and give Him Battel; whereupon they made a briſk and vigorous Aſſault on the Works and Barriers on that ſide, but were ſo ſtoutly defended by the French Nobleſſe, (of which there were a great number at that time in the City) that all the endeavours of the Engliſh prov'd in vain, tho they carry'd on the Aſſault from Morning till Noon. Yet the Dauphin was ſo wary, that He would let none of the French Nobleſſe ſally out beyond the Barriers; only [2] in the Afternoon, when the Fight was pretty well over, He permitted Sixty French Knights and Gentlemen to go out for their Diverſion, and Tourney with the like number of the Engliſh, who, having been lately Knighted, were deſirous to ſhew their Valour, which they did with ſuch good Succeſs, that having ſlain ſome of the French and grievouſly wounded others, they obliged the reſt to retire.

The King offers the Dauphin Battel.

[2] H.K. c.2623.

Sixty French Gentlemen go out to Tourney with as many of the Engliſh, who worſt them.

Theſe Actions being over, the Lord Walter Manny return'd to the Army, which tarried ſtill in thoſe Fields, all that Day and the Night following; but the next Morning being Monday the thirteenth of April, ſeeing no Provocations could bring the Dauphin to a Battel, and that it was morally impoſſible to force (otherwiſe than by Famine) ſo great a City (which was not only now well fortified, but furniſhed with ſo many able Soldiers, beſides the vaſt number of its Inhabitants, that he could not wholly block it up) the King therefore reſolved to riſe from thence, till a more favourable opportunity offer'd, and in the mean while to march with Fire and Sword thro Beauce and Le Maine, till He came into Bretagne; and there having refreſhed his Army, He intended to go back and renew the Siege of Paris in July or Auguſt, and to famiſh them by a long Siege into a Surrender; for as we ſaid before, He had made a Vow never to return into England, till He had brought France to his Terms, either by fair means or by Force.

The King reſolves to raiſe the Siege of Paris for the preſent.

Accordingly [3] on the Monday after Eaſter He raiſed his Camp, and began to march towards Mont-le-hery, reſolving to paſs along by the Banks of the Loire to Bretagne, and wholly to reduce that Dutchy under the Obedience of the Young Earl of Montfort his Son-in-Law, and then to return into France.

[3] Froiſ. c.211.

He marches from Mont-le-hery, in order to enter Bretagne.

And here I cannot but obſerve concerning the Actions of this as well as the preceding Year, that King Edward going over into France in the beginning of the laſt Winter, and carrying on the Siege of Rheims ſo remiſly as He did, and riſing from it without taking the Place; as alſo his marching to Paris, and meeting there with no better Succeſs, but going away without either forcing his Enemy to fight, or being able to ſtay there long enough Himſelf to block it up and reduce it by Famine; I ſay, theſe things being ſo ill tim'd, cauſed ſome Reflections to be made upon that King's Conduct: For tho He had been near Six Months in France, and was Maſter of the open Country without any oppoſition; yet not being able to take any City or ſtrong Town, He had neither anſwered the Expectations the World had of this great Expedition, nor perform'd any thing worthy the vaſt Charge and Expence of ſo great an Army: whereas could He have order'd his Affairs ſo, as to have gone over preſently after the Expiration of the Truce, or have immediatly marched to Paris, and beſieged that City upon his firſt coming over, whilſt his Army was freſh and not harraſſed and fatigued with the unhappy Siege of Rheims, He might (in all probability) have either forced the Dauphin to come out and fight (and it was great odds but the Victory would have fallen on the Engliſh ſide) or if He refus'd it, the King by blocking up the Place, might have reduced the French for want of Proviſions to make Peace upon what Terms He ſhould pleaſe to have propoſed. And if you conſider the ſad and deplorable condition of France at that time, you will have reaſon to ackowledge, That without a particular Providence, it had been impoſſible for King Edward to have fail'd of making Himſelf abſolute Maſter of that Kingdom; and therefore nothing leſs than the deſperate eſtate it was then in, as well as the ſudden alteration of the King's Mind, by a ſtrange and unlooked-for accident, could ever have made the former ſubmit to, or the latter to have accepted of a Peace upon thoſe Terms, as you will find they not long after did, an Account of which it is time for me now to give you.

Upon K. Edward*'s departure the* Dauphin and the French Princes reſolve to apply themſelves again to the King for a Peace.

So ſoon as King Edward with the Engliſh Army was removed from before Paris, ' the Dauphin and his two Brothers, with the Princes of the Blood, and the reſt of the Nobility then in the City, began to enter into a ſerious Conſultation, what was beſt to be done for themſelves and the whole Kingdom, in ſuch nice and dangerous Circumſtances: for they knew King Edward's great Courage and indefatigable Reſolution, and that He intended before Autumn to return to the Siege of that City; nor had they any ſufficient means left to oppoſe Him, not only for want of Forces to meet their Enemies in the Field, but chiefly becauſe the large Rents and Revenues both of the Church and State, were either quite loſt, or elſe reduc'd to little or nothing; when by reaſon of the Wars the greateſt part of the Lands lay uncultivated. Upon which Conſiderations it was reſolved by the Dauphin and his Council, That King Edward ſhould be again apply'd to, and ſome Advantageous Offers made Him, in order to a Peace.

Whereupon freſh Envoys are diſpatched to the King for that end.

And ' for this end they preſently diſpatch'd William de Montegu, Biſhop of Terouenne, by whoſe Direction moſt of the Publick Affairs had lately been order'd; together with two prudent and pious Prelats, Androine de la Roche, Abbot of Cluigny, and Father Simon de Langres the Pope's Nuncio above-mention'd, with the Lord of Authun, to follow after King Edward with certain Propoſitions of Peace: and finding Him in Beauce going towards Gaillardon, immediately they addreſſed themſelves to Him with all humility, that in order to a Peace between France and Himſelf, He would permit the Treaty to be again renew'd. To which the King, hoping for more advantageous Conditions than had hitherto been offer'd, readily conſented; and it was immediatly enter'd upon between theſe Commiſſioners and the Prince of Wales, with others on the behalf of King Edward. But their Demands were ſo high, and the French Propoſals ſo much beneath what

The Treaty is again renewed.

He

Anno Dom. MCCCLX.

He expected, that they could come to no Concluſion; yet did it not abſolutely break off, but knowing the neceſſity of their Affairs, the French Commiſſioners followed King Edward for ſeveral days together with all imaginable application, conſtantly giving the Dauphin and the Council at Paris an Account of their Proceedings, ſince King Edward would not come to any Agreement on the Terms firſt propoſed.

Thus matters continued in ſuſpence, [1] till the King arrived in the Country about Chartres, where notwithſtanding the Duke of Lancaſter's prudent Remonſtrances to Him, that conſidering the unexpected length and delay of this War, with the vaſt Expence of it, which had not only exhauſted his own Revenues, but thoſe of his very Kingdom, and alſo the various hazards and chances of War, it was therefore his beſt and wiſeſt Courſe to accept of the Terms the French now offer'd, and to make Peace with Honour and Advantage. Which Perſuaſions, tho they might have ſome effect upon the King's Mind, yet He would give no Ear to the Propoſals their Agents had hitherto made, till there fell a ſtrange and unlook'd-for Accident, which quite alter'd his Reſolutions; for whilſt the King lay encamped with his Army in the Fields within a few Leagues of [2] Chartres, there fell one day a terrible Storm and Tempeſt of Thunder, Lightning, Rain, and Hail among the Engliſh Army, and withal it was ſo exceſſive cold at the ſame time, as could not be ſufficiently expreſſed; ſo that all theſe happening together, there periſhed no leſs than ſix thouſand Horſes, and well nigh a Thouſand Men, among whom were ſeveral Perſons of Quality, particularly the Lord Morley was killed outright, and the Lord Guy Beauchamp, eldeſt Son to the Earl of Warwick, being mortally wounded by one of the Hail-ſtones, died thereof on the Eight and twentieth day of [3] April following. But to conclude this ſtrange Relation, King Edward (as well as his whole Army) was ſo frighten'd and aſtoniſh'd at this Tempeſt, that looking upon it as a mark of the Divine Diſpleaſure, He immediatly alighting from his Horſe, kneeling down on the Ground, and caſting his Eyes towards the Church of our Lady of Chartres, then in his view, made a Solemn Vow to Almighty God, that He would now ſincerely incline his Mind to a final Peace with France, if it might be obtain'd upon Honourable and Advantageous Conditions; and then He took up his Quarters in a Village within a Mile of Chartres called Bretigny, where the French Commiſſioners being come the next day, with more ample Inſtructions, the King was content to accept of Peace.

The D. of Lancaſter remonſtrates to the King the great inconveniences of protracting the War.

The King affrighten'd at a ſtrange Accident, vows to make Peace if it be on good Terms.

The Treaty renewed at Bretigny.

But before we come to that, it is fit we let you know that this Treaty was managed by the [4] Prince of Wales and Charles Regent of France, in the Names of both the Kings their Fathers. ✗ The Commiſſioners for the Engliſh were Sir Reginald de Cobham, Sir Bartholomew Burgherſh, Sir Francis Hale Banerets, Sir Miles Stapleton, Sir Richard la Vache, and Sir Neel Loring Knights, with others of the King's Council; on the French Part were the Biſhop Elect of Beauvais, the Chancellor, Charles Lord Momerency, Lord John de Meingre, Mareſchal of France, Monſieur Aynart de la Tour, Lord of Vivoy, Monſieur Ralph de Ravenal, Monſieur Simon de Bucey, Monſieur Stephen de Paris, and Peter de la Charite, with many others of his Council appointed by King John Himſelf, tho He were then in England.

How those Territories ſhould be deliver'd.

VIII. The eighth was to this effect, that the King of England & his successors should have the ſaid Cities, Counties, Lands, &c. with all their Appurtenances and Dependences wherever they are, to hold to Him, his Heirs and Succeſſors, freely heritably and perpetually in Demain, in the ſame manner as the King of France held them, free and diſcharged of all Alienations, Donations, Obligations, or Incumbrances done by any of the Kings of France, in ſeventy Years from that time; and all things ſo given, alienated, or incumber'd, ſhould be truly render'd or given to the ſaid King and his Deputies entirely, and in the ſame Conditions as they were ſeventy years ſince, without any fraud; and that at Michaelmas next come twelvemonth, except what is ſaid in the Article relating to the County of Ponthieu.

How the King ſhould hold thoſe Lands that had bin his Predeceſſors.

X. Alſo it was agreed, that if within the Limits of the Countries which the Kings of England antiently poſſeſs'd, they ſhould now have any thing that was not then theirs, of which the King of France was in poſſeſſion on the nineteenth of September 1356. they ſhould be and remain to the King of England and his Heirs as aboveſaid.

XI. The eleventh being much the ſame with the ſeventh already cited, only concerning the Regalities and Sovereignties of the Places transfer'd, ~~and~~ which being afterwards much alter'd and contracted by the Treaty at Calais, I ~~omit it~~ only mention it.

XII. Alſo it was agreed, that the King of France and his eldeſt Son ſhould expreſly renounce all Reſorts and Sovereignties, and all the Rights they have, or can have, in and over all thoſe things, which by this Treaty ought to belong to the King of England: and in like manner, He the ſaid King

This twelfth Article was entirely omitted out of this Treaty, being corrected and alter'd at Calais, when both Kings met there; as was alſo the word Reſorts in all other Places of it; which afterwards proved very much to the prejudice of the King of England, becauſe the mutual Renunciations that were to be inſtead of it were never made.

Of conducting the King of France to Calais.

XIII. Alſo it was agreed, that to the end this Treaty might ſpeedily be accompliſhed, the King of England ſhould conduct the King of France to Calais within three weeks after Midſummer (there being no juſt hindrance) at his own expence.

Of paying three Millions of Gold Crowns.

XIV. Alſo it was agreed, that the King of France ſhould pay to the King of England three Millions of Crowns of Gold (whereof two ſhould be of the value of a Noble of Engliſh Mony) of which ſix hundred thouſand Crowns ſhould be paid to Him or his Deputies, within four Months after the King of France ſhould arrive at Calais; and within a Year following four hundred thouſand Crowns more ſhould be paid at London, and ſo every Year four hundred thouſand Crowns ſhould be paid there until the whole was diſcharged.

Of delivering the King of France, &c.

XV. It was alſo agreed, that upon the payment of the ſix hundred thouſand Crowns at Calais, and the delivery of the Hoſtages hereafter named, within four Months after the King of France ſhould arrive at that Place, the Town and Caſtle of Rochel, the Caſtles and Towns of the County of Guiſnes ſhould then be render'd to the King of England with all their Appurtenances; upon which the Perſon of the King of France * ſhould be delivered out of Priſon, and then ſhould not arm Himſelf or his People againſt the King of England, but was faithfully to accompliſh what was to be perform'd by this Treaty; and the Hoſtages were to be the Noblemen taken Priſoners at the Battel of Poictiers, for whoſe Names, as alſo for the reſt that were to be added to them, I refer you to Dr. B's Appendix; only ſhall obſerve, that ſix of them were to be of the Blood Royal of France, viz. Monſieur Lewis Earl of Anjou, Monſieur John Earl of Poictiers, the King's Sons, the Duke of Orleans the King's Brother, and the Duke of Bourbon; but as for Prince Philip the French King's younger Son, tho He could not be deliver'd, becauſe He was already Priſoner with his Father, yet He was ſtill to remain as one of the Hoſtages.

* Note, he was ſtill a Priſoner in England.

N. 93. p. 93.

Of the Hoſtages.

XVI. By the ſixteenth it was agreed, that thoſe ſixteen Princes and Noblemen that were to be thus given as Hoſtages, ſhould be deliver'd and and ſet free without paying any Ranſoms. This Article was particularly confirm'd at Calais by King Edward's Charter.

XVII. By the ſeventeenth it was agreed, that if any of thoſe Hoſtages there named ſhould refuſe to come to Calais according to the Agreement, or ſhould die, or remove out of the Power of the King of England during the time; then upon notice given in the manner agreed on by this Article, the King of France ſhould deliver others of the ſame Quality in their ſtead as ſoon as might be, within four Months; yet at his Departure from Calais, He might take ten of theſe Hoſtages along with Him, provided there ſtill remain'd thirty behind. This Article was alſo confirm'd by a like Charter.

XVIII. By the eighteenth it was agreed, that the ſaid King within three Months after his Departure from Calais, ſhould ſend thither as Hoſtages four of the moſt conſiderable Citizens of Paris, and of the Towns following, viz. St. Omers, Arras, Amiens, Beauvais and Liſle, with ſeveral others, for which I refer you to the Articles themſelves.

Of K. John*'s remaining at* Calais.

XIX. By the nineteenth it was agreed, that the King of France ſhould be brought from England to Calais, and there remain for four Months; and that, excepting the firſt Month, He was to pay for each of the other three Months the Sum of ſix thouſand Royals for his Maintenance, before his departure from that Town. King Edward at Calais gave the French King an Acquittance for this Sum under his Seal.

Of reſtoring the Earldom of Montfort.

XX. By the twentieth it was agreed, that within a Year after the French King's departure from Calais, He ſhould deliver to John de Montfort, his Earldom of Montfort, with its Appurtenances, as alſo all his other Heritages, He doing his Homages for them.

Of the Dutchy of Bretagne.

XXI. The twenty firſt contains a Project for the ending of all Differences between the ſaid Earl of Montfort, and the Lord Charles of Blois, concerning the Dutchy of Bretagne, by the Mediation ^ of the two Kings; which ſince it never took any effect, I omit.

and Judgment.

Of the Liberties and Franchiſes of the Countries, Cities, &c.

XXII. Alſo it was agreed, that all the Lands, Towns, Countrys, Caſtles, and other Places deliver'd to the King of England, ſhould enjoy ſuch Liberties and Franchiſes as they had at preſent; which ſhould be confirm'd by the ſaid Kings or their Succeſſors, ſo often as they ſhould be duly thereunto required, if they be not contrary to this Accord.

Of the K. of Navarre*'s Reſtitution.*

XXIII. By the twenty third the French King was within one Year to reſtore Philip King of Navarre, and his Adherents, all their Towns, Caſtles, Lordſhips, Rents, &c. whatſoever, with Pardon and Indemnity of all that had been done by them, ſo the ſaid Philip and his Adherents return'd to their Homage, and ſhould perform their Duty for the future like good and loyal Subjects.

Of the Ld de Harcourt*'s Lands.*

XXIV. The twenty fourth contains a Power for the King of England to beſtow, for that one time only, the Lands and Heritages of the late Lord Godfry de Harcourt deceas'd, to be held of the Duke of Normandy, and other Lords, by the wonted Services.

Indemnity for ſuch as ſubmitted to either King.

XXV. By the twenty fifth it was agreed, that any Perſons or Countries under the obedience of one Party, that ſhould by the virtue of this Agreement paſs to the Allegiance of the other, ſhould not be troubled or impeach'd for any thing done in time paſt.

Reſtitution of Perſons baniſh'd.

XXVI. By the twenty ſixth it was agreed, that all the Lands of the Baniſh'd and their Adherents of one part and the other, ſhould be fully reſtor'd to them, free of all Penſions and Charges, in the ſame ſtate they were in before the War began.

Delivery of the Cities and Territories within one Year.

XXVII. Alſo it was agreed, that the King of France ſhould deliver to the King of England, ſo ſoon as He could well, and at furtheſt within one Year, after his Departure from Calais, all the Cities, Towns, Countries, and other Places above-named, which by this Treaty ought to be delivered to Him.

The Fortreſſes to be deliver'd at each King's charge.

XXVIII, XXIX. By the two next it was agreed, that upon the mutual Delivery of the Towns, Cities and Countries therein mention'd, the King of France ſhould at his own proper Coſt and Expence deliver all the Fortreſſes now held and poſſeſs'd by Him, or which ſhould be held by any Rebels, that ſhould refuſe his abovemention'd Commands, as alſo in Normandy, for thoſe Places which King Edward was therein to poſſeſs; and likewiſe the King of England was at his own expence to deliver all ſuch Fortreſſes to the French King, which by virtue of this Treaty were to belong to Him, ſo as the ſaid Kings and their Subjects ſhould be bound to aid each other with their Men (for the Wages uſually paid) to that purpoſe.

Subjection of the Prelats.

XXX. Alſo it was agreed, that all the Arch-Biſhops, Biſhops, and oher Prelats and Clergy-men, by reaſon of their Temporalties, ſhould be ſubject to that King under whom they were to hold their Temporalties; and if they had Temporalties under both Kings, they ſhould then be ſubject to each King for what they ſo held of Him.

This Article was alſo confirm'd at Calais by King Edward's Charter.

Alliances to be obſerv'd between the two Kings.

XXXI, XXXII. By the two next it was agreed, that all good Alliances, Amities and Confederacies, ſhould be made between both the Kings and their Kingdoms, notwithſtanding any Confederacies they had made on this ſide, or beyond the Sea, with any Perſons, be they of Scotland or Flanders, or any other Country. And the French King, and his eldeſt Son the Regent, ſhould alſo for them and their Heirs, Kings of France, renounce all Confederacies made with the Scots; and hereby promiſe, that they would not give to the King or Realm of Scotland, or the Subjects thereof, any Aid or Favour againſt the King of England, his Heirs and Succeſſors, nor againſt his Kingdom, or the Subjects thereof, in any manner whatſoever; and in like manner, ſo ſoon as might be done, the King of England, and his eldeſt Son, ſhould renounce all Alliances they had made with the Flemings: and ſo proceeds in the ſame words concerning them, as the King of France had engag'd to do in reſpect of the Scots.

Collation of Benefices beſtow'd by either King.

XXXIII. By the thirty third it was agreed, that all Collations of Benefices made by one part or the other, ſhould hold good, and that all Profits and Revenues as had been iſſuing out of ſuch Benefices, or any Temporal Eſtates during the Wars, ſhould be acquitted by either Party.

Confirmation of this Treaty by the Pope.

XXXIV. Alſo that the Kings abovenam'd ſhould be bound to cauſe to be confirm'd all the things aboveſaid by our Holy Father the Pope, and they ſhould be made ſure and ſtrengthen'd by the Sentences and Cenſures of the Court of Rome in the ſtrongeſt manner that could be, &c.

XXXV. The thirty fifth contain'd a Licenſe for all the Subjects of the ſaid King to come to ſtudy in the Univerſities of France and England, and ſhould there freely enjoy the Privileges and Liberties of thoſe Places.

Further Securities to be delivered by both Kings.

XXXVI. By the thirty ſixth it was agreed, that for the rendering the Matters now treated and agreed on, more firm and valid, there ſhould be further given theſe Securities following, viz. Letters (or Inſtruments) ſeal'd with the Seals of both Kings, and their eldeſt Sons; and their other Sons alſo, as well as the Princes of the Blood, and other great Men of their Kingdoms, to the number of twenty on each ſide, ſhould take an Oath, that they would obſerve and keep all the Points now treated and agreed upon, as much as ſhould concern them, and without Fraud or Deceit ſhould accompliſh and fulfil them, without ever doing any thing to the contrary.

What to be done with ſuch Rebels as ſhould diſobey this Treaty.

Then follows a recital of the former Agreement, that in caſe there ſhould be any Rebels in France or England, that ſhould refuſe to obey the Matters aboveſaid, both Kings ſhould make uſe of the Bodies and Goods of their Subjects to reduce ſuch Rebels to obedience, according to the Form and Tenor of this Treaty. And the ſaid Kings and their Heirs ſhould ſubmit themſelves to the Coercion of the Pope, that He might by the Cenſures of the Church conſtrain ſuch Rebels to obey according to reaſon; yet however both Kings did thereby renounce all Wars and Contention: And if by Diſobedience, Rebellion, or Power of any Subjects of France, &c. the King of France or his Heirs could not accompliſh all the things aboveſaid, the King of England and his Heirs ſhould not make War againſt the King of France, his Heirs or Kingdom; but both together ſhould endeavour to bring the Rebels to due Obedience, and accompliſh the things aboveſaid. Then follows a like Clauſe on the behalf of the King of England, in caſe any of his Subjects ſhould not render the Caſtles, Towns and Fortreſſes they held in the Realm of France; but in ſuch caſes both Kings ſhould join their Powers to recover the ſame, that ſo all Obedience might be given to this Treaty without either of the Kings making War upon each other, or his Kingdom, &c.

All other former Treaties to be void.

XXXVII. Alſo it was agreed, that by this preſent Treaty, all other Treaties, if any had been made before, ſhould be null and void, and never be of any advantage to either Party, nor cauſe any Reproach of one to the other, for not obſerving them.

Further Confirmation of this Treaty at Calais.

XXXVIII. Alſo the preſent Treaty ſhould be approved, ſworn to and confirm'd by the two Kings, when they ſhould meet at Calais; and after the King of France ſhould be gone from thence, and be in his own Power, within a Month next following, He ſhould make Letters Patents of Confirmation, and ſend and deliver them at Calais to the King of England, and receive the like from the ſaid King.

No Alterations to be made in this Treaty at Rome.

XXXIX. By the thirty ninth it was agreed, that neither of the Kings ſhould procure, or cauſe to be procured, any Trouble or Moleſtation by the Church of Rome, or any of Holy Church, concerning this Treaty, towards either of the Kings, their Coadjutors, Adherents and Allies, whoever they be, or their Lands or Subjects, on occaſion of the late War, or any other matter or thing, &c. or if the Pope ſhould do it of Himſelf, either of thoſe Kings ſhould hinder it, to the utmoſt of their power, without any Deceit.

Time for the delivery of the Hoſtages.

XL. Alſo concerning the Hoſtages that were to be deliver'd to the King of England, and the manner and time thereof, it was to be agreed and determin'd by both the Kings, when they met at Calais.

and thereas fore he had agreed with the truce above mention'd and it fur[illegible] by the Justrement but for this truce it bears date before of the treaty itself as renewd with the Dauphin

Theſe Articles being agreed by the Commiſſioners of King Edward and thoſe of the Regent of France, were alſo after that ſolemnly ratify'd and ſworn to by both thoſe Princes; tho the Regent is by the [1] French Hiſtorians ſaid to have yielded thereto by Conſtraint, not that he was at all pleaſed with it, but becauſe He ſaw the Realm was no longer able to ſubſiſt amidſt thoſe Deſolations and Ruins, which the War had brought upon it: ~~however upon ſending back the Teſtimony of his Hand and Seal, that He had conſented thereto, in order to the full Completion of this Treaty, a Truce was made to continue between the two Kings, their Adherents and Confederates, from that time to the Feaſt of St. Michael next enſuing, and from thence forward for a Year; that during that Time all matters in order to a firm and perpetual Peace, might be duly and rightly deviſed and eſtabliſhed, and~~ till King John might be at Liberty; ~~only~~ the two eldeſt Sons of both the Kings, in the mean while, were ſolemnly ſworn to maintain this Agreement. And firſt, the Prince of Wales ordain'd on his part four Lords of England, that is to ſay, the Lord Ralph Stafford Earl of Stafford, the Lord Reginald Cobham, the Lord Guy Brian, and the Lord Roger Beauchamp, who being moſt joyfully received at Paris, and magnificently treated by the Regent and his Brothers, afterwards waited on them to the Chappel of the Palace, where on the behalf of Prince Edward they receiv'd the Oath of the Dauphin, Regent of France; which

(as * Walſingham relates) was perform'd in this manner. At the end of the Litany, the ſaid Prince went up to the Altar, and laying his Right Hand upon the Paten, wherein lay the Holy Euchariſt, and his Left on the Goſpel, He took his Oath in theſe Words: We Charles do ſwear upon the Holy Body and the Goſpels of our Lord, firmly, as much as in us lyes, to keep this Peace and Concord thus formed between the two Kings, and by no means to go againſt the ſame: So help us, &c. And the like Oath was afterwards taken by the Prince of Wales in preſence of four Barons of France, in the Church of Loviers in Normandy: of both which there were made Letters Patents; thoſe at Paris bearing date on the Tenth day of May, and the Others at Loviers on the Sixteenth of the ſaid Month, *A. And then into England.

And indeed this is a much more likely account concerning this Tranſaction, than what the [2] French Hiſtorians give of it; that theſe Lords above-mention'd did at the ſame time ſwear on the behalf of the King their Maſter and his Sons, in the ſame manner as the Regent had done before. But this is certain, [3] that upon King Edward's receiving Advice of the Ratification of the Treaty by the Regent, He raiſed his Camp from Bretigny, and marched by Pont de L'Arche over the Seine, and by Abbeville over the Soame in peaceable manner, and ſo ~~went~~ return'd to Calais. And ſo ſoon as He was arrived there, He went to the Church of St. Mary, and there gave ſolemn Thanks to God; after which going into Normandy to ſettle his Affairs there, * He, together with his Sons and many of the Nobility, took Shipping at Harfleur, and arrived at Rye on the Eighteenth of May; but the reſt of the Army went over from Calais, where He left the Earl of Warwick as his Lieutenant in France, to ſee the Treaty duly obſerved.

Then [1] the King being come to London, cauſed King John to be brought privately from the Tower to the Chappel of the Palace of Weſtminſter, where He ſhewed Him the Treaty agreed and ſworn to by the Regent his Son, with which, as being extreme deſirous of his Liberty, He ſeemed ſo well ſatisfied, that He thereupon treated K. Edward at a Dinner in the Tower, where both Princes plighted their Faith to each truly to perform the ſaid Treaty; the French further promiſing to confirm it Himſelf in Perſon when He came into France: after which He rode with the Prince of Wales from London to Windſor, to make a Viſit to the Queen; and having received many great and ſplendid Entertainments from the King, || He return'd again to London, and paid his Devotions, and made his Offerings at the Famous Shrine of St. Erkenwald in St. Paul's Cathedral.

King Edward communicates this Treaty to the French King, who promiſes to confirm it.

Then King Edward having * equipped a ſufficient Fleet under the command of Sir John Beauchamp, in order to tranſport the French King to Calais, and all things being now ready for his Departure, the King Himſelf accompany'd Him as far as Dover; but K. John was attended to Calais by the Black Prince, the Duke of Lancaſter, and many other Noblemen, where they ſafely arrived on the Ninth of July, and where that King was honourably received, and lodged in the Caſtle; but King Edward returned back, and ſtay'd in England for ſome time, till He could hear that the firſt payment of the Mony agreed on for the Ranſom was ready according to the Articles; [2] and King John was forced to ſtay there almoſt Three of the Four limited Months e'er He could raiſe the aforeſaid Sum of Six hundred thouſand Crowns: But during that time He had frequent Meſſages from the Dauphin and his other Children, who at his deſire were now at Amiens; but about the beginning of October, the greater part of the firſt Payment being got ready, and the Hoſtages for the reſt deliver'd at St. Omers, [3] King Edward upon this Advice took Shipping, and on the Ninth of the ſame Month arrived at Calais, and from thence went immediatly to pay a Viſit to K. John, who received it very kindly, and invited Him and his Sons to an Entertainment, which was about three days after accepted of by the King, none ſitting down at the Table but the ſaid Kings and their Sons. When this Entertainment was over, two of the Younger Sons of each of the Kings went with their Fathers Leave towards Boulogne, where at that time the Dauphin was: but He meeting them half way, conducted them to Boulogne, where they all reſted that Night. The next Morning the Dauphin having left the two Engliſh Princes there, as it were Pledges for his Security, rode Himſelf to Calais, and having firſt waited on the King his Father, afterwards both of them went to King Edward's Palace to Dinner, where they were received with great Honour, and entertain'd at a very ſplendid Feaſt: after which they took their Leaves, and return'd again to Boulogne; and K. Edward's two Sons came back to Calais.

The remarkable Concluſion of theſe laſt Charters.

At the ſame time the Hoſtages, who (according to the 15*th* and 18*th* Articles) were to be given as well for the Security of the Payment of the King's Ranſom as of the Reſtoration of thoſe Places (which as yet were not put into the Engliſh hands) were delivered to King Edward; *and alſo there were there paid unto Him Four hundred thouſand Crowns of Gold in part of the Six hundred thouſand, K. Edward giving further time for the Payment of the remaining Two hundred thouſand, till Chriſtmas and Lady-day following; which done, both Kings interchangeably granted their Letters Patents under their Great Seals to each other, confirming the Articles lately concluded at Bretigny, with ſuch Corrections and Additions as were then agreed upon between them, and which are already mention'd under the ſaid Articles; both Charters bear one and the ſame Date, viz. the Twenty fourth of October, with the Atteſtation of Androine Abbot of Clugny the Pope's Nuncio, that they were deliver'd in his Preſence; *the Original of which under the Seal of the King of France, is ſtill preſerv'd in a great Cheſt in the Chapter-houſe at Weſtminſter, and which you may find Printed in French in Dr. Brady's * Appendix to his laſt Volume; but the *Counter-part of it, which was ſeal'd by the King of England, concludes with this remarkable Addition:

there is nothing so particular in this last Charter dated at Boulogne but that it concludes.

Anno Dom. MCCCLX.

~~We let you know, that We have promised and do promise to deliver or cause~~ to be delivered really and indeed, to our Brother the King of England, or his Deputies on his behalf, at the Friers Augustins in the Town of Bruges, upon the day of the Feast of St. Andrew, within one Year next ensuing, Letters seal'd with our Seal of Green Wax, in case that our said Brother and dear Nephew his eldest Son, shall make the Renunciation which they ought to do on their part, and shall then deliver them to our People or Deputies, in the manner by which they are so obliged by certain Letters, the Tenor of which are word for word as before. Then follows a recital of the principal Articles of the Treaty of Bretigny, which begins by way of Charter, John King of France, &c. directed to all Arch-Bishops and Bishops, and the several Estates of France therein expresly mention'd, which need not be here repeated. Then it proceeds to recite the several Cities and Territories, together with their Homages, which were to be deliver'd and made over by that Treaty, and as are there particularly set down: And for the observation and accomplishment of the Premises, the said King thereby obliges Himself and his Heirs, to the King of England and his Heirs, by an Oath taken upon the Holy Evangelists: And therein further wills, that in case his said Brother and Nephew shall make the said Renunciations so sent and deliver'd as abovemention'd, * that the Letters abovesaid should be deliver'd to his said Brother at the Time and Place, and according to the Form already mention'd, and that then and from thenceforth these present Letters, and all things therein contain'd ~~shall have the same force and effect as his other Letters or Charters, which had been by Him promised to be deliver'd, as hath been already recited~~. Then it concludes with another very remarkable Clause to this effect: Always provided nevertheless, and it is hereby reserved to Him, his Heirs and Successors, that the said Letters above, into the Body of these incorporated, shall not have any effect, nor bring any damage to Him and his Heirs, until his said Brother and Nephew shall have made the said Renunciations sent and deliver'd in manner abovesaid; and that they shall not help them against Him and his Heirs, unless in case abovemention'd. In testimony of which He caused his Seal to be put to these present Letters. Given at Boulogne the 26th day of October, in the Year of Grace 1360.

* Note, this must refer to King John's own Letters or Charters, as appears by what follows.

The Charters of Renunciation seal'd by both Kings.

And that neither of these Kings might gain any advantage over each other by these intended Instruments of Renunciation, the like Charter or Letters, mutatis mutandis, were likewise seal'd by the King of England, for Himself and his Heirs, to the King of France; "whereby King Edward was to renounce all things that were not to "be deliver'd to Him by this Treaty, to wit, his Right and Title to "the Crown of France, and to the Sovereignty and Dominion of "the Dutchies of Normandy and Tourain, to the Earldoms of Anjou "and Maine, as also to the Sovereignty and Homage of the Dutchy "of Bretagne, and Earldom of Flanders, with all other Demands, "which He then made, or might make hereafter, upon his said "Brother of France, for all matters except those already excepted, "and which were to remain to Him and his Heirs by virtue of the "said Treaty. Then it ends with the same Clauses as that of the French "King's last mention'd, concerning what effect these present Letters

The Advantage made by the Dauphin, when he came to be King, by reaſon of K. Edward's not delivering his Charter of Renunciation at Bruges, according to this Agreement.

I have been the more exact in the relation of this Affair concerning the mutual Renunciations that both Kings were obliged to make in the Manner and at the Place already mention'd, becauſe that by reaſon of the Non-delivery of the above-mention'd Renunciations by King Edward at Bruges on the Day appointed by the laſt Clauſe in the ſaid Charter, the Duke of Normandy, when He came to be King of France by the Name of Charles the Fifth, made it ſome Years after one of his main pretences, that the Articles of this Peace, and the Renunciation, having been never duly executed and obſerved by King Edward within the Time, and at the Place therein limited, this whole Treaty and all things following thereupon were become void and of none effect, as you will find hereafter, and therefore were not to be any longer obſerv'd by Him the King of France. Tho thus much in certain we find, by a [1] Commiſſion dated the fifteenth of November the Year following, that King Edward had then appointed certain Commiſſioners to go over to the King of France, by whom He offer'd Him to ſend to Bruges within the time appointed, all the Renunciations, Ceſſions and Releaſes, which had been agreed on to be ſent thither (as has been already related) provided He would do ſo likewiſe. But what was done in perſuance thereof, or whether they were ever ſent to Paris or not, I do not find; nor can I ſay which of theſe Kings were in the fault, that the ſaid Renunciations were never made, nor ſent to Bruges, according to the above-mention'd Agreement; only the French King took the advantage, as we have already mention'd.

What K. Edward did in perſuance of this Charter of Renunciation.

And I cannot but further obſerve, that there being three ſeveral Copies of this Treaty, ſign'd and ſeal'd by both Kings at Calais and Boulogne in three days time, which are ſomewhat different from each other by reaſon of the ſeveral Corrections and Omiſſions; as alſo two ſeveral Letters of Renunciation drawn up in divers Forms (as has been already ſaid) theſe afterwards proved freſh Cauſes of Quarrel and Diſpute, ſince each of theſe Princes alledging and making

And to ſay ſomewhat more concerning King John, [5] after He had ſtaid ſome time at Amiens, He went on St. Thomas's Day to the City of Paris, where He was joyfully received by all the Inhabitants, after the diſcharge from his long Impriſonment of four Years, one Month, and ſome odd days; and there He received the Congratulations of all the Lords and Peers of the Kingdom, and cauſed them to take the ſame Oath as He himſelf had done, to maintain the Treaties of Bretigny and Calais. And beſides all theſe, there was likewiſe another [6] Charter or Inſtrument mutually ſeal'd and deliver'd by both Kings to each other, whereby they made a ſtrict League of Friendſhip and Alliance, for themſelves their Heirs and Succeſſors, againſt all Perſons whatſoever, the Pope and the Emperor excepted; and they alſo renounc'd all Wars againſt each other, and their Heirs, &c. and their Realms and Subjects. The King ſends Commiſſioners to take poſſeſſion of the Places to be deliver'd by the late Treaty.

Soon after this King [1] Edward ſent certain Commiſſioners into France, to take in his Name poſſeſſion of thoſe Countries, Cities, Towns, Caſtles, &c. that were to be deliver'd unto Him by virtue of the late Peace: But this matter was not ſo eaſily perform'd; for divers great Lords in Languedoc would not at firſt obey the French King's Orders, in yielding to hold their Seignories of the King of England; and of this ſort were the Lords that held Lands in the Marches of Aquitain, as the Earls of Armagnac, of Foix and Perigort, with divers other Lords that were reſolv'd ſtill to pay their Homage to, and own their Dependance on France; till the Lord James of Bourbon was ſent to them from the French King to perſuade them, and that they ſaw it was his abſolute Will and Pleaſure ſo to have them do, and then they ſubmitted to become Liegemen to K. Edward. The ſame Difficulty was likewiſe found in the Towns and Cities of Poictou near the Sea-Coaſt, and eſpecially in the City of Rochel, the People whereof were ſo averſe to it, that they would not yield for a good while to own ~~the Engliſh~~; but excuſing themſelves to King John, offer'd rather to be taxed at half they were worth, than to be govern'd by a Stranger, which, they ſaid, was a thing inſupportable to all true French-men.

[2] Rot. Franc. 35 E. 3. m. 3.

He deſires a ſpeedy performance of the late Treaty.

When King Edward ſaw theſe Difficulties and Delays, He at the latter end of the Year [2] ſent Sir Thomas Uedale, and Mr. Thomas de Dunclent Licentiate in the Laws, his Envoys to the King of France, to deſire a ſpeedy performance of the Treaty of Peace, by cauſing to be deliver'd to Him or his Deputies all the reſt of the Countries, Cities, Towns, &c. which were not yet ſurrender'd, promiſing thereupon, that He would according to the late Articles ſend and deliver at Bruges on the day of St. Andrew next coming, his own and the Prince his Son's Letters of Renunciation, transferring all their Rights to the Caſtles and Territories that were to be deliver'd to the King of France; upon which Ambaſſy the ſaid King, in a little time after, caus'd all or moſt of the Places, that had hitherto ſtood out, to be deliver'd to the King of England's Commiſſioners appointed for that purpoſe. By which means King Edward now became poſſeſs'd of the whole Dutchy of Aquitain, from the Loire to the Pirenean Mountains; and on this ſide towards Picardy, the Earldom of Ponthieu, the Town of Calais, and Territory of Oye, with the Town and Earldom of Guiſnes. ~~Then~~ [3] King Edward ſent over the Lord Chandois as his Lieutenant in the Dutchy of Aquitain, to take poſſeſſion of all thoſe Cities and Countries, which were to be deliver'd by the late Articles of Peace; and immediatly upon his arrival in thoſe Parts (having receiv'd them from the Lord de Bourbon) He appointed Bailiffs, Governors and other Officers, both Military and Civil, in all the Places and Towns ſo deliver'd, and received their Fealties and Homages, as alſo of all Lords and others that by this Peace were to hold of the King of England. After which the Lord Chandois reſided at Niort in Poictou, where keeping a Court like a Prince, he by his generous Carriage and winning Behaviour extremely gain'd the Hearts of all the Nobility and People of thoſe Parts, who were now become the King's Subjects.

And if we look a little further back, we ſhall find that there were other Deputies appointed by King Edward to join with thoſe Commiſsioned by [1] King John, to deliver up unto Him all thoſe Towns, Caſtles and Territories, which were to be ſurrender'd back to the French King; and therefore theſe Commiſsioners order'd all the Officers and Soldiers of the Gariſons that were Subjects to, and had ſerved under King Edward, to be immediatly evacuated: upon which moſt of them readily obey'd, and ſurrender'd the Places that were in their hands for the uſe of the King of France; but ſome of the Engliſh, and many more that were Foreigners of Germany and the Low-Countries, with ſome French Rebels, refuſ'd to ſubmit to thoſe Orders, and being reſolved to maintain themſelves by War, pretended that they held thoſe Places in Right of the King of Navarre. To theſe I may alſo add a great number of Common Soldiers of all Nations, who being disbanded, got together again, and joyn'd themſelves to the reſt, reſolving never to return to their former way of Living: theſe choſe themſelves new Captains, whoſe chief Qualities, beſides a brutiſh Courage, were Cruelty, Luſt and love of Plunder; ſo that by the beginning of the Spring this Year, they made up an Army of above Sixteen thouſand Men, part of whom ravaged Anjou, Poictou and Tourain, whilſt the Troops of thoſe whom they call'd the Tard-venu, (i. e. the late Comers) ſpoil'd the Countries of Champaigne, Burgundy, Maſconnois and Lionnois; and not long after they defeated in a ſet Battle at Brignes near Lions, the Lord James de Bourbon, who by the King's Orders had raiſed an Army to ſuppreſs them. And thus was the Kingdom of France this Year in as bad, if not a worſe Condition, than it was two Years ago, by the Inſurrections of the Peaſants, and the Devaſtations of the Navarrois, and thoſe other Troops called the Companions, who during the Truce continued the War in France, without King Edward's Commiſsion. ✝

But I ſhall conclude this Subject with a ſhort Account of what became of theſe Soldiers of Fortune, [2] who dividing themſelves into two Bodies, one part of them marched towards Avignon, where, ſpoiling the Country, killing the Inhabitants and infeſting the Roads, they grew ſo formidable to the Pope, that He cauſed a Solemn Croiſido to be preached up againſt them; in which, tho many Men liſted themſelves under the Command of the Cardinal of Oſtia, yet when they found they were to fight without any pay, but only Pardon for their Sins, it was no wonder if that Expedition came to nothing: ſo that the Pope being much put to it, at laſt engaged the Marqueſs of Montferrat (who then was making War againſt the Viſcounts of Milan) to hire theſe Adventurers to aſsiſt Him in his Wars; [3] who treating with their Chief Captain, called ~~Sir~~ John Hawkwood an Engliſh Man, he agreed with the Marqueſs on conſideration of Sixty thouſand Florins of Gold to be divided among his Officers, and ſuch and ſuch Wages to be conſtantly paid to his Soldiers, to go along with Him into Lombardy, ſo that firſt there might be obtain'd from the Pope a full Abſolution for all the Miſchiefs they had already done; all which being agreed and perform'd, and the Mony paid down by the Pope, they deliver'd up all the Places they held in their hands, and left the Borders of Avignon, and went with the Marqueſs into Italy, to the great joy of the French King and all his Subjects. After the Duke's Death He ſerved the Common-Wealth of Florence, and perform'd ſuch great Actions for them, that dying in their Service, they erected a Noble Monument to his Memory in the Cathedral Church of that City, where his Statue on Horſeback is to be ſeen at this Day: He is called by the Italian Authors Johannes Acutus, or de Acuto, becauſe their Language doth not admit of W. and the D. is turn'd into a T. in the laſt Syllable of his Name. This Year there fell out [3] another Plague, which beginning in France, went on to the Pope's Court at Avignon, and there raged with that violence, that there died within the Year no leſs than Nine Cardinals, and Seventy other Prelates; and in the City of Paris there periſhed above Thirty thouſand Perſons: and then getting over into England, it cut off many Thouſands, eſpecially in the City of London, where no leſs than Twelve hundred died on Midſummer Day and the Day following, without reckoning thoſe that died before or after that time; and beſides a great multitude of the common People, there died many Conſiderable Noblemen and Biſhops, the Chief of whom was [4] Henry Duke of Lancaſter, ſo often mention'd in our Hiſtory; a Perſon more remarkable for his great Valour, Prudence and Generoſity, than for his near Relation to the King; He ~~fell~~ dies very much lamented by all Men, and eſpecially thoſe of the Poorer ſort, by whom he was called the Good Duke. He was buried in the Collegiate Church of Leiceſter, which himſelf had founded for a Dean and twelve Chanons, where he alſo finiſhed a Noble Hoſpital for an hundred poor People, which ſtill continues, tho the College is demoliſhed, and the large Revenues taken away by K. Henry VIII.

There alſo deceaſed [6] John Lord Mowbray, Father to the Firſt Duke of Norfolk of that Name; as alſo [7] the Lord Reginald Cobham, a Perſon much employ'd both in Civil and Military Affairs in this King's Reign, with ſeveral Barons of Note. There were alſo taken away Four Biſhops, [8] *viz. I cannot here omit a [illegible] circumstance relating to this marriage since it will serve to shew the great subjection even of Princes to the papal constitutions in those times; which is, that this Lady being grand daughter to Edmund Earl of Kent the Kings uncle by his fathers side, and consequently [illegible] in the 2 degree [illegible]

I find but one Tranſaction ſavouring of any Joy or Gallantry all this Year, and that was towards the latter end of it, [1] when Edward the Black Prince (being in the One and Thirtieth Year of his Age) with the King his Father's Conſent, married Joane Counteſs Dowager of Kent, [2] Widow of the late Earl Thomas Holland, who died about the end of the laſt Year: She had been betrothed to William Earl of Salisbury, from whom by reaſon of a Pre-contract with the Earl of Kent, She was ſolemnly divorced by the Pope's Sentence: She had by her laſt Husband two Sons, Thomas Earl of Kent, and John Earl of Huntington, afterwards Duke of Exeter, being advanced to that Dignity by King Richard the Second, his Half Brother.^

Prince Edward marries the Counteſs of Kent.

This Year alſo Prince Lionel the King's Second Son (and in Right of his Wife, Daughter to William de Burgh, Earl of Ulſter) was by his Father's † Commiſſion appointed Lieutenant of Ireland; in which Charge he carried ſo ſtrict a hand immediatly upon the Natural Iriſh, that He forbad them approaching his Court, or ſo much as bearing Arms in his Service; which the Ordinary People ſo much reſented, that tho He ſubdued O-brian Prince of Conaught, yet they made a ſhift to murther an hundred of his Men in one Night in their Quarters. This being ſuppos'd to proceed from the late harſh Decree made againſt them, it was immediatly revoked; and the Natives of Ireland being reſtored to the ſame degree of Favour, as they had enjoy'd under former Governours, He ſo won upon the Affections of that turbulent People, that they yielded a willing Obedience to Him, and the Affairs of that Country proſpered during the reſt of his Government.^

Prince Lionel is made Lieutenant of Ireland.

As for Eccleſiaſtical matters, I can find none of any great moment, but that upon the firſt News of the Concluſion of the Peace between the two Kingdoms, [3] Pope Innocent ſent his Letters to King Edward, bearing date Prid. Non. Julii, An. Pontif. 8°. wherein He expreſſes his Joy for the happy proſpect of a laſting Peace, and quickens the King to a ſpeedy Conſummation of that Affair, and that He would ſhew himſelf not only willing, but eaſy and liberal, as to the Ranſom of the King of France. The Wars between England and France being now ended, [4] King Edward was pleas'd to reſtore by his Letters Patents unto the Priors-Aliens their Houſes, Lands, &c. which Three and twenty Years before He had confiſcated to his own uſe; of which I ſhall ſay no more, but that in the Reign of King Henry the Fifth theſe Priories were wholly diſſolved, and their Lands beſtowed by that Prince and Henry the Sixth his Son, on certain Colledges in Oxford and Cambridge, or elſe to other Monaſteries.

The beginning of this Year was remarkable [5] for a prodigious Tempeſt that threw down a great many Towers, Steeples and other ſtrong Buildings; and not long after the King received certain Ambaſſadors from the Kings of Cyprus and Armenia, who came to deſire his Aſſiſtance againſt the Saracens, with whom they were at War. The King for the Diverſion of theſe Strangers, as alſo of the Princes and Noblemen of France, who were at that time his Hoſtages, on the Firſt of May began a [6] Royal Juſting or Tourneament in Smithfield, which was held for five Days together; the King Himſelf, the Queen, and their Children being preſent, with moſt of the Nobility of England, and thoſe Princes and Ambaſſadors above-mention'd.

Sometime after this, the King was adviſed by his Council, that ſince the Prince of Wales was now married, and in the prime of his Years, He [1] ſhould confer upon Him the Dutchy of Aquitain, to be held by Homage of the Crown of England: for tho the Lord Chandois governed that Country with great Honour and unſpotted Integrity, yet becauſe the Nobility and People of that Province did very much deſire the Prince's Preſence among them, it was thought fit to comply with ſo reaſonable a Requeſt; whereupon in perſuance of it, King Edward, being in full and peaceable poſſeſſion of all Aquitain by the late Peace and Agreement with France, did by his Royal Charter grant and make over to his Son the Pr. of Wales all the Land of Guienne and Gaſcoigne, by the Name of a Principality, for his Life, in which Charter He created Him Prince of Aquitain. He alſo granted Him thoſe other Caſtles, Towns and Counties in Poictou, Xaintonge, Angoulmois, Agenois, Limoſin, Quercy, Rovergne, and all other Places on the Borders of Gaſcoigne, which by virtue of the Peace were to fall to King Edward, reſerving the power of erecting Guienne into a Kingdom, and retaining the Reſort and Sovereignty both over that Principality, and the reſt that went along with it, to Himſelf. This Charter was dated the Nineteenth of July 1362, being the Thirty ſixth of Edward the Third. But beſides this Charter of Donation and Creation, there was another bearing date the ſame day, of Explanation, whereby ~~the King~~ more particularly declar'd the Senſe of ~~his~~ Reſervation of the ſaid Reſſort and Sovereignty, ~~and beſides~~ the Tribute of an Ounce of Gold yearly payable to Him by the Prince, at his Palace of Weſtminſter on Eaſter-day; the Charter of Creation is incorporated in that of Explanation, and on the Margin of the Roll it is entred thus, Pro Edvardo Principe Aquitaniæ & Walliæ. The Charter of Explanation is in French, and that of Creation in Latin, both which may be found at large in [2] Mr. Selden's Titles of Honour, where the Reader may ſee it tranſcribed from the [3] Rolls in the Tower; as alſo in Engliſh in Mr. [4] Barnes's Hiſtory. When the Prince had done Homage to the King his Father, and received his Charter, He prepar'd all things for his Voyage into France, which, for that He did not go over before the next Year, I ſhall forbear any further mentioning it, till I come to its proper place and time.

A [5] few Months after, viz. on the Thirteenth of October, King Edward held a Parliament at Weſtminſter, the cauſes of this Aſſembly [6] were declar'd by the Lord Chief Juſtice Sir Henry Green, to be for redreſs of Matters relating to the Church, for obſervation of the Peace, for ſettling Affairs with Scotland, and enhancing the Price of Wool; all which were then very well order'd, as may be ſeen in the Records and Printed Statutes of this Year. Alſo the Staple of Wools was appointed, tho not by an expreſs Statute, yet with the conſent of both Houſes, to be removed from London to Calais; for we find in the Records, that the Lords being ask'd their Opinions concerning the repair of the Merchants to Calais, their Anſwer was, That they thought it might be profitable for the Realm; the Commons indeed demur'd at firſt, till they could confer with the Merchants about it, but at laſt they comply'd with the Lords: and ſome time after (as [*] Knyghton relates) the King ſent over Six and twenty of the moſt conſiderable Merchants of the Realm, to hold the Staple there for three years, and to keep and defend the Town, every Merchant having a Guard of Six Men at Arms and Four Archers at the King's Charges: and beſides the Mayor of the Town, He alſo appointed another to be over the Staple, the King being to receive for Cuſtom Twenty Shillings, and the aforeſaid Merchants and Wardens of the Town Forty Pence more upon every Sack of Wool there bought. This I mention here, tho it was not put in Execution until the Year following; and ſince this was done by Aſſent of Parliament, methinks Walſingham hath no juſt cauſe to blame the King as he doth, for removing the Staple to Calais, as contrary to his Oath. In this Parliament alſo was paſſed that Remarkable [1] Statute which ordains, That all Pleadings and Judgments in the Courts of Weſtminſter, ſhould be for the future in Engliſh, whereas before they were wont to be in the French Language. Then [2] on the laſt Day of the Parliament's Sitting, the Petitions of the Commons being granted, they unanimouſly gave the King Six and twenty Shillings and eight Pence on every Sack of Wool for three Years, beſides the former Subſidy of * Wool-fells and Skins.

All Pleadings now ordain'd to be in Engliſh.

On the laſt Day of their Meeting, the ſaid Sir Henry Green declar'd, That the King being now arriv'd to the Fiftieth Year of his Age, intended to keep it as a Jubile, and to ſhew ſeveral Acts of Grace and Mercy to his People; and therefore granted his General and Special Pardon to all, without Fine or paying of Fees for the Seal; and that He ſet all Debtors to the Crown, and Priſoners for Criminal matters at Liberty. In this Parliament alſo the † King by the ſaid L. Chief Juſtice, declared his Second Son Lionel, Duke of Clarence, which Title He took in Right of his Wife, who was deſcended from the Earls of Clare, a Town and Caſtle in Suffolk. The King likewiſe further declar'd his Son John, Earl of Richemond, and Duke of Lancaſter, in Right of his Wife (as hath been already mention'd) and at the ſame time Edmund the King's Fifth Son, was created Earl of Cambridge. So the King, having paſſed ſeveral Statutes that were very beneficial to the Nation, and perform'd ſeveral Acts of Grace, as you have already heard, diſſolv'd the Parliament after it had ſat about a Month.

The King grants a General Pardon.

He makes his younger Sons Dukes.

The Parliament being thus broke up, the King ſpent the reſt of this Year in his Pleaſures and Diverſions; [3] for He now rode attended by the Principal and Chief Nobility of England, and accompanied by the French Hoſtages, to ſeveral great Foreſts, as Rockingham in Northamptonſhire, Sherwood in Nottinghamſhire, and Clunne in Shropſhire, and divers other Places, where He hunted all ſorts of Game in ſeaſon, ſpending in his Progreſs an hundred Marks, and ſometimes an hundred Pounds a Day, which was a great Sum in thoſe Times, and more than Five hundred Pounds is now.

As for Eccleſiaſtical Affairs, there is nothing worthy of our Obſervation; only that Pope Innocent VI. deceaſed this Year in the Month of November, and was ſucceeded by William Grimouard, an Abbot of the Order of St. Benedict in Marſeilles, who was called by the Name of Urban the Fifth: But our Walſingham is not only out in his Name, calling Him Gillerin, but alſo in making Him an Engliſh Man, when indeed He was a Native of Montferrat; and is the firſt example a long time of any Man, that from a ſimple Abbot, was for his Learning and Piety elected Pope; of whom I have nothing more to obſerve, but that immediately after his acceſſion to the Papacy, [4] He zealouſly preached up the Croyſado or Holy War, with which the King of France

Then about the beginning of February, the Prince having firſt waited upon the King his Father, took Shipping with the Princeſs and all his Retinue, and in four days time arrived ſafe at Rochel, where [2] He was not long after attended by the Lord Chandois, Lieutenant of Aquitain, who then came from Niort, and reſign'd his Command to the Prince: He thereupon made him his Chief Conſtable of all thoſe Territories. From Rochel the Prince went to the City of Poictiers, where He was attended on by all the chief Lords and Noblemen of Poictou and Xaintogne, whoſe Homages and Fealties He there received. From thence He went to the City of Bourdeaux, where within a few days He received the Homages of the Earls of Foix and Armagnac, between which Lords there had been great and long Feuds, that had broken into open Wars between them; but they were now by the Prince's Mediation reconcil'd. Here Prince Edward kept a noble Court for the ſpace of near three Years, governing the Country with great Clemency, till his unhappy Voyage into Spain not only loſt Him the Affections of his French Subjects, but alſo moſt of thoſe Territories that had been lately deliver'd up by the King of France.

In the mean while [3] King Edward dealt very kindly with the Hoſtages of France, eſpecially thoſe of the Blood-Royal, viz. the Dukes of Orleans, Anjou and Berry, who with the Duke of Bourbon had leave to go over to Calais for ſome time; and during their ſtay there, each of them was to have four days Liberty to ride abroad into the French Pale, on the Marches of that Place; provided that at the end of four days, they return'd to Calais by Sun-ſetting. x ~~The~~ reaſon of this Favour was, that theſe Princes being nearer their Friends, might thereby ſollicit the raiſing of the reſt of the Mony that was ſtill behind of the firſt payment of King John's Ranſom, that thereby they might regain their Freedom, of which they were mighty deſirous; but King John and his Son the Dauphin were taken up in Matters of a higher nature, viz. their Preparations for the intended Croiſado, to prevent the Duke of Navarre's Deſigns, who at this time began to raiſe freſh Diſturbances in that Kingdom. So that when the Duke of Anjou ſaw that He was not like to be ſpeedily releas'd, He grew impatient, and without conſidering his Father's Honour, or his own, took the opportunity during one of thoſe days to break his Parole, and eſcape into France; which being done without his Father's Privity and Conſent, He was very much diſpleas'd at it.

But I cannot but obſerve, that this Parliament was continued by ſeveral Prorogations [1] 'till the third of November, when the Lord Chancellor in preſence of the King, Lords and Commons, declar'd, that the King was now reſolved to execute the Statute of Apparel, and therefore charged them all to promote the ſame. After which he demanded of both Houſes, whether they would have ſuch matters, as they agreed on, to be by way of Ordinance or of Statute? They anſwered by way of Ordinance, that they might amend the ſame at their pleaſure; and ſo it was done. Then the King thank'd them for their pains taken, and ſo diſmiſs'd them. Where the Reader may obſerve the difference between an Ordinance and a Statute, the former being look'd upon as a Temporary, but the latter as a ſtanding Law.

About [2] the beginning of November, David King of Scotland came again into England, to give the King a Viſit, as alſo to ſee if He could obtain ſome alleviation of his Ranſom; in which, tho I do not find He met with the Succeſs He expected, yet He was honourably received by the King; and divers other great Princes coming hither not long after, He ſtaid ſome months in England to enjoy their Converſation: For Peter, King of Cyprus, having been lately at the Pope's Court, and there took the Croyſado (at the ſame time with the King of France) went from thence to the Emperor's Court at Prague, to ſollicit his Aſſiſtance for this Holy War: and having now a deſire to come over into England for the ſame purpoſe, the [3] King granted Him Letters of Safe-Conduct, as alſo for Albert Duke of Bavaria, who accompany'd Him; whereupon theſe Princes landing at Dover about Chriſtmas, went from thence for London; and by the King's Command they were met without the City by the Earls of Hereford, Eſſex and Northampton, with other Noblemen and Perſons of Quality, by whom they were conducted to the ſeveral Houſes that were prepar'd for them, where we ſhall leave them for a time.

[1] Froiſ. c. 219. K. of France arrives in England.

In the beginning of this Year, [1] John King of France had a great deſire once more to ſee England, that He might confer with King Edward about the Holy War, which He had lately undertaken, as alſo to excuſe his Son's ſtealing away from Calais, and to procure the delivery of the other two, with the reſt of the Hoſtages, upon the payment of part of his Ranſom. Theſe were the true Reaſons of his coming over, and not for the Love of the Counteſs of Salisbury, as Sir Richard Baker and ſome other modern Writers falſely relate: ſo that notwithſtanding ſome oppoſition made by this King's Council againſt his Voyage, yet having a great Honour and Eſteem for the King and Queen, He took ſhipping at Boulogne, and landed at Dover the fourth of January, where He was received by thoſe of the Nobility whom K. Edward had ſent to bid Him Welcome: from thence He was conducted to Canterbury, where He offer'd a rich Jewel at the Shrine of the pretended St. Thomas; and thence He went to the Palace at Eltham, where He was moſt kindly receiv'd by the King and Queen, and entertain'd with all ſorts of Diverſions; and ſome time after He was received by the Mayor and Aldermen of London in great State, and was by them nobly entertain'd; [2] yet much more by Sir Henry Picard a Merchant Vintner of Gaſcoigne, who ſome Years before had been Mayor, and now made a magnificent Entertainment at his Houſe (ſince called the Vintry,) for no leſs than Four Kings at once, viz. of England, Scotland, France and Cyprus, beſides the King's Sons and moſt of the Nobility of England, who were likewiſe preſent. This deſerves our particular Notice, for as we do not read of ſo many Foreign Princes to have been in England at one time, ſo certainly never before had any private Citizen the Honour to entertain ſo many.

Is kindly receiv'd by the King and Queen.

[3] Froiſ. c. 218. King of Cyprus returns into France attended by many Engliſh.

[3] After ſome Months ſtay, the King of Cyprus, not being able to obtain of King Edward any conſiderable Aſſiſtance either in Men or Mony towards his War with the Saracens (yet being nobly preſented) took his Leave, and return'd into France, being attended by many Engliſh Gentlemen, who would go as Volunteers to this Expedition. Then the former of theſe Kings paſſing thro France, went as far as the City of Angouleſme, where He was kindly receiv'd by the Prince of Wales, whom He would fain have engag'd in his intended Expedition; but not being able to prevail with Him, after He had been nobly entertain'd, and preſented by the Prince and Princeſs, He took his Leave, and was conducted by the Lord Chandois to the Borders of the Engliſh Territories, and ſo He return'd to Paris to the Dauphin, who was then left by his Father Regent of France.

Anno Dom. MCCCLXIV.

But as for King John, He had now paid King Edward a moiety of One Million of the Three which He was to pay for his Ranſom, whereupon He deſired that his Sons and ſome other of the Hoſtages might be deliver'd; which tho He could not obtain, yet He ſtill continued here, being viſited and treated by the King and his Sons, and taking his Pleaſure in ſuch Sports as He loved. He had his chief Reſidence at the Savoy, which then belong'd to the Duke of Lancaſter, being at that time one of the moſt Magnificent Palaces in England. But not long after, [1] in the beginning of the Spring, the King was taken dangerouſly ill of a languiſhing Diſtemper, which tho our Hiſtorians do not tell us what it was, yet (notwithſtanding all the Endeavours of the Phyſicians) put an end to his Life, the Eighth day of April at the Savoy, to the great grief of King Edward, his Queen, and the French Princes and Noblemen. The [2] King made Him a noble Funeral at his own Expence, and cauſed his Body to be tranſported into France, where on the Seventh of May following it was inter'd at St. Denis.

[2] Froiſ. c. 121.

This King was eſteem'd one of the moſt Brave and Liberal and ſincere of his Time, being a Prince who inviolably obſerv'd what He once promiſed; but theſe Vertues were much allay'd by his Pride, Wilfulneſs, and Contempt of all other Advice but his Own, beſides great Prodigality, which made Him leave his Subjects to the Diſcretion of his Financiers. Theſe failings, with the Raſhneſs and Precipitation He expreſſed in his Enterpriſes, were the chief Cauſes of thoſe great Misfortunes which had befallen Him: but his Son Charles the Fifth reſtor'd France to its antient Grandeur, by taking quite contrary Methods, and therefore juſtly deſerved the Title of Wiſe: Yet his Death was a great Loſs to England, for had He lived, it is very probable that He being a Prince of an open, generous Nature, would not have broke the Peace with King Edward upon thoſe ſlight Accounts as his Succeſſor did within a few Years after.

His Character.

But before I quit this Subject, I cannot but take notice of a very improbable and malicious Story, which I find only related by [3] Knighton, as that King John ſhould on his Death bed ask King Edward's Pardon for his Treachery to Him, in having by his Subjects and Confederates collected a great quantity of Gold, which being made into Plates had been put into Barrels, in order to be ſent to France; and that they had bought up great quantities of Bows and Arrows and other Arms, which were made up in Wool-ſacks for the ſame purpoſe; as alſo that He beg'd King Edward's Pardon for uſurping the Crown of France to his Prejudice: all which, as I have ſaid, being highly improbable, need no formal Confutation.

A malicious Story of Knighton confuted.

Since England now affords us nothing worth farther Conſideration this Year, I ſhall give you a ſhort Account of what happen'd in France after the Death of King John; [4] where in the beginning of the Reign of his Son Charles, aroſe freſh Wars and Diſturbances, by reaſon of the King of Navarre, who now laid Claim to the Dutchy of Burgundy, which [5] had been already beſtowed upon Prince Philip,* King John's Youngeſt Son (who had been lately ranſom'd;) to recover which, the King of Navarre raiſed an Army conſiſting of Engliſh, and ſuch French as ſided with Him. John de Greilly, Captal de Buche, being his Kinſman and a great Soldier, came to his Aſſiſtance, and was made Commander of his Forces; and Sir Bertrand du Gueſclin (whom

In order to which, He carried [3] the War into Montbelliard, and thereby forced the Count to quit Burgundy; and then ſat down before La Charité, where Lewis Count d'Evreux, not finding himſelf ſtrong enough to raiſe the Siege, retired with his Troops to Cherbourgh in Normandy: whereupon the Beſieged ſurrender'd upon good Terms, which the Duke then granted them by the King's Order, becauſe He might be in a capacity to ſend the greateſt part of thoſe Forces to the Aſſiſtance of Count Charles of Blois his Couſin, who was ſtill contending with John the Young Earl of Montfort for the Dutchy of Bretagne. But not long after, [4] that Famous Battle of Auray was fought, which decided this long Diſpute between the two Competitors; for John de Montfort having beſieg'd that Place laſt mention'd, by the Aſſiſtance of the Engliſh Forces, commanded by the Lord Chandois (who was ſent thither by Prince Edward for that purpoſe) Count Charles undertook to relieve it with the Troops of France, who were led by the Count d'Auxerre, and Sir Bertrand de Gueſclin; theſe two Armies gave Battle to each other, near the Place above-mention'd, upon Michaelmas Day; the Fight was obſtinate and bloody, and laſted a long while, but the Iſſue was that Count Charles's Forces were routed, and Himſelf ſlain upon the Place, who deſerv'd a better Fortune, being a Prince of great Valour and Affability. * Mezeray relates, that the Engliſh and the Nobility of Bretagne, being quite tired with this War, had reſolved before-hand to diſpatch out of the way that Competitor, whoever it ſhould be, that ſhould happen to be worſted and taken in the Fight. By this Victory, as well as ſome other Succeſſes the Year following, the Earl of Montfort became not long after ſole Maſter of Bretagne; [5] for the Sons of Count Charles were ſtill Priſoners in England, and his Widow had more of Pride than good Conduct; and tho the Duke of Anjou her Son-in-Law would fain have aſſiſted Her, yet the Council of France did not think it convenient to puſh this Buſineſs to extremity leſt Montfort ſhould again put himſelf under the Homage of the King of England; ſo that the the French in a little time made a Peace with him, by the Treaty of Guerrande, upon theſe Conditions: That he ſhould for ever enjoy the Dutchy of Bretagne, doing Homage for it to the King of France, yet that the Widow of Count Charles ſhould enjoy the Title of Dutcheſs during her Life; and that in caſe of the Failure of Iſſue of John de Montfort, the Dutchy ſhould come to the Right Heirs of the Counteſs of Blois. Theſe things were not concluded until the next Year, tho to finiſh this Relation I have put them together under this. x I find nothing els worth noting in relation to France, [illegible] Duke of Anjou having some ~~[illegible]~~ time before [illegible] notwithstanding his solemn Promise to continue one Hostage [illegible] were performed.

On the News of this Victory, K. Edward makes the Purſuivant that brought it, a Herald.

[1] Froiſ. c. 227.

The K. treats about a Match between his Daughter and Earl Edmund.

As to the Affairs of England, I find little worth noting; only that within a few Days after the Battle of Auray, King Edward received Letters from John Duke of Bretagne (for ſo I ſhall now call Him) his Son in-Law, with an Account of the great Victory He had then gain'd over his Enemy; at which the King was ſo well pleas'd, [1] that He made the Purſuivant at Arms, who was the bearer of the News, a Herald by the Name of Windſor, which Title continues to this Day. The King was then at Dover to meet the Earl of Flanders, who was newly come thither to treat with Him, and conclude a Match, that was then on foot, between his Only Daughter and Edmund E. of Cambridge, the King's Fifth Son, where all things were ſo well approved of, that there wanted nothing in order to the Marriage, but the Pope's Diſpenſation for their being ſo near of Kin. Yet [2] this intended Match was ſoon after broke off, by the French King's envious Policy, He craftily hindering the Pope from granting the Diſpenſation; and then He never left courting the Earl of Flanders, till He had given his Daughter in Marriage to that King's Brother, Philip Duke of Burgundy. This I take notice of, becauſe it was from this Prince that thoſe Dukes deſcended, who either by Matches or Conqueſts, becoming Lords of all the Belgick Provinces (which we call the Netherlands or Low-Countrys) afterwards became ſo Powerful, that they were able to give a check to the Power of France, and to turn the Scale of Succeſs to that ſide either French or Engliſh, that they were pleas'd to favour; as you will find in the next Volume, if it ſhall pleaſe God to let me finiſh it. x

I have no more to add as to the Affairs of England, [3] only that the Wars being now ended, a great many of thoſe Soldiers that had been diſbanded, and had rather do any thing than return to their former Employments, did the laſt Year as well as this, become Robbers and Highway-men; ſome of them breaking up Houſes, and robbing Churches of their Plate, not ſparing the Gold and Precious Stones which adorn'd the Reliques of the Saints, whilſt others robbed upon the Highway, not ſparing any whatſoever. Nay [4] Peter King of Cyprus, whilſt he travell'd in England with a ſmall Train, was ſet upon by a Gang of theſe Fellows, and ſtrip'd of all He had about Him; which no doubt gave Strangers a very ill Impreſſion of the Engliſh Barbarity: whereupon King Edward was ſo much incenſed, that He did what He could to find out the Miſcreants, and bring them to condign Puniſhment; and in order to it, granted to the City of London more ample Power to do Juſtice, and to deliver up Priſoners within their Libertys to the King's Juſtices, as they uſed to do before, tho without his Expreſs Commiſſion.

A Parliament ſummon'd, the cauſes of which are declar'd by the Biſhop of Ely.

Preſently after Chriſtmas on the Octaves of St. Hilary, King Edward held a Parliament at Weſtminſter, which being adjourn'd until the next Day, the * Lords and Commons then met in the Painted-Chamber, there to hear the King's Pleaſure; at which time Simon Langham † Biſhop of Ely and Lord Chancellor, began in a long ſolemn Harangue to open the Parliament, taking for his Theme that of the Royal Prophet, Faithful Judgment doth adorn the King's Seat: from whence he took occaſion to diſcourſe of the great Valour of the King his Maſter, and the manifold Victorys, which by God's Aſſiſtance He had atchieved in his Youth; not forgetting the conſtant and dutiful Good-will and ready Concurrence of the King's Loyal Subjects, towards the furtherance of thoſe his Important Undertakings; for which as the King did now by him return them his hearty Thanks, ſo he let them know, That on his part He was reſolved to ſeek the common Peace and Tranquillity of all his People; eſpecially by enforcing a due Obſervation of all good and wholſome Laws, and by amending ſuch of them as ſhould be thought defective, as alſo by eſtabliſhing new ones, where neceſſity ſhould ſo require.

[1] Id. n. 5, 6. Their Proceedings.

Then [1] they proceeded to appoint Receivers and Tryers of Petitions for England, Ireland, Wales, &c. as alſo for Aquitaine and other foreign Countrys. The ſame Day the King declar'd with his own Mouth to all the Eſtates, how Citations and falſe Suggeſtions were daily made to the Pope, for Matters determinable in his Court within the Realm, and for procuring Proviſions for Eccleſiaſtical Dignitys, to the great Scandal of the Antient Laws, the Derogation of his Crown, to the daily conveying away of the Treaſure of the Land, to the Diminution of Eccleſiaſtical Livings, to the withdrawing of Divine Service, Alms, Hoſpitality, and other Good and Acceptable Works, and to the daily encreaſe of all Miſchiefs, &c.

miſſed them on the Seventh of February following. So that tho this Parliament began in the latter end of the Eight and thirtieth Year of this King's Reign, yet it was not diſſolv'd till the beginning of the Nine and thirtieth.

After this the Pope, to be even with the King for this ſtrict Law He had lately cauſed to be made againſt his Proviſions, did this Year write [1] Him a Letter bearing date at Avignon in the beginning of June, whereby He demanded the Arrears of his Rent or Tribute, for the Kingdoms of England and Ireland, which had been granted by King John; but what Anſwer was made to this Letter, you will find in the Proceedings of the Parliament the next Year. But this affords little more remarkable, ſaving that the King cauſed the Lord Chief Juſtice Sir Henry Green, and Sir William Skipwithe one of his Juſtices, to be arreſted and impriſon'd, on the account of many notorious Extortions and Enormitys which He underſtood they had committed againſt Law and Juſtice; nor could they redeem themſelves from Priſon, without paying the King very large Fines, which by Injuſtice they had got from Others: but for ever after they were ſecluded from both their Places, as well as from his Favour.

The Pope demands his Arrears of Tribute.

This Year King Edward married his Daughter the Lady [2] Iſabella to a Young French Lord, named Ingelram de Guiſnes, who was Baron of Coucy and divers other great Lordſhips in France. He had ^ come over into England the laſt Year, and ſo far recommended himſelf to the King by his handſom Perſon and obliging Carriage, that making Love to this Lady, he not only obtain'd her Favour, but the King's Aſſent to the Marriage, which was Celebrated at Windſor with great Magnificence, upon which he was created Earl of Albemarle, to Him and the Heirs of his Body, and had at the ſame time alſo granted him divers Mannors and Lordſhips in England; and he was ſome Years after made Duke of Auſtria by the Emperor, tho he never obtained any more than the bare Title.

This Year alſo the King [3] Founded and nobly Built a new College in Cambridge, which was called the King's Hall, and endowed it with large Revenues; which being afterwards augmented with two or three other ſmall adjoyning Foundations, was by King Henry VIII. named Trinity College: and albeit He never lived to finiſh it, yet it is now one of the moſt Noble and Magnificent Foundations of that kind in Chriſtendom.

As for Foreign Affairs, [4] tho the deſign'd Croiſado was defeated by the Death of John King of France, yet nevertheleſs Peter King of Cyprus, having receiv'd ſome Aſſiſtance in Mony from the Princes of Chriſtendom, and alſo gather'd ſome Troops of Voluntiers in England, France and other Countries, which were alſo joyn'd with a great many of the Knights Hoſpitallers, they all together made ſo conſiderable a Force, that landing in Egypt they valiantly took the City of Alexandria, where they found a great deal of rich Plunder; to keep which the Engliſh, Gaſcoigne, and other Voluntier Commanders being more careful than of their Honour, they with their Soldiers under their Command retired to their Ships, and thereupon forced the King to quit the Enterprize and follow them.

The Chancellor communicates to them the Pope's late Demand of the Arrears of the Tribute.

This Year paſt without any thing conſiderable, till the Thirtieth of March, on which day King Edward held a [1] Parliament at Weſtminſter; at the opening whereof in the Painted Chamber, the Biſhop of Ely Lord-Chancellor declar'd, in preſence of the Lords and Commons, the Reaſons why that Parliament was called, which in effect were theſe; That ſince the King had ſent his eldeſt Son, the Prince of Wales, to govern the Country of Aquitain, as alſo the Duke of Clarence his next Son, then living in Ireland, to be his Lieutenant there, his chief care now was, how He might beſt govern his Realm here at Home; and [2] ſo having appointed Receivers and Tryers of Petitions for England, Ireland, Wales, and other Countries, they adjourn'd until the next day, when the Chancellor, in the preſence of the King, Lords and Commons, declar'd, [3] That he had the day before inform'd them in general of the Occaſion of their aſſembling, and that now they ſhould know it more particularly, there being a Matter of great Importance which the King was reſolved to communicate to them, viz. He had lately received Notice, that the Pope in conſideration of the Homage which King John of England had formerly paid to the See of Rome, for his Realm of England and Dominion of Ireland, and of the Tribute then by Him granted unto the ſaid See, intended by Proceſs to cite the King to his Court (then at Avignon) to anſwer for his Default, in not performing what the ſaid King his Predeceſſor had ſo undertaken for Him and his Heirs, Kings of England: Whereupon the King required the Advice of his Parliament, what Courſe He had beſt to take, in caſe any ſuch Proceſs ſhould be attempted againſt Him.

The Declaration of the Lords and Commons againſt King John's Power of ſubjecting his Realm to the Pope.

[4] Then the Biſhops, Lords, and Commons, each of them ſeverally, deſired time till the next day to give in their Anſwer, when the Prelates, Dukes, Earls, Barons and Commons, upon full deliberation, declared as follows: That neither King John, nor any Other, could bring Himſelf, nor his Realm nor People in ſuch ſubjection, without their Aſſent, as appears by many Evidences; and if it were done, 'twas without their Aſſent, and againſt his Coronation-Oath; and alſo the ſaid Eſtates above-mention'd, further agreed and granted, That in caſe the Pope ſhould attempt any thing by Proceſs, or any other way, to conſtrain the King or his Subjects, to perform what He ſays He lays claim to in this reſpect, they would reſiſt and withſtand Him with all their Power. Thus was this haughty Demand of the Pope, by the ſtout oppoſition of the Biſhops, Lords, and Commons, quaſhed for ever, for I do not find that it was ever again demanded.

The Univerſities Complaints againſt the Mendicant Friars, refer'd to the King & Lords.

In this Parliament † the Univerſities of Oxford and Cambridg made great Complaints againſt the Mendicant-Friars, as theſe did likewiſe againſt the Univerſities; and their Cauſe was warmly managed by Proxies on both Sides before the King and Parliament; but in the end both ſubmitted to the Pleaſure of the King and Lords, who having deliberated on this Matter, made an Order, That for the future, as well the Chancellor and Scholars, as the Fryars of thoſe Orders within the ſaid Univerſities, ſhould in beſtowing all Graces and School-Exerciſes, uſe each other in a Friendly manner, without any noiſe and diſturbance; and that none of thoſe Orders ſhould receive any Scholar into their Fraternities being under the Age of Eighteen Years: and that the Fryars ſhould take no Advantage, nor procure any Bull, or other Proceſs from the Court of Rome againſt the ſaid Univerſities, or proceed therein; but that the King alone ſhould have Power to redreſs and determine all Controverſies between them for the future, and the Offenders ſhould be puniſhed at the Pleaſure of the King and his Council.

The Parliament continued until the Eleventh of May, * when the Lord Chancellor declar'd, That the King having married his Daughter Iſabella to the Lord de Coucy, who had a fair Eſtate both in France and England, it would be for the King's Honour to create him a Peer of England, which [1] all the Lords there preſent agreed to be very convenient: Whereupon He by his Letters Patents dated the ſame day, created Him Earl of Bedford; and for the better ſupport of Him and his Lady, gave Him a Grant of a thouſand Marks per Annum, to be paid out of the Exchequer, as alſo thirty Marks more out of the Iſſues of the County of Bedford, to be yearly paid by the Sheriff of that County. Here you may obſerve, that the Parliament did not quarrel with the King, or find fault with his marrying his Daughter to a French-man tho a Subject, or that he had confer'd upon Him ſo great an Eſtate out of the Lands belonging to the Crown, or that He would now make him a Nobleman of England; for tho it was uſual with this King not to create either Dukes or Earls (even his own Sons) without the privity of the reſt of the Peers, yet we do not find that ever He asked the Conſent of the Commons, or that it paſſed into an Act or Statute, all the Charters of their Creation being granted by the King alone, without the Conſent of the Parliament at all mentioned in them.

I ſhall now proceed to Foreign Affairs, eſpecially ſince they are ſo nearly conjoyn'd with thoſe of England. France continued ſtill to be much [3] diſturbed by thoſe diſbanded Soldiers, who called themſelves Companions, and who, ſince the Wars of Bretagne were ended, had liſted themſelves in new Troops, but under the Command of ſeveral of their former Captains; theſe being moſt of them Gaſcoignes or Engliſh-men, and but few Bretons or French-men among them, it very much incenſed the French Nobility, who laid the Fault on King Edward, and his Son the Prince, that they had not done their utmoſt to ſuppreſs them; for not long before, [4] the Dukes of Orleans and Anjou who were ſent againſt them by King Charles their Brother, with an Army of fifteen thouſand Men, were routed, and many of them taken Priſoners by theſe Companions, then commanded by Sir Nicholas Dagworth, Son to Sir Thomas Dagworth, that had been treacherouſly kill'd in Bretagne ſeveral Years before: Yet I give no credit to what the ſame Author relates, that they took both the ſaid Dukes Priſoners, ſince that would have made ſo great a Noiſe, that it could not have eſcaped being mention'd by ſome of the French

King Edward commands them to quit France; which ſome few obey, but moſt of them make an inſolent Anſwer.

Hiſtorians: However this is more certain from our Author[s], that the French K. was ſo terrified with the great Succeſs of theſe Companions, that He ſent to K. Edward, deſiring Him to interpoſe his Authority againſt thoſe Men, who were for the moſt part Engliſh, or at leaſt his Subjects; for it was ſo provided in the Articles of the Peace at Bretigny, That if the Soldiers on either ſide ſhould refuſe to acquieſce, both the Kings ſhould join together to compel them. Upon this King Edward firſt ſent out his Letters, or Proclamation, commanding them on their Allegiance to quit France, and no longer to infeſt that Kingdom. Some few obeyed, but moſt of them made anſwer, That as they held nothing there of the King of England, ſo neither for Him, nor any one elſe, would they leave their Gariſons and Livelihood, they had got with ſo much Labour. Whereupon the King, enraged at this Inſolence, immediately prepared to chaſtiſe them in Perſon with a Royal Army. But when King Charles heard of his Preparations, He began to fear, leſt after King Edward had deſtroyed the Companions, He Himſelf might become a Prey, under ſome Pretence or other that Conquerors can eaſily find out: Wherefore He ſent again to Him, deſiring Him to deſiſt, and ſtay at Home, for now He did not need his Aſſiſtance. At which Affront King Edward was ſo diſpleas'd, that He ſwore by St. Mary, He would never ſtir again to aſſiſt the King of France, tho the Companions ſhould endeavour to expel Him his Kingdom.

The King offers to go over in Perſon to ſuppreſs them, but is hindered.

Bertrand de Gueſclin carries many of the Companions *into.*Spain.

Peter King of Caſtile being for his Cruelty oppoſed by Henry his Brother, is driven out of Spain.

But now when there were no hopes by Force to repreſs theſe Plunderers, the Valiant Bertrand de Gueſclin found means to carry a great many of them upon an Expedition into Spain, and that upon this occaſion: * Peter, King of Caſtile, to whom the Spaniſh Hiſtorians give the Sirname of Cruel ~~and Wicked~~, and that not without cauſe, for He overturn'd all the Laws, and committed Cruelties equal to thoſe of the Antient Tyrants, and not only lived in open Adultery with Mary de Padilla, whom afterward He marryed, but poiſon'd his Queen Blanche, Siſter to the Queen of France: After which He put many of the chief Noblemen to death, without any Crime proved againſt them, and ſpar'd not his own natural Brothers, of whom there were three ſtill living: For having put the ſecond of them called Frederick to death out of mere ſuſpicion, He endeavour'd to do the like to the Eldeſt called Henry, Count of Taſtamara; who taking Arms in his own Defence, and forming a great Party in the Kingdom, made a League with the King of Arragon, and by theſe means, for ſome time, made War upon his Brother. But Henry's Forces being at laſt vanquiſhed by thoſe of the King, he was driven out of Spain, and forced to take Refuge in France; where K. Charles the more willingly granted him his Protection and Aſſiſtance, becauſe He now found a fair Occaſion of ridding the Kingdom of thoſe diſbanded Soldiers that diſturbed it: And in order to this, He treated with theſe Companions by the means of Bertrand de Gueſclin abovemention'd, who was lately ranſom'd from his Impriſonment, by the Pope and the French King for that purpoſe (the former of whom had now excommunicated Don Pedro): And tho John de Bourbon Earl of Marche (Couſin to Queen Blanche deceaſed) was appointed their General, yet it was this Bertrand, whom they indeed looked upon as their Leader, being then in high eſteem for his Valour and Conduct. With theſe Troops of the Companions, beſides a great number of Gentlemen Voluntiers, the Earl of Marche and this Gueſclin conducted Count Henry into Spain, the King of Arragon giving them paſſage thro his Country: but ſo ſoon as they had enter'd Caſtile, all the Nobility of that Kingdom, except one Nobleman, (viz. Hernando de Caſtro) revolted from K. Pedro, and betook themſelves to Henry's Party, who being joyfully received into the City of Burgos, was there crown'd King about the end of March the foregoing Year: But too ſoon looking upon Himſelf ſettled in the Throne, He not long after diſmiſs'd moſt part of his Foreign Troops, retaining only Fifteen hundred Lances under the Conduct of Gueſclin and Bernard, baſe Son to the Earl of Foix.

Whereupon the Prince preſently diſpatched four Knights into England, who having deliver'd his Letters to the King his Father, it was by Him propos'd in Council what was fit to be done in this Affair; where upon a long and ſerious Debate, it was carried by the major part, that it was both juſt and reaſonable for the Prince to aſſiſt and protect the King of Caſtile; and the Duke of Lancaſter then obtain'd leave to go over and aſſiſt the Prince his Brother in this intended Expedition.

[a] All things being thus ſettled between theſe two Kings, and Prince Edward (who was now reſolved to reſtore Don Pedro) there was nothing remaining, but to find old experienced Soldiers ſufficient for ſo great an Enterprize; for which purpoſe He ſent private Meſſengers into Spain to the Engliſh Captains and Officers of the Companions, [b] the chief of whom were Sir Hugh Calverly and Sir Robert Knolls, who had lately help'd to place King Henry on the Throne, to engage them and their Followers to quit his Service, and come and ſerve the Prince of Wales, which they being moſt of them Engliſh-men, or Gaſcoignes, readily accepted, as well out of Duty as hopes of Plunder; and ſo having obtain'd of K. Henry the Pay due to them and their Men (He being glad to be rid of ſuch troubleſom Gueſts, and thinking himſelf ſafe enough without them) gave them leave to depart: Upon which leaving Caſtile, they paſſed over the Mountains of Navarre into France; in [c] the Borders of which being ſet upon by the Nobility of thoſe Parts, who looked upon them as the ſworn Enemies of their Country, they could not get into Prince Edward's Territories without great Difficulties; for when they came near Montauban, to the number of about four or five thouſand, the Earl of Narbonne, and the Seneſchal of Tholouſe, with the Governours of other Towns for the French King, having got together ſufficient Forces, fell upon them, and there began a furious Battel between them; but at laſt the Companions being aſſiſted by Sir John Combes Governour of that Place for the Prince, defeated the French Army, and took the Earl of Narbonne and ſeveral others Priſoners, with a great deal of rich Booty, and killed a great number of them upon the place. They come to Pampelona.

From hence theſe Princes marched in Battel Array towards the Borders of Caſtile; where in the mean while King Henry being highly beloved by his Subjects for his juſt and equal Government, had raiſed an Army of near a hundred thouſand Men, with which he advanced towards the Frontiers to meet the Prince of Wales, who with his Forces went on without any Reſiſtance till they came to Salvaterra a Town on the Borders of Caſtile, which was preſently ſurrender'd to them: and here the Prince received Intelligence, that King Henry was not far off with his whole Army; whereupon He immediately marched from thence to a Place called Victoria, near which he drew up his Army, conſiſting of about Fifty thouſand Men in Battel Array, expecting King Henry's Approach, who now made a halt with all his Forces, till Sir Bertrand de Gueſclin with Four thouſand Men at Arms, beſide ſome others out of Arragon, could arrive. But the day [6] following, the Count de Teillo Brother to King Henry, received his Orders to march out with Six thouſand Men at Arms to view the Engliſh Army, and meeting with a Party of them who were going to the Camp, he not only kill'd moſt of them, but falling upon the Duke of Lancaſter's Battalion, as they lay encamped, beat down their Tents, and kill'd a great many of his Men, till the Earl fearing he ſhould be engaged with the whole Army, thought it beſt to retreat, which he did without any great damage; but in his return met with

With which Succeſs the Spaniſh King and his Army being much animated, they marched forward to meet Prince Edward and his Army, who were now diſlodged from the Place where they had been, and were come to a Town call'd Vianna, near the River Ebro on the confines of Navarre; where hearing that King Henry lay encamped before Najara, He ſent Him a Letter by his Herald, in anſwer to another He had a little before receiv'd from Him, wherein He had deſired to know, Upon what ground the Prince made War upon Him; to which He return'd in × Anſwer, × That it was to maintain Right and Juſtice, as it becomes all Kings and Princes, and in perſuance of the Antient Alliances between the King his Father and King Pedro; yet nevertheleſs that if He (Don Henry) were willing to it, ſince He heard he was a Worthy and Valiant Perſon, He would do his Endeavour to reconcile Him to the King his Brother, who ſhould allow Him a part of the Kingdom, provided He would renounce his Pretenſions to the reſt: and ſo left Him to take the beſt Advice about it. The Battel of Najara, where K. Henry's Brothers quit the Field.

Then [1] on Friday, being the Second of April, the two Armies approached each other not far from Najara, and the next Morning early they engaged. I ſhall not trouble you with the Order of their ſeveral Battalions; but not long after the beginning of the Fight (wherein the Spaniards at firſt acquitted themſelves well) the Prince of Wales with King Pedro brought up the main Battel, and fell upon Count de Teillo and his Brother Don Sancho, who, being either terrified by the Prince's briſk and reſolute Attacque, or for ſome other reaſons, upon the very firſt Charge fled out of the Field with above Three thouſand Lances in their company; which ſo diſcouraged the reſt of the next Battalion, that being charged afreſh by the King of Majorca and the Captal of Buche (whoſe Diviſion immediately followed that of the Prince) the whole Battalion was quite routed and put to flight; whilſt the Prince, who aim'd at greater matters, marched forward againſt the main Body, conſiſting of about ſixty thouſand Men, commanded by King Henry Himſelf. Here the Fight was very fierce and bloody; for as the Spaniſh Foot conſiſted of a great many Slingers, who ſlung Stones with a mighty force, ſo the Engliſh Archers with their Arrows did a great deal of miſchief both to Horſe and Man; and there was a ſharp Conflict between the Engliſh Soldiers and thoſe of France headed by Sir Bertrand de Gueſclin, who commanded the French and Britiſh Voluntiers; and theſe being all old Soldiers, behaved themſelves ſo gallantly, that if the Spaniards had acquitted themſelves as well, they would in all probability have obtain'd the Victory. But being cloſely preſſed by the Troops of the Companions and others on the Engliſh ſide, they at laſt began to give Ground; and in fine, notwithſtanding all King Henry could do, tho He rallied his Men three ſeveral times that day, and made them many ſhort encouraging Speeches, they were at laſt quite routed and put to flight, with the loſs of betwixt Five or Six thouſand, who were left dead upon the

As for the number of the ſlain they were between Five and Six thouſand Men, beſides thoſe that were cut off in their flight, which might be about Three thouſand more. This Battel was fought between Najara and Navaret, in the Province of Rioxa in old Caſtile, on the Third day of April, being Saturday, An. Dom. 1367.

About [3] Noon, when the Battel was ended, the Prince cauſed his Banner to be erected on the ſide of a little Hill, thereby to direct his Men in their return from the Chace; whither not long after came the Duke of Lancaſter, the Lord Chandois (who had behaved himſelf very Gallantly that day) and many other Earls and Barons of Gaſcoigne: then came alſo from the Purſuit the King of Majorca, and preſently after Him King Pedro Himſelf, mounted on a Black Courſer, having fought valiantly to recover his Crown; who, when He came near the Prince, alighted, and would have kneel'd to give Him Thanks, but He, running to embrace Him, would no ways permit it; however bowing very low, He gave Him Thanks, that by his Valor and Aſſiſtance He had now regain'd his Crown; to which the Prince modeſtly reply'd: Sir, render Thanks to God Almighty, and give Him all the Praiſe; for by Him alone, and not by Me, have you obtain'd this Victory. Then the Prince having aſſembled his Council, conſulted a while what was to be done in the preſent Conjuncture, for during this time his Men were return'd from the perſuit; and being near Night, it was reſolv'd they ſhould go to their Quarters; where having poſſeſs'd themſelves of the Spaniſh Camp, they were very well refreſhed with the Proviſions their Enemies had left, for they had been before in great want. The next Morning when the Prince was ready, He received the Solemn Congratulations of his Brother the Duke of Lancaſter, and the reſt of the Princes, Noblemen and Commanders in the Army; but when K. Pedro began to threaten what ſevere Revenge He would take againſt his Baſtard Brothers, and all thoſe who had rebel'd againſt Him, Prince Edward generouſly interceded for them, and deſired the King's Pardon, except for one Arch-rebel William Garilz, who He was contented ſhould be made an Example. This Requeſt King Pedro conſented to, tho much againſt his Inclination, ſince He could not handſomly deny any thing to his Benefactor, tho He did not afterwards make good what He had now promiſed.

Id. ibid. The Prince puts the King in mind of his Promiſe to pay the Army.

After [1] which King Pedro, being now ſettled in his Throne, the Prince civilly put Him in mind of his Agreement in France, and that He would take all the ſpeedy Care he could to raiſe Mony ſufficient to pay the Army, that it might be diſbanded as ſoon as poſſible, ſince it was not only a great Expence to them both, but alſo a mighty Burthen to the Country where they lay; to which the King reply'd, That He had not the Mony yet ready, but would take care to raiſe it, as ſoon as He had marched to the Borders of Sevil, and there ſettled his Affairs; in the mean while He deſired Him to ſtay at Valladolid, promiſing Him to return about Whitſontide; tho He never was as good as his Word, as you will preſently find: for when the Prince had lain with his Army in and about Valladolid till Midſummer, expecting the King's return, and that He neither ſaw Him nor heard any thing from Him; He was extreamly diſpleas'd at it, and thinking Himſelf deluded, was adviſed by his Council to ſend certain Knights to the King to know his Reſolutions, and why He had not made good his former Engagements. He received them very civilly, and made them a plauſible Excuſe for his Failure; that his Subjects averred they could not raiſe any Mony, by reaſon the Engliſh Army (and eſpecially the Companions) lay ſo hard upon them, who had twice or thrice robbed his Officers of the Mony He was ſending to the Prince; and therefore He now deſired Him to diſmiſs his Soldiers ſo ſoon as he could, eſpecially the Companions, who ſpoiled and ravaged the Country where-ever they came; and if the Prince's occaſions requir'd his Departure, He need only leave behind Him ſome of his faithful Knights, to whom He would certainly pay all ſuch Sums as ſhould appear to be due according to his late Engagement in France.

The King excuſes the Failure of his Promiſe.

Id. c. 243. The Prince finding Himſelf over-reached, is adviſed to return Home.

This [2] being all that the Prince's Deputies could then obtain of Him, they return'd back to their Lord, and gave Him an account of what the King had ſaid to them; at which the Prince was more out of Temper than before: for He now perceived that He was as Falſe and Perfidious, as He had been Wicked and Cruel. But ſeeing He could not well force Him to make good his Word, becauſe the Prince's Army not being able to endure the Summer's Heats in Spain, many of them were dead, and more lay in a very languiſhing condition; therefore his Council adviſed Him, That ſince He was thus over-reached by King Pedro to his Shame and Diſhonour, and that his Army died ſo faſt, to return Home before matters grew worſe, and by his Preſence to prevent the Attempts of the Baſtard Henry upon his Principality of Aquitain. This being reſolved on, the Mareſchal D'Endreghan with other Knights and Eſquires of France, to about the number of Two hundred, were admitted to Ranſom; but as for Sir Bertrand de Gueſclin he ſtill continued a Priſoner, for he was look'd upon as ſo dangerous an Enemy, that it was not ſafe to let him go, becauſe he might preſently join with Henry the Baſtard, who they then heard was gone into the Country of Bigorri, and had got the Town of Bagneres, whereby He had done much miſchief in thoſe parts.

The French Priſoners are admitted to Ranſom, except Sir Bertrand de Gueſclin.

For Henry flying firſt to the King of Arragon, and not finding Him either [a] able or willing to give Him any Aſſiſtance, he went into Languedoc to the Duke of Anjou, who out of hatred to the Engliſh furniſhed Him with Men and Mony to invade Prince Edward's Territories; and the Duke had done more, had He not, upon the Complaint of the Prince of Wales to the French King his Brother, been by Him forbidden acting any further, leſt it might produce a Breach of the Peace between the Two Kingdoms; France not being then in a Condition to renew the War, as you will find it was the Year following.

But we ſhall now return to the Prince of Wales, [a] who whilſt He lay this Summer at Valladolid, loſt above half his Men by Fluxes or Feavers; and among others the King of Majorca fell ſo dangerouſly ill, that the Prince was forced to leave Him behind for the Recovery of his Health. After this Prince Edward took the firſt opportunity he could to march away; but ſince the King of Navarre neither came nor ſent to Him concerning his repaſſing thro his Country, He was forced to treat with the King of Arragon by certain Commiſſioners on both ſides, (who met on the Borders for that purpoſe) and it was there at laſt concluded between them, That the King ſhould lay open his Country, and permit the Prince and his Army to paſs thro freely, they paying for ſuch Proviſions as they needed and ſhould take from the People. But when the King of Navarre heard that Prince Edward was like to return without having any occaſion to paſs thro his Country, being afraid of his Diſpleaſure, He ſent to offer Him free paſſage by the ſame way He came, as alſo for the Lords and other Great Men and their Retinue, yet He would by no means ſuffer the Companions to paſs thro Navarre; wherefore the Prince order'd them according to the Agreement He had made with the King of Arragon, to paſs thro his Country: but becauſe He knew the paſſage thro Navarre was ſhorter and more commodious than the other, He choſe to go that way Himſelf, being convey'd with the reſt of his Army quite thro that Kingdom, beyond the Paſſages of Roncevaux; from thence the Prince marched at his eaſe till He came to Bayonne, where He was received with great Joy, and tarried there Four days, to refreſh Himſelf and his Men. After this He proceeded towards Bourdeaux, where they received Him in Triumph: He was here alſo met and welcom'd by his Princeſs with her Eldeſt Son Edward, who was then about Three years of Age; and here likewiſe the Prince disbanded the greateſt part of his Army, and ſent the Lords and Captains of Gaſcoigne and others to their ſeveral Countrys, having own'd his Obligations to them, and promiſed to pay every Man punctually what was due, ſo ſoon as He could raiſe Mony, even tho King D. Pedro ſhould not keep touch with Him, And, for his own part, Honour ſhould be his Reward. Not long after this, the Companions that went thro Arragon, return'd into the Dutchy of Aquitain, where they had Quarters aſſign'd them, till they could be paid their Wages.

This Expedition proved very unfortunate to Pr. Edward.

And thus ended this Famous Expedition of Prince Edward, which tho (as Great and all Extraordinary Actions do) it procur'd Him a deal of outward Glory, yet whether it was that God did not approve of his aſſiſting ſo wicked a Tyrant, or that the Sins of the Engliſh Nation call'd for freſh Judgments, I leave it to the Great Diſpoſer of all things to determin. But as we muſt here put a period to the Health and Happineſs of this Prince's Life, for in this Expedition He contracted ſo incurable an Indiſpoſition, as turning to a Dropſy, ever after render'd Him unfit for Action, and never left him till He died: ſo we muſt likewiſe conclude all the Happineſs and good Succeſs of King Edward's Reign, during the reſt of which we ſhall ſcarce meet with any thing, but the untimely Death of his Sons, and that of his Deareſt Conſort the Queen, the Diſcontents and Factions of his Nobility and Subjects, with the loſs of all He had gotten by his Conqueſts in France; nor was the ſtate of things any whit better, but rather much worſe during the Reign of his Grandſon.

Sir John Leigh Leigh committed to the Tower.

[3] There were divers other Buſineſſes tranſacted in this Parliament, which ſince they are of no great moment, I ſhall but ſlightly mention, tho they are alſo found upon Record. On the twenty firſt of May the King gave thanks to the Lords and Commons for their coming, and that day all the Lords and divers of the Commons dined with the King; after which Sir John Leigh was brought before Him, and the Lords and Commons (I mean ſuch as dined there) to anſwer certain Objections made againſt him by William Latimer, concerning a Lordſhip belonging to Robert Latimer, with certain Lands which had been granted during his Minority, and being afterwards granted to the ſaid Sir John Leigh, he being Steward of the King's Houſhold, compel'd the ſaid William by Dureſs of Impriſonment to ſurrender up the Eſtate into his hands: And tho Sir John excuſed himſelf, as being the King's Grantee, yet was it not admitted, becauſe he had uſed force, and had not outed the ſaid William by due Proceſs of Law. There were alſo divers other Complaints againſt him, that as Steward of the King's Houſhold, he had cauſed ſeveral Perſons to be attached by Order of the Council, and then appear before him alone, and make anſwer out of Council; with ſeveral other Miſdemeanors too long to be here inſerted. Of all which Accuſations Sir John not being able to purge himſelf, was by Order of the King and Lords committed cloſe Priſoner to the Tower, and order'd to pay a Fine according to the King's Pleaſure; which I here take notice of, to let the Reader underſtand, that this is the firſt Precedent I can find, not only of any Accuſation or Impeachment of a Perſon in Parliament, for a ſimple Miſdemeanor, and not for Treaſon, but alſo where the Offender was committed to Priſon by the King and Lords at a private Meeting, when the Parliament was not ſitting. I have no more to add concerning this Parliament, but that it was preſently after diſſolv'd.

Yet before I leave the Affairs of England, I muſt take notice [1] that this Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury above-mention'd was about the latter end of September following created a Cardinal of St. Sixtus; and reſigning his Arch-Biſhoprick, went to Rome, where he liv'd about eight Years in great Eſteem, being ſucceeded in this Arch-Biſhoprick by William Witleſey a Man of great Parts and Learning.

Pr. Edward being forced to keep the Troops of the Companions undiſbanded, they commit great Diſorders.

We will paſs over into Aquitain, [2] where now began thoſe Diſturbances, which prov'd the ruin of the Engliſh Affairs in France; for in the beginning of this Year, Prince Edward being ſtill in great want of Mony, and not likely to receive any of the Arrears that were due to Him in Spain, He was forced to keep good part of his Forces (and eſpecially the Companions, who were ſtill about ſix thouſand) on foot and undisbanded; and they having no pay, could not forbear their old trade of plundering and robbing the Country, whereof the People made loud Complaints to the Prince. He was thereupon forced to ſend to the Companions, commanding them either to deſiſt from their Exorbitances, or to depart his Dominions, ſince the Country was no longer able to bear them; which it ſeems either out of Love or Fear of the Prince they not long after obey'd, and paſſing the Loire, went into France; and by that time they were got into Champaigne and the Biſhoprick of Rheims, their Numbers were mightily encreas'd, many idle Fellows and disbanded Soldiers out of hopes of Plunder joining themſelves with them, who ſtill marched on ravaging the Country as they went. Then the People loudly exclaim'd againſt the Prince of Wales, for imploying theſe Companions to make War upon them, and ſent daily Complaints thereof to their King at Paris, but not being able to apply a preſent Remedy ſufficient to encounter the Diſeaſe, all He could do at preſent, was, to raiſe ſome Forces to put a ſtop to their further Progreſs, of which He made the Lord Oliver Cliſſon, a valiant and experienced Warrior, chief Commander.

Whereupon the People complain.

Pr. Edward holds an Aſſembly of the Eſtates of Aquitain, wherein a great Fouage is granted.

While theſe Companions were thus diſturbing France, [3] the Prince of Wales was adviſed by ſome of his Council, eſpecially the Biſhop of Rodez, then Chancellor of Aquitain, to raiſe a Fouage or Tax upon all Chimnys throughout his Principality, thereby to enable Him to pay the great Debts he had contracted by his late Spaniſh Expedition; and beſides, the Court which the Prince then kept was ſo great and expenſive, that there was ſcarce the like in Chriſtendom: Wherefore He held a Parliament of the Eſtates of Aquitain, for raiſing this Fouage at Niort; to which were ſummon'd all the Barons of Gaſcoigne, Poictou, Saintogne, and of divers other Parts, and Deputies from all the Cities and great Towns of that Principality; before all whom the Biſhop of Rodez declar'd in preſence of the Prince, that this Fouage was neceſſary to be raiſed, and that the Deſign of it was, to enable the Prince their Lord to pay ſuch Debts as He owed upon the account of his Spaniſh Expedition; but however it was the Prince's intention not to continue the ſaid Fouage any longer than for the ſpace of five Years to come, during which time at [4] the rate of one Frank for each Chimny, the Prince would have a yearly Supply of one Million and two hundred thouſand Franks, if the matter had been effectually put in execution. But [1] altho to this Ordinance all the Poictovins readily agreed, as did alſo the Deputies of Saintogne, Limoſin, Rovergne and Rochelle; yet divers of the Lords of the Marches of the higher Gaſcoigne refus'd to concur with them, as the Earl of Armagnac, the Lord of Albret his Nephew, the Lord of Conde, the Lord of Pincornet, the Lord of Cominges, the Viſcount of Carmaine, the Lord de la Barde, and ſeveral other Barons and Deputies of Cities and Towns, who ſaid, how that "heretofore, when they were "under the French King, they were not then griev'd nor oppreſs'd "with any ſuch Subſidies, or Gabels; nor any more would they be "now, if they could help it: for they ſaid, their Lands and Seignio-"ries were free, and exempt from all ſuch Duties; and ſo the Prince "had ſworn to keep and maintain them. Yet however theſe Lords, becauſe they durſt not openly oppoſe the Prince, and had a mind to get home as ſoon as they could, only anſwered in general, that they would go back, and take further Advice with their Tenants or Feudataries, and would then return again by ſuch a time. This was all the Anſwer that the Prince and his Council could then get from them; and ſo they broke up, and left Niort, having received a Command from the Prince to return again thither by a Day prefix'd, which they never perform'd.

[3] Id. c. 239.

Thus theſe Barons and [2] Lords of Gaſcoigne went to their ſeveral Countries and Seats, having firſt firmly agreed together by no means to return to the Parliament appointed by the Prince, nor to ſuffer the Fouage to be raiſed in their Lands, but rather to rebel againſt Him; wherefore ſhortly after the Earl of Armagnac, the Lord of Albret, the Lord of Cominges, the Viſcount of Carmaine, and the reſt of the Barons, Knights, and Gentlemen of thoſe Parts, went into France, and there put up their Complaints, to the French King's Court at Paris, in the Preſence of Him and his Peers, of the great Grievances and Oppreſſions which the Prince of Wales would now impoſe upon them; adding that in ſuch caſes their whole Reſſort and Appeal ought to be to the King of France, as unto their Sovereign Lord. The French King, who at firſt ſeem'd to make ſome ſcruple to meddle with this Affair, as that which would tend to the breaking of the Peace, which had been ſo ſolemnly eſtabliſh'd between the two Kingdoms, anſwered them, (with diſſimulation enough) "Surely, my "Lords and Gentlemen, the Juriſdiction of our Inheritance, and of "the Crown of France, We will always preſerve and augment to "our Power; but We have ſworn to keep ſundry Articles contain'd "in the Peace of Bretigny, which are not now in our remembrance; "but We ſhall inſpect them, and conſider the Tenor thereof, and as "much as in Us lies, We will do you Right, and ſhall be glad to "reconcile You with the Prince, our dear Nephew: For perhaps He "is not well adviſ'd thus to deprive either You, or your Vaſſals, of "their Cuſtoms and Franchiſes. [3] With this Anſwer for the preſent they ſeem'd contented, but tarried at Paris, reſolving not to return to their own Homes, nor to the Prince's Parliament, at which He was extremely diſpleas'd; but for all that He proceeded in raiſing the aforeſaid Duty; and being in great want of Mony, admitted Sir Bertrand de Gueſclin to ranſom himſelf for two hundred thouſand Franks, and who upon his diſcharge went immediately to the French King, and afterwards became more than ever an Enemy to Prince Edward and the Engliſh Intereſt.

I cannot but here obſerve, that [1] Sir John Chandois, a wary and prudent Baron, and one of the Prince's chief Counſellors, when he found Matters run ſo high, and foreſaw the evil Conſequences of them, adviſ'd the Prince to remit this Chimny-Mony; but perceiving he could not prevail, that ſo he might not incur any blame in this matter on either ſide, he deſired leave to go and look after his Eſtate in Normandy, which the Prince admitting him to do, he return'd no more into thoſe Parts, till the breaking out of the War; and then he came again to his Aſſiſtance againſt the French.

The Ld Chandois ſeeing the ill Conſequences of this Chimny-Mony, adviſes the Prince to remit it.

But to continue our Hiſtory of the Diſturbances that now began in Gaſcoigne, [2] the King of France cunningly fomented the Diſcontents of thoſe Lords and Barons and their Feudataries, till they had kindled as great a War between the two Nations, as ever had been before: For He had under-hand already aſſured to Himſelf theſe Gaſcoigne Lords, and the Princes of Germany by his ready Mony, of which He knew they were very greedy, and by that means He drew great numbers of Voluntiers into his Service, as alſo by the Perſuaſions of Sir Bertrand de Gueſclin, who was then mightily admired by all Military Men. The King was likewiſe furniſhed by the Eſtates of the Kingdom with ſufficient Subſidies to carry on a War, without any great Burden to the People.

The King of France foments the Diſcontents of the Gaſcoigne Lords.

The [3] Gaſcoigners being thus ſupported, reſolved never to ſubmit to the Fouage, which the Prince would needs lay upon them, and therefore made divers freſh Remonſtrances againſt it; ſo that tho He held ſeveral Parliaments at Niort, Angouleſme, Poictiers, Bourdeaux, &c. yet theſe rebellious Gaſcoigners refuſed to appear at them, ſaying, that for their parts they could not ſuffer this Fouage to be levied in their Country, and declared that their laſt Reſſort and Appeal had ever been to the Chamber or Parliament of France. At this mention of Reſſort the Prince was extremely offended, and plainly told their Deputies, that they ought not to make any Reſſort or Appeal thither for the future, becauſe the French King had quitted for Himſelf, and his Heirs for ever, all Reſſorts and Juriſdictions whatſoever, when He reſign'd thoſe Lands entirely and abſolutely to the King of England; as was evident from the Tenor of the Charter of Peace, wherein theſe Matters were ſo clearly explain'd, that there is not the leaſt Clauſe in any one Article, whereby there is any Reſervation for the French King again to challenge any Juriſdiction over them. But tho this Meſſage of the Prince was ſent to thoſe Lords of Gaſcoigne, who ſtill ſtood out; yet they would not for all that come to his Parliament, but return'd him an Anſwer by their Letters to this effect: That it was not in the power of the King of France to acquit them of their Reſſort to his Court; for the Prelates and Barons of the Cities and good Towns of Gaſcoigne did not aſſent to it, nor ever would they, tho the Realm of France ſhould continue perpetually in War upon that account. Thus the reſt of this Year was ſpent in Meſſages and Diſputes between the Prince and the Lords and Barons of Gaſcoigne, the greateſt and moſt powerful of whom (being thoſe already mention'd) ſtill remain'd at the Court of the King of France to ſollicit

The Gaſcoigners make ſeveral Remonſtrances, and refuſe to come to any of the Prince's Parliaments.

The Prince is much offended with them.

K. Pedro returning to his former Cruelties, provokes his Subjects again to call in K. Henry.

But before I conclude this, I ſhall give you a ſhort account of what happen'd in the mean time in Spain, where after King Pedro's being ſettl'd on the [1] Throne by the Prince of Wales's means, He began again to ſhew Himſelf more than ever a Tyrant, taking horrid Revenge upon all thoſe He had before pardon'd, and treating the reſt of his Subjects with utmoſt rigour and ſeverity, which made 'em ſo deſperate, that they reſolv'd to recal King Henry the Baſtard, who had been driven out of his Kingdom the laſt Year; who being a Prince as much belov'd for his good Qualities, as his Brother was hated for his bad ones and Cruelties, He was reſolved to lay hold on this opportunity of the Prince of Wales his being engag'd in domeſtick Jars and Differences with his Subjects, and to take his leave of the King of Arragon, that aſſiſted Him with ſome Forces, as did alſo the Duke of Anjou and Count de Foix. x Thus making up an Army of about ſix thouſand Foot and three thouſand Horſe, beſides certain mercenary Genoueſes, with theſe ſmall Forces He marched to Caſtile, and coming before Burgos, the Citizens open'd their Gates to Him upon the firſt Summons, and again acknowledg'd Him for their King; from whence He went to Valladolid, where He was received in like manner: And here finding James King of Majorca, who had not yet recover'd his Health, He ſeized his Perſon, and took him Priſoner, for having taken part with his Enemy the Prince of Wales. Upon this King Henry marched to the City of Leon, which was likewiſe immediately ſurrender'd; and whilſt He was there, the whole Province of Galicia came over to Him; nor did He meet with any Oppoſition till He came to the City of Toledo, and that indeed ſtood out, and would not own Him for King; wherefore He laid cloſe Siege to it.

x For the ~~Fren~~ King of France had now made a League offensive and defensive with that Tyrant, as you'll find by the Article of it in Rs. Col. p 598. to 602.

K. Pedro ſummons his Subjects to his aſſiſtance, but they deſert him.

King [2] Pedro was at this time at Sevil in the Borders of Andaluſia, where hearing of the Invaſion of his Baſtard-Brother, and the Revolt of ſo many Cities from Him, He was very much ſurprized at it; but when He had ſent out his Summons to his Subjects, and found that but few would come into his Aſſiſtance, almoſt all of them deſerting Him, He began to deſpair, till being encourag'd by his intimate and faithful Counſellor Hernando del Caſtro, He was by him adviſ'd to crave the aſſiſtance of his Couſin Ferdinand King of Portugal, as alſo of the Mooriſh Kings of Granada and Tremeſin, which they promiſed Him: So that being ſuccour'd by theſe Princes, He made up in all, of Chriſtians, Moors and Jews, an Army of about forty thouſand men, with which He marched towards the City of Toledo, that was then cloſely beſieg'd by King Henry the Baſtard; who, when He heard of his Brother's approach, by the Advice of Bertrand de Gueſclin (now come in to his aſſiſtance with two thouſand French-men) raiſ'd the Siege from before Toledo, and leaving a part of the Army to block it up, march'd away with the reſt to meet the Tyrant as ſoon as He could; and ſo He did within a few days after, near the Caſtle of Montiel, where ſurprizing Don Pedro before He was aware, [3] He routed the Rear of his Army; but drawing up the reſt in good order, there began a ſharp and bloody Battel, which was fought for a time with equal Succeſs, both the Brothers behaving themſelves with great Gallantry, till at laſt the Caſtilians, French-men and Arragonians being being too hard for the Jews, Moors and Portugueſes, King Pedro's Army was entirely routed, and He himſelf forc'd to take refuge in the Caſtle of Montiel, which tho very ſtrong of it ſelf, and well man'd, was not able to hold out for want of Water and other Proviſions. King [1] Pedro finding He could not ſubſiſt there any longer without ſurrendring, was reſolved to try to make his eſcape in the Night. But as He attempted to do it with a very few Perſons in his company, He was ſeized by the * Beague of Vilain a French-man, who then commanded the Guard before the Place, or (as [2] others relate) was betray'd by Bertrand de Gueſclin himſelf, to whom he offer'd twenty thouſand Crowns to let him eſcape. But this is certain, that whoever took Him, He was immediately ſecur'd in a Tent under a ſtrong Guard, where He had not been long, but King Henry and the Count of Rochebreton came in upon Him, and ſeveral opprobrious Words paſſing between them, the two Competitors preſently grapl'd together; and King Pedro flinging Henry down, had there ſtab'd Him with his Dagger to the Heart, had it not been for the Count of Rochebreton, who laying hold on Pedro, pull'd him off, and thereby gave Henry the advantage of being uppermoſt, who immediately drew out a Knife or Dagger, wherewith he ſtab'd the other in the Body, where He lay till he breathed his laſt. Thus fell this wicked and unhappy Prince by his Baſtard Brother, and Competitor, who now recover'd the Crown, which (notwithſtanding the foulneſs of the Action) remains to his Poſterity to this day: And it being ſomewhat extraordinary, I thought it would not be amiſs to give you a particular Hiſtory of ſo remarkable a Revolution: and tho the manner of this Prince's Death is differently related by our Engliſh, as well as French and Spaniſh Hiſtorians; yet I have ſet down this Account from an Author of Credit, as the moſt probable of any I have met with: and I have here put all things relating to this Tranſaction together, tho the laſt part of them properly belongs to the next Year, this [3] Battel being fought on the fourteenth of March 1368. and the Death of King Pedro happened about ten days after.

He endeavours his Eſcape, but being prevented, is carry'd to a Tent, where K. Henry ſtab'd him with a Dagger.

In the mean while the Diſpute between Prince Edward and the Barons of Gaſcoigne ran higher than ever; for [4] the Prince ſtill aſſerting his Right of impoſing the ſaid Fouage or Chimny-Mony, they ſtill inſiſted, that in ſuch extraordinary caſes their laſt Reſſort or Appeal was to the King's Chamber or Parliament at Paris. Wherefore they humbly deſired the King, that the Prince of Wales might forthwith be ſummon'd to make his Appearance there, to anſwer before the Peers of France concerning thoſe Grievances and Innovations, which he had began to exerciſe upon them. But tho the French King was willing enough to comply with theſe Gaſcoigners, who thus addreſs'd themſelves to Him as to their Sovereign Lord; ſince otherwiſe He muſt loſe all Juriſdiction and Sovereignty over them for ever, as alſo the opportunity of making War again upon the Engliſh; yet Matters not being then ripe for it, and his Brother the Duke of Berry, with others of the French Nobility being ſtill Hoſtages in England, it was thought fit at leaſt that the chiefeſt of them ſhould be got out of King Edward's hands, before any open War ſhould be declar'd. To this end therefore, [5] John Duke of Berry, who had received a private Account of theſe Matters, had ſome time before obtain'd leave of King Edward to return into France, and there to recreate Himſelf among his Friends and Relations for the ſpace of one Year; but when He was got into his own Country, He order'd his matters ſo dextrouſly, and found out ſuch cunning and plauſible Excuſes for his not coming over again, that he ſpinned out the time till the War was declared; and then He thought Himſelf freed from all Obligations of returning: but Guy of Luxemburgh, Earl of St. Paul, made a ſhift to ſteal into France, without ever taking his Leave of King Edward.

The Earl of St. Paul arriving in France, does all he can to make King Charles take the Gaſcoign Lords into his Protection.

This [1] Nobleman being an implacable Enemy to the Engliſh Nation, upon his return home, perſuaded King Charles all he could to take the Gaſcoign Lords into his Protection; for he believed that if once the Pr. of Wales ſhould be ſummon'd to the Parliament at Paris, a War would moſt certainly break out, which was like to turn to the Advantage of France: and to this agreed ſeveral of the Chief Prelates, Earls and Barons of France, who perſuaded their Maſter to inſiſt that the King of England had not truly kept the Peace, to which He had ſworn and ſeal'd, according to the Tenor of the Treaty made at Bretigny, and afterwards confirm'd at Calais: for the King's Council then urged, That the Engliſh had more diſturb'd the Realm of France, ſince the Peace was made, than they had done before, and that what they aver'd was true; farther they deſired, that the Charters of Peace ſeal'd by K. Edward and the Prince his Son, and which they were by Oath obliged to obſerve, ſhould be produced and read in the King's Preſence; who thereupon, to be inform'd of the truth of the matter, cauſed the ſaid Charters to be brought into the Council-Chamber, and heard them read over twice or thrice, that ſo He might the better conſider the Articles therein comprized. But that which He thought made moſt for his Advantage was, [2] the Great Charter of Renunciation, ſeal'd by King Edward at Calais, and called that of Ceſtaſſavoir, as has been already related; whereby it is expreſly provided, That if by Diſobedience, Rebellion, or Force of any of the Subjects of the French King, the ſaid King ſhould be hinder'd from performing all the ſaid Articles, yet neither ſhall the King of England nor his Heirs, for all that make any War upon the Realm of France; but both Kings ſhall joyn together to bring thoſe Rebels to Obedience, and to obſerve the ſaid Peace and Concord: So likewiſe that tho the Subjects of the King of England ſhould refuſe to yield up any Towns, Caſtles or Fortreſſes, which they held in the Realm of France, and which by reaſon of the Peace ought to be deliver'd up; or what any other cauſe ſhould hinder, that the King of England could not perform what He was bound to by reaſon of this Treaty; yet the King of France ſhall not make War therefore upon the Dominions of the King of England; but both the Kings were to joyn together to reduce thoſe Rebels to Obedience, and by force to recover ſuch Towns, Caſtles and Fortreſſes, and to deliver them to whom they ought to be deliver'd.

The Fr. King's Council alledg ſeveral Breaches on the ſide of the Engliſh.

To which end they moſt inſiſt upon a Clauſe in the Charter of Renunciation.

And there is alſo another Article in the ſame Treaty, * where after a recital of the Oath that the King of England had made for Himſelf, his Heirs and Succeſſors, not to do, nor ſuffer to be done any thing againſt this Renunciation, or againſt any thing contain'd in the afore-ſaid Articles; it follows thus: " And if We do, or ſuffer to be " done the contrary any manner of way (which God forbid) then " We will that We be reputed for Falſe and Forſworn, and incur

"ſuch Blame and Infamy, as a King Sacred ought to incur in ſuch a caſe. To the Obſervation of which Charter, not only the King, but all his Sons and the Major part of the Earls and Barons of England were ſolemnly Sworn.

Now [1] that which the King and Council of France urged on behalf of themſelves and that Kingdom, againſt King Edward and the Prince his Son, was, "That They having ſince the making of the late Truce broken their ſaid Oath, by not yielding to the King of France their due Aſſiſtance in driving out the Companions, that ſtill held divers Towns, Caſtles and ſtrong Places in France, and from thence ſpoil'd and ravaged the adjacent Countries, but had alſo ſent a new Army of the ſaid disbanded Companions into the King's Dominions, who had done as much Miſchief as thoſe that were there before, and do ſtill keep ſeveral Towns and Caſtles, contrary to the ſaid Peace; and thereby have, and alſo do commit divers great Hoſtilities againſt the King and his Subjects: And tho King Edward might think Himſelf an Abſolute Sovereign in Aquitain by the Treaty of Bretigny, and ſo not lyable to anſwer for the Oppreſſions of his Subjects in thoſe Parts, yet ſince He had not truly obſerved the Articles on his ſide, therefore the whole Treaty was null and void; ſo that the ſaid King Edward and the Prince his Son, ſtill remain'd Vaſſals to the Crown of France, as they were before the ſaid Treaty. [2] They alſo further urged, That it was void for another more weighty Reaſon, viz. "The Agreement made between the two Kings at Boulogne, on the twenty ſixth of October 1360. by which it was accorded, That whereas for ſome Difficulties, which then happen'd, the Renunciations to be made at Calais could not be then perfected, both Kings ſhould by the Feaſt of St. Andrew the Year following ſend their Deputies to Bruges, to bring with them the ſaid Treaty of Peace and Renunciation, in new Letters Patents, ſealed with their Seals, and until that time they ſhould be of no effect: and that till then the King of France ſhould have and enjoy the ſaid Reſſorts and Sovereignties in the ſaid manner as before. So that theſe Inſtruments not being deliver'd at Bruges by the Day appointed, the French King's Sovereignty over Aquitain, &c. was again revived. But of this I ſhall ſpeak further, under the Year 1370; but ſhall now confine my ſelf to treat of the Year enſuing.

When King Charles had thus held the Barons of Gaſcoigne in ſuſpence for divers Months, [3] and found they were now fixt, and that rather than ſubmit to the Prince of Wales, they would abſolutely revolt, and become Subjects to the Crown of France, and joyn with Him in making War upon the Engliſh, He was then encouraged to declare Himſelf more openly; and to this end, with the Advice of the Earls of Armagnac, Perigort and Cominges, as alſo the Lord of Albret, and other Barons above-mention'd, He order'd a Letter of Summons to be drawn up, and ſent by two Perſons of no great Quality to the Prince of Wales, then at Bourdeaux, which they deliver'd into his own hands, which the Prince order'd to be read aloud; and was to this effect:

And orders the Meſſengers to be ſeiz'd.

When the [3] Prince had heard theſe Letters read, He was highly incenſed; yet endeavouring to reſtrain his Paſſion, He return'd them this Short but Reſolute Anſwer: Gentlemen, We ſhall be willing to wait on Our Uncle the King of France at Paris, ſince He hath thus Invited Us; but it ſhall be with Our Helmet on Our Head, and attended by Sixty thouſand Men. At which the French Gentlemen in a great Fright, beg'd his Pardon, ſaying, they were commanded to do what they did by the King their Maſter. But the Prince being under ſome Diſturbance, withdrew into another Room, and left them at liberty to go when they pleas'd, as preſently they did; for they left the City, and went towards Tholouſe, where the Duke of Anjou then reſided. And the Prince being incenſed by the Lords of his Council at the ſawcineſs of this Action, that theſe Men having no Safe-Conduct, ſhould preſume to ſerve Him with ſuch a Summons, thereupon forthwith ſent certain Meſſengers after them, who ſeizing their Perſons upon the Road, carried them Priſoners to the City of Agen; which being told the Duke of Anjou, by ſome of their Servants that eſcaped, He was very well pleas'd at it, becauſe he knew it would prove a freſh cauſe of War and Rupture with England, which He very much deſired.

[4] Id. ibid. King of France makes ſecret Preparations to prevent the Pr. from doing him any prejudice.

[5] T. W. ad hunc An.

But tho King [4] Charles Himſelf did not receive the Anſwer that was ſent Him, by thoſe to whom it was deliver'd, yet He ſoon heard it by ſome that belonged to them; and therefore being much concerned at what had happen'd, He made the beſt Preparations He could to avoid the fatal effects that muſt be expected from that Summons. For altho He had made ſecret Leagues and Confederacies with the Emperor and other Princes, and privatly agreed with many of the Captains of the Companions to engage in his Intereſt, yet all this while [5] He carried things ſo cunningly, and ply'd King Edward with ſuch frequent Meſſages and Ambaſſies, as alſo Remonſtrances and Overtures, for the better obſerving of the Peace, that He thereby reckoned Himſelf ſo ſecure of the French King's Intentions, that when his Son wrote Him word of the evil Affections and Deſigns of the Barons of Gaſcoigne, and what they were doing at the Court of France; and therefore intreated Him that He would not too much rely upon the ſmooth Words and Profeſſions of the French Ambaſſadors; the King was ſo far from giving credit to what the Prince had written, that He looked upon it as the warm Apprehenſions of a Young Man, who was impatient of Peace. Thus did this Politick Prince lull this Credulous King aſleep, till he had ſecretly by his tampering with his Subjects, not only in Gaſcoigne, but in the Country of Ponthieu, made them ready for a Revolt; whilſt the other being too ſecure, uſed no means to prevent it by reinforcing his Gariſons in thoſe Parts, as He might eaſily have done, had He been ſooner aware of the French Deſigns: Which may ſerve as a laſting Warning to our Engliſh Kings, either wholly to come over to the French Intereſt, or if not, timely to provide againſt a Breach, which will never fail to happen on the firſt Occaſion or Advantage they can think themſelves Maſters of; and againſt which no Oaths or Promiſes, tho never ſo ſolemnly made, have ſignified any thing, according to the beſt of my Obſervation. But to proceed to our Hiſtory.

King of France calls an Aſſembly of the Eſtates.

When the Appeals of the Lords of Gaſcoigne (above-mention'd) had been for ſome time received by the King of France, in his Great Council or Parliament at Paris, He to engage all the Eſtates of the Kingdom in his Quarrel, ' on the Twenty firſt of May, held a great Aſſembly of them at Paris, according to the accuſtomed manner; and the firſt thing He did, was to lay before them the Appeals of the Gaſcoign Barons, with the Cauſes why He had receiv'd them; and deſired their Advice what He had beſt to do thereupon. After ſome debate, they all anſwered with one Conſent, That his Majeſty had done well and reaſonably in receiving the ſaid Appeals, and that they ought not to have been refuſed; declaring further, That if the King of England began a War upon Him on that Account, it would be unjuſt and againſt all Equity.

' Chron. Franc. MS. penes Cler. Urb. London.

After this, the Letters or Memorial which K. Edward and his Council had lately deliver'd to K. Charles's Ambaſſadors at London were alſo read before them, conſiſting of ſeveral Remonſtrances and Complaints of the late Breach of the Treaties of Bretigny and Calais; which being ſet down under ſeveral Heads or Articles, the French King had politickly added his Anſwers to each of them. Theſe being very long, I omit, ſince they are now of little Uſe; but they chiefly contain that King's Juſtification for receiving the ſaid Appeals, and that for theſe Reaſons:

" Firſt, Becauſe the Prince of Wales had infringed the Liberties and Privileges of thoſe Countries, Cities and Towns, that had lately made their Appeals to the King of France; and eſpecially of thoſe that had been delivered to King Edward by virtue of the Treaties above-mention'd; by which it is expreſly provided, and by Him agreed to, that they ſhould be duly kept and obſerved: and this He (the King of France) having ſtill retain'd the Sovereignty over all thoſe Places, was thereby impower'd to ſee perform'd; which Sovereignty, tho He had not thought fit to exerciſe, and put in practice till there ſhould be occaſion for it, yet had that wholly depended on his own Good will and Pleaſure, ſince He might have reaſſumed the Exerciſed of it whenever He pleaſed, and for this He appealed to the Charter of the intended Renunciations already mention'd, in which it is expreſly provided, That till the ſaid Renunciations were actually made in the Manner and Form thereby appointed, the Sovereignties and Reſſorts belonging to the ſaid Places were to remain in the ſame State as before, till ſuch time as the King of France had expreſly renounced all his Right and Title to them, which He had never yet done, nor was now at all obliged to do: For that the King of England had never ſent thither any Perſons before whom the King of France might make and excuſe his ſaid Intended Renunciation; but this the ſaid King did not now require at his hands, becauſe the time within which it was to be made was long ſince elapſed.

“ But as for what the King of England had replied, That if the French King refuſed to make the Renunciations agreed on, but would ſtill receive the Appeals of the Gaſcoign Lords, He the ſaid King Edward was likewiſe free to reaſſume his Right to France, together with the Title of King thereof: To this it was anſwered, That there were not the ſame Reaſons for the one as for the other; ſince if King Edward ſtiled Himſelf King of France, it only concern'd his own Pleaſure and private Intereſt; but for the K. of France to receive the ſaid Appeals, He did not only regard his own private Advantage, but chiefly thoſe who had appeal'd againſt the Oppreſſions of the Prince of Wales, their immediate Lord, and for which the ſaid King was obliged to do them Juſtice, as being ſtill their Sovereign.

“ That as for the K. of England's offering to repair the Attempts and Breaches he had made on the Liberties and Privileges of the Appellants, provided they would return to his Obedience; and as for his alledging his being ſtill ready to make the ſaid Renunciation on his part, whenever the French King would do the like on his: To this He anſwer'd, That this was no Juſt nor Reaſonable Propoſal, becauſe He had not done any thing in Breach of the ſaid Treaty by receiving thoſe Appeals, but had rather done his Duty towards thoſe who ſtill continued under his Sovereignty; nor were they any more obliged to return to the Obedience of the Prince of Wales, unleſs it could be prov'd, that they had appeal'd without any juſt Cauſe, in which Caſe the King of France would act according to Juſtice and Reaſon.

“ But as for his Receiving the King of England's Renunciation, or making any ſuch Himſelf, the time being long ſince elapſed for the Performing of it, He did not look upon Himſelf now at all obliged either to accept it from that King, or make Him any ſuch Renunciation as He demanded.

This is the Sum of what was material in the French King's Anſwer to King Edward's Demands, as to that King's Renouncing the Homage and Sovereignty over Aquitain. The reſt of his Anſwers concerning the Reſtitution of ſeveral Places ſtill detain'd and undelivered by King Charles, I omit, becauſe they contain only matter of Recrimination upon King Edward, for not reſtoring ſeveral Towns as He ought to have done by the ſaid Treaties; as alſo becauſe they ſhew more of Trick and French Chicanry, than Truth or ſolid Reaſon. But what Reply King Edward made to theſe Reaſons, I do not find; yet I think it plain enough to any unprejudiced Reader, That the King of France's Arguments are indeed meer Cavils; for it appears evidently from the above-recited Inſtruments of the Intended Renunciations, that the King of France was not to have, or exerciſe any Sovereignty over Gaſcoigne, nor the Towns and Territories to be given up by Him, until the time of the ſaid Renunciation to be made at Bruges, as is already mention'd. And tho it may from thence ſeem to be intended, that in caſe thoſe Renunciations were not made and ſent to Bruges in the manner as was therein preſcribed, that then each King, as to the Sovereignty over each others Dominions, ſhould remain in the ſame State as before; yet ſince this Engagement was mutual, and that King Edward was no more obliged to make the Renunciation on his part, before the French King had done the like for Himſelf and his Heirs, they being to do it both together; the King of France could not in Juſtice take any Advantage of that Omiſſion, unleſs He could have proved at the ſame time that He had offer'd to make his ſaid Renunciation at the Place and within the Time required, which had been refuſed to be accepted of and performed on King Edward's part.

But to return to the Hiſtory. All I ſhall farther relate concerning this Affair is, That the Eſtates of France did now ſo far approve of their King's Proceedings with his Adverſary of England; [d] that they promiſed Him their utmoſt Aſſiſtance, in caſe a War ſhould break out between the Two Nations, as it did indeed the Summer following. Wherefore in perſuance of their former Vote, the Eſtates at their next Meeting in December, upon the King's Declaring to them, That He could not carry on the War without an extraordinary Expence, did therefore grant Him an Exciſe of Twelve Livres upon each Meaſure of Salt, and Four Francs upon each Chimney in all Cities and Good Towns, and One Franc upon all ſmaller Villages; and beſides theſe, they likewiſe impoſed a Great Exciſe upon Wines, and all Cattle that were to be ſold in Paris, and other Cities and Great Towns. Thus reſolute was the French Nation to maintain what they thought to be for the Honour and Intereſt of their King and Country, and ſo far leave an Example worthy the Imitation of other Nations as well as their own. I have here added this laſt Tranſaction, tho done at the latter end of this Year, becauſe I would put all things relating to this Affair together. But I ſhall now proceed to what happened the Summer before, and how the War broke out again between the two Crowns.

[d] Id. ibid. The States of France promiſe the King their utmoſt Aſſiſtance in caſe of a War with England.

When all things were ripe for Action, and that the Chief of the French Hoſtages had one way or other got out of King Edward's Power, the War ſo long deſign'd by the French King thus broke out: The rebellious Lords of Gaſcoigne being reſolved to revenge the late ſeizing of K. Charles's Meſſengers, as done on their Account, and having Intelligence that Sir Thomas Wake [e] Seneſchal of Rovergne was on ſuch a day to go from thence to Rodez with Sixty Lances to reinforce that Gariſon, they laid an Ambuſh for him of Five hundred Men, led by the Earl of Perigort, who falling upon the Engliſh on the ſudden, killed moſt of them, and had done the like to Sir Thomas himſelf, or at leaſt had taken him Priſoner, had he not by the goodneſs of his Horſe made his Eſcape to Montauban. Upon which Prince Edward being highly incenſed, ſent immediately into Normandy to Sir John Chandois to come to his Aſſiſtance, which he preſently did, and waiting on him at Angoleſme, he was immediately ſent with certain Troops of Men of Arms and Archers to reinforce the Gariſon of Montauban, and thence to make War upon the Gaſcoigners and Frenchmen, who daily encreaſed in their Numbers, and over-ran his Territories: but the Prince was not ſtrong enough to act otherwiſe than upon the Defenſive, tho the Captal de Buche, and many other great Lords and Officers came in to his Aſſiſtance; yet not having Money ſufficient to raiſe or pay an Army, he could at preſent do no great matter againſt the French, till he had receiv'd freſh Succours from England; to the Affairs of which it is now time to return.

The Prince not being ſtrong enough, can only act defenſively.

Before King Edward could receive any account of what had been done in Gaſcoigne, the [4] King of France had underhand tamper'd with the Townſmen of of Abbeville in Ponthieu to try if they would revolt, and receive a French Gariſon: and finding them weary of the Engliſh Government, He reſolv'd to put his Deſign into ſpeedy Execution; and tho he had at this time his Ambaſſadors in England, who to blind the Buſineſs trifled away the time in making frivolous freſh Complaints, yet it was without any mention of a War. But all things being now ripe for Action, He thought it unbecoming a King to begin it, without any notice firſt given [5]; and therefore by the Advice of his Council He ſent King Edward Letters of Defiance, not by any Prelate, Lord, or Man of Quality, but by an ordinary Valet, or Serving-man, at which King Edward was much provoked, looking upon it as a great Affront to his Royal Dignity; when but juſt before this, the King upon receiving Intelligence that K. Charles had begun ſome Hoſtilities in Ponthieu, had diſmiſſed his Ambaſſadors, and at the ſame time refus'd a Preſent of Wines and other things which had been juſt before ſent Him by their deceitful Maſter. And indeed it was a great ſurprize to the King to find open War thus declared againſt Him on the ſudden, by a Prince who was never look'd upon as a Warrior, and would never have preſumed to have done it, had He not receiv'd very great Encouragements at Home as well as Abroad. But now King Edward thought it high time to ſecure his Frontiers in Ponthieu, where the Lords Piercy, Nevil and Windſor were order'd immediately to paſs over with ſufficient Forces for that purpoſe; but as they were juſt ready to depart [6], the News came, that the Earl of St. Paul, and Sir Hugh de Chaſtillon Maſter of the Croſs-bows of France, had by that King's Command, already ſeiz'd the Town of Abbeville, the Men opening their Gates to receive them; and that preſently after they had made themſelves Maſters of the whole County of Ponthieu, taking all the Officers both Civil and Military, together with the Soldiers, Priſoners. Thus did King Edward loſe on the ſudden all his Territories in Picardy (except Calais, and the Country about it) without ſtriking a ſtroke.

The King of France tampers with the Townſmen of Abbeville.

So there was no way to recover theſe Loſſes but by the general Aſſiſtance of the Nation in Parliament, * which was now ſummon'd to meet on the Octaves of the Holy Trinity, or the next Sunday after that Feaſt, being the 27*th* of May; † when the King, Prelates, Dukes, Earls, Barons, Knights, Citizens and Burgeſſes being aſſembled in the Painted-Chamber, William of Wickham, then Biſhop of Wincheſter, and Chancellor, ſhew'd them the Cauſe of Summons, telling them, that the King in all his great buſineſſes touching Himſelf and the King-

Then [7] the King, to prevent any Miſchief that might be done by the Scots (whom He heard were engaged in a new League with the King of France) ſent a conſiderable number of Archers and Men of Arms to ſecure the Frontiers of that Kingdom; beſides which He ſent a good Fleet to cruiſe about the Channel, for He heard the French King was ſetting forth a great Navy to Sea, which was to come and invade England, or (as others ſay more probably) Ireland; wherefore * He was obliged to ſend thither no ſmall Forces under the Command of the Lord William Windſor, who was alſo appointed Lieutenant of that Kingdom; he immediately repair'd to it, being * accompanied by the Lord Faulkenbergh, and other Perſons of Quality and Experience. Thus did the King, not knowing where the Storm would fall, take all poſſible care to ſecure his Dominions againſt the ſudden Attempts of his newly declar'd Enemy. In the mean while the War between the two Crowns was open'd in France; for not [8] long after the ſaid Defiance was ſent to K. Edward, the Dukes of Anjou and Berry, Brothers to the French King, immediately invaded the Dutchy of Aquitain; and the latter of theſe having ready at his Command all the Barons of Auvergne, of the Biſhopricks of Lyon and Maſcon, together with the Lord of Beaujeu, and divers other Noblemen, theſe coming with a notable number of the Companions, who were now brought over to the French Intereſt, made up a very conſiderable Army,

Anno Dom. MCCCLXIX.

Army, and invaded the County of Poictou, while the Duke of Anjou, who likewiſe had gain'd over to his Party certain Gaſcoigne Captains of the Companions, as St. Perdicas, D' Albret, and ſeveral others, all bringing in their Troops to the French Service, ravag'd Gaſcoigne on that ſide towards Tholouſe. But many of theſe Companions with their Captains, eſpecially thoſe who lay about the City of Mans, and in the Lower Normandy, continued ſtill firm to the Engliſh Intereſt, and with their Forces took the City of Vire, and deſtroy'd the Country round about.

But theſe Numbers were too weak to do any thing conſiderable; wherefore King *[1] Edward in the beginning of the Spring ſent over five hundred Lances, and a thouſand Archers, under the Command of Edmund Earl of Cambridg (afterwards Duke of York) the King's fourth Son, and John Haſtings Earl of Pembroke his Son-in-law, who landing with their Forces at St. Malo's, were kindly received by the young Duke of Bretagne their Brother-in-law. Theſe marching thro the Dutchy of Aquitain, arriv'd at Angoleſme, where the Prince then was; but he being much indiſpoſed, was not able to accompany them; wherefore after ſome days reſt theſe Lords being join'd with certain Troops of the Companions, that Sir Hugh Calverly had lately brought out of Spain, made up in all a ſmall Army of above three thouſand Men, and marching into the County of Perigort, waſted it with Fire and Sword, and laid Siege to the ſtrong Caſtle of Bourdeilles, which was at laſt ſurrender'd, tho after a long Siege, as you will find hereafter.

With which they march into Perigort, and beſiege Bourdeilles.

But on the [s] other ſide, the French Forces, who were much more ſuperior in number than the Engliſh about the Borders of Poictou, ſurprized certain of theſe latter Troops by an Ambuſh: and tho they made a brave and noble Defence, yet they were either kill'd, or put to flight, and moſt of their Captains taken Priſoners; the chief of whom was Sir Simon Burley, who had been bred up with Prince Edward from his Childhood. The News of his being taken with the loſs of ſo many brave Men, was a great trouble to Him.

The French being ſuperior in Poictou, ſurprize certain Troops of the Engliſh.

In the mean while [t] the Lord Chandois, and Sir Guiſchard D'angle were in and about Montauban with their Troops; but tho they had been hitherto diſappointed in ſeveral of their Undertakings, yet they now march'd with their Forces, and laid Siege to the Town of Terrieres in Tholouſaine, which being taken by a Mine, the Place was plunder'd, and the Inhabitants put to the Sword. But the Duke of Anjou, who was then at Tholouſe, ſent the Earls of Perigort and Cominges, and divers other Commanders, with their Troops to the number of about ten thouſand, with which they marched into Quercy, where they began to do a great deal of miſchief by burning and ravaging the Country, and ſo came before *[2] Roanville, a Town in thoſe parts: But the Seneſchal of that Province had ſo well furniſh'd the Place with all things neceſſary, that it was not to be taken without a formal Siege of ſeveral Months, and that not by ſtorming, but by ſpringing a Mine, and then all the Engliſh therein were put to the Sword; but the Townſmen upon their ſwearing Allegiance to King Charles were receiv'd to Mercy.

Arms, the chief Leader whereof was the Lord of Armagnac, and ſeveral other Barons of thoſe Parts, who ravag'd the Borders of Rovergne, Quercy and Limoſin; when beſides open Force, the Duke of Anjou made uſe of Religion as a pretence (as it hath often been a handle to juſtify very unrighteous Wars) for the Archbiſhop of Tholouſe, a Politick Prelate, was prevail'd upon to go to the City of Cahors, of which Place his Brother was then Biſhop; and there thoſe two Brothers ſo powerfully preach'd up the Right of King Charles againſt King Edward's Pretenſions, that the whole City revolted, and ſwore Allegiance to the French King.

The Archbiſhop of Tholouſe is prevail'd on to preach up the French Cauſe, and thereby the City of Cahors, &c. revolt from the Engliſh.

With theſe Arts the Archbiſhop rode about through the County, ſetting forth the Juſtice of his Maſter's Quarrel with ſuch Popular Arguments, and inforc'd with ſuch ſeeming Proofs out of Scripture, that together with the Terror of the Duke of Anjou's Arms, who hover'd thereabouts, he brought over no leſs than fifty Cities and Towns to the French Obedience. And becauſe this Archbiſhop was found to ſucceed ſo well in Gaſcoigne, therefore in Picardy did divers Prelates and Clergymen take upon them to diſcuſs the Rights of theſe two Kings in their Pulpit, and you may be ſure always determin'd it on the behalf of their own Prince, whilſt the unthinking Vulgar ſwallow'd vvhatever they thus pretended to be Divinity as well as Juſtice: vvhilſt thoſe that vvere the ſetters on of theſe Preachers obtain'd two ſeveral Ends by it; the one to reduce thoſe Places back again to the Crown of France, that had been before given up by the Treaty of Bretigny; and the other to render the People more eaſy and willing to ſupport the Charge of the War.

King [4] Edward was alſo oblig'd as vvell through Piety as Policy to uſe the ſame Methods in his Kingdom, thereby to render his Subjects more vvilling to venture their Lives in his Cauſe, when they were made ſenſible of the Juſtice of it; and Simon Sudbury * Biſhop of London, a Man vvell read in the Canon Laws and holy Scriptures, and of great Eloquence, preach'd many Sermons, declaring and proving unto the People, that the French King had renew'd the War, not only againſt his Oath, but alſo againſt all Right and Reaſon, by manifeſt Injuſtice, Fraud and Perjury: All which, together vvith King Edward's Title to France, he ſet forth with great ſtrength of Argument and Rhetorick, to the ample Satisfaction of his Auditors. Nor was King [5] Edward wanting to his own Intereſt in renewing his Alliances Abroad vvith the Dukes of Haynault, Guelders and Juliers; but tho the two laſt being King Edward's near Relations engag'd to aſſiſt Him, yet Albert Duke of Bavaria, then Governor of Haynault (inſtead of his Brother Duke William, who at that time labour'd under an incurable Diſtraction) and the Duke of Brabant, who had not long before contracted a League with the King of France, reſolv'd to ſtand Neuter; and as for the Earl of Flanders, he having newly newly married his only Daughter to Philip Duke of Burgundy, the French King's Brother, had abſolutely declar'd himſelf for their Intereſt. Thus vvas England, as to Foreign Aſſiſtance, in a worſe Condition than ever, being left in a manner deſtitute of any conſiderable Alliances from Abroad, the Princes that took his part being but few, and thoſe inconſiderable.

K. Charles orders divers Diſcourſes to be publiſh'd in Juſtification of his Cauſe.

Nor vvas this War carried on only by Temporal and Spiritual Weapons, but alſo by Paper Combats; for King Charles to render his Cauſe more plauſible to the Eye of the World, now cauſ'd to be publiſh'd certain Letters or Extracts relating to the Peace made at Bretigny, and ratified at Calais, wherein he ſets forth the ſubſtance of what according to his Obligation he had perform'd, and vvhat the King of England had not done, tho by Oath and Honour bound thereunto, producing ſuch Articles and Points as made for himſelf; but cuningly concealing or putting falſe Gloſſes upon vvhatſoever made againſt him. And he now alſo cauſed certain Doctors learned in the Laws to be vvell fee'd for ſetting forth their Opinions at large concerning the Right of the French King againſt the King of England, both as to the Crown, and alſo to the Superiority and Reſſort of Aquitain; and there are yet extant two Diſcourſes, vvritten by two famous Civilians of thoſe days, belonging to the Univerſity of Bononia in Italy, whoſe Names were John de Lyana, and Richard de Salicette: But many ſuch like Papers, together with his own Charters, did the French King publiſh and diſperſe in the Courts of Foreign Princes, the more to incline them to abet his Quarrel; inſomuch that King Edward, not to be behind hand with him, was oblig'd to make uſe of the ſame methods, and to employ ſome Learned Pens to juſtify and defend his Claim to the Crown of France, and to prove the Breach of the Truce wholly to lie on the French King's ſide, which was alſo cauſed to be thrown abroad in thoſe Places where he valued his Reputation moſt, or hoped at leaſt thereby to promote his Intereſt. Divers antient * Copies of this kind are to be ſeen in Latin in a Manuſcript of the moſt Learned Dr. Stillingfleet late Biſhop of Worceſter; and there is in Engliſh another Manuſcript of the ſame kind, formerly belonging to the Reverend Dr. Spencer late Dean of Ely, and Maſter of Chriſt College in Cambridg: which Engliſh Copy ſeems to have been tranſlated with much care from the other by ſome Perſon of Quality, for the uſe of that moſt hopeful Prince Henry, Son to King James the Firſt. King of Navarre again fortifys his Towns and Caſtles in Normandy, and admits Engliſh Forces into them.

The only [1] amends that King Edward had for the falling off of ſo many antient Allies, was, that Charles, King of Navarre, being now returned into France, and remaining unſatiſfy'd in his Demands upon the French King, wanted only an other Opportunity to renew the War againſt Him; and He himſelf reſiding at Cherburg in the Lower Normandy, began to fortify his Towns and Caſtles in Coutantine, and the Earldom of Eureux and other Parts of Normandy, which came unto Him by his Mother the Counteſs of Eureux: and He was not long after prevail'd upon by Sir Euſtace d' Ambreticourt, an antient Servant of King Edward, but then Governor of Charenton, and one of that King's Principal Counſellors, that He took ſhipping in a Man of War belonging to England, and ſo paſs'd over hither; and being kindly receiv'd by King Edward, it was agreed between them, that He ſhould admit Engliſh Troops into his Gariſons, and then ſend to defy the French King; and ſo He return'd into Normandy with a very good Force of Engliſh Archers and Men at Arms, which were diſpos'd of in moſt of his Gariſons, according to the ſaid Agreement. But Sir Euſtace d' Ambreticourt being ſent for by the Prince of Wales, went into Aquitain, and as ſoon as he arrived was ſent away to reinforce the Lord Chandois and the Captal de Buche, who lay then at Montauban, keeping the Frontiers againſt the French, of whom we ſhall ſpeak more hereafter.

The Caſtle of la Roche de Pozay is ſurpriz'd by the French.

All the reſt of this Year was ſpent in taking of Towns and Caſtles on either ſide, or elſe in ſlight Skirmiſhes, but without coming to any ſet Battel; but whether it proceeded from the great Caution of the French Commanders, or the want of ſufficient Forces on the Engliſh Side, you will find hereafter. But theſe Actions being of no great importance, and ſet down by my Author very confuſedly, without any due Order of Time, I ſhall give you as brief an account of them as is poſſible. [1] The French Forces in Picardy, making up a Body of about two thouſand men, under the Command of the Conſtable of Fiennes, marched and beſieged the ſtrong Caſtle of Ardres not far from Calais; but by the Valour of the Gariſon they received a ſhameful Repulſe, and were forced to march off. [2] In the mean time Sir John de Bueil, with ſome other Captains of the Companions for the French, and a Party of about twelve hundred men, ſurprized the ſtrong Caſtle and Fortreſs of la Roche de Pozay, on the River Creuſe, which put all that Country into a great conſternation; whereupon Prince Edward, who was ſtill ſick, and unable to do any thing in Perſon, ſent for Sir Guiſcard d' Angle, and other Gentlemen with their Forces from Montauban, and order'd them to Poictiers to defend that City, which now lay open.

[3] Id. ib. The Lord of Chauvigny falls off to the French Intereſt.

The Ld Audley marches into Berry, and ſpoils the Country.

About this time, [3] the Lord of Chauvigny (who was alſo Viſcount of Breuſe) abandon'd the Engliſh Intereſt, and fell off to the French; and ſo having furniſh'd his Town of Breuſe in Maine near Lavardin with Bretons and other Soldiers, he went himſelf to Paris to the French King. As for his Town of Chauvigny, that was ſtill in the hands of the Engliſh. To revenge which Treaſon, the Lord Audley, a Man of great Courage and Conduct (who had ſo ſignaliz'd himſelf at the Battel of Poictiers) being now Seneſchal of Poictou, by the Prince's Command raiſed a ſmall Army of twelve hundred Men at Arms, beſides Archers and other Footmen. With theſe Forces he marched from Poictiers into Berry, pillaging and ſpoiling the Country wherever they came; as they did alſo in Touraine, the People flying before them into ſtrong Towns and Fortreſſes: but when they came into the Lord of Chauvigny's Country, there they put all to Fire and Sword, finding nothing to reſiſt them, except ſome Fortreſſes. At laſt they came before the Town of Breuſe in Maine, on which they gave ſuch brisk Aſſaults, that they ſoon took it by Storm, and having plunder'd and burnt it, put all the Gariſon to the Sword, and ſo the Engliſh return'd again into Poictiers.

[4] Id. c. 261.

About the ſame time, [4] Sir Robert Knolles being then in Bretagne, tho he was by the Duke's Favour ſettl'd in a very good Eſtate, yet preferring his Honour before his Eaſe, when he heard of the War the the French had begun upon the Prince of Wales, ſet out four Veſſels in the Mouth of the River Vilaine, and leaving his Caſtle of Derval, with ſixty Men of Arms, and as many Archers, went on board and landed at Rochel, from whence he went to Angoleſme, where he was ſo welcome to the Prince, that as an acknowledgment of his great Valour and Conduct, He made him Commander in chief of all his Forces in thoſe Parts: But Sir Robert being a man of but mean Birth, this Honour created ſuch an envy againſt him among the reſt of the Engliſh Commanders, many of whom were of greater Birth and Quality, that it afterwards proved very prejudicial to the Prince's Affairs.

He marches into the French Country, and beſieges and takes divers Towns.

However, [1] Sir Robert being now in Supreme Command, began his March againſt the Enemy, attended by the Lord Haſtings, Sir Neal Loring, and divers other Lords and Perſons of Quality, who with their Soldiers made up a ſmall flying Party of above a thouſand men. With theſe marching into the French Territories, he beſieged a ſtrong wall'd Priory call'd Durmel near the City of Cahors, which being very well fortified by the Companions that were of the French ſide, was by them ſo well defended, that after five weeks Siege, they were forced to riſe from before it, and march away and ſit down before the Town of Domme on the River Dordonne, where likewiſe meeting with no better Succeſs, they marched off, and went to a Caſtle called Foines, which the French Companions had newly taken; but not being ſtrong enough to hold it, they preſently ſurrender'd, and ſwore Fidelity to the Prince, tho they did not long obſerve it. From thence the Engliſh Army went to Rochemador, a Town of Quercy, on the ſame River, which being briſkly aſſaulted, ſurrender'd upon Conditions. After which they marched towards Ville Frenche in Perigort, waſting and ravaging the Country all along as they went, and taking in divers Towns and Caſtles, till they came to the Place abovemention'd, which after four days Aſſault was ſurrender'd upon good Conditions, the loſs of which was much reſented by the Duke of Anjou, who vowed to revenge it.

The Siege of Bourdeilles carry'd on by the Earls of Cambridg and Pembroke, which at laſt they take by Stratagem.

Whilſt the Engliſh Army was thus ſucceſsful in the Borders of Auvergne, Agenois and Rovergue, [2] the Siege was ſtill carried on before Bourdeilles by the Earls of Cambridg and Pembroke for the ſpace of eleven Weeks, and that with various Succeſs; for the Place being very ſtrong, and the Gariſon making a vigorous Defence, the Beſiegers at laſt deſpairing to take it, were about to raiſe the Siege; and had done it, had it not been reſolved in a Council of War to try the Succeſs of a Stratagem (which we find to have been us'd more than once) and it was this: The Army keeping cloſe in the Camp, they ſhould ſend out a Detachment of ſome two hundred choſen men to ſkirmiſh with the Beſieged at the Barriers; they being encourag'd by their former Succeſs, readily accepted of it, and ſallying out, there began a hot diſpute, in which the Engliſh feigning themſelves to be worſted, fled with ſome Confuſion; and to cover the Deſign the better, ſome of them ſuffer'd themſelves to be taken Priſoners: at which the French thinking the Day their own, perſued the reſt with that eagerneſs, that they fell into an Ambuſh of above five hundred men led by Sir John Montague, Nephew to the Earl of Saliſbury; and tho the French made a long and vigorous Defence, yet they were all at laſt either kill'd kill'd or taken Priſoners. In the mean while the Engliſh General, with the reſt of their Forces, advancing to the Barriers, and finding them undefended, and the Gates open, eaſily took the Town, which but for the raſhneſs of the Beſieged, could not have been taken, unleſs by Famine. After this the two Earls with their Armies return'd to the Prince at Angoleſme.

Sir J. Chandois and Sir R. Knolles return to the Prince.

During this Action, [1] Sir John Chandois and Sir Robert Knolles were ſtill perſuing their Succeſs in Quercy, when the former of theſe, together with the Captal de Buche, was ſent for by the Prince to receive his Commands; but Sir Robert Knolles was order'd to remain behind with the Companions to proſecute the War. However, Sir Robert not being willing to ſtay without them, went along with them with the greateſt part of the Forces, leaving the reſt under the Command of Sir Perdiccas d' Albret, who was to remain in the Town of Rochemador to defend thoſe Parts. Preſently after which ſome of the Captains of theſe Companions joined [2] their Forces with Sir John Devereux Seneſchal of Limoſin, where contriving how they might beſt offend and prejudice their Enemies, they at laſt reſolved to ſurprize the Caſtle of Belleperche in Bourbonnois, wherein was the Lady Iſabella, Mother to the Duke of Bourbon, and the French Queen; which Deſign taking, ſhe was there detain'd a Priſoner, to the great affliction of the King and the Queen her Daughter.

The Captains of the Companions ſurprize the Caſtle of Belleperche.

In the mean while Sir John Chandois [3] and Sir Robert Knolles, with the reſt of the Commanders, having waited on Prince Edward for freſh Orders, He told them his Reſolution was, that they ſhould all join their Forces together, and go and beſiege the ſtrong Town and Caſtle of la Roche ſur Yon in the Lower Poictou, which belonged to the Duke of Anjou; upon which the Earls of Cambridg and Pembroke, with Sir John Chandois, muſtering up in all an Army of above three thouſand men, preſently went and laid Siege to the Caſtle above-mention'd, the Governor whereof was one Sir John Blondeau, who finding he was not like to be ſpeedily reliev'd by his Maſter, after ſome time enter'd into a Parly with the Beſiegers, and at length he came to this Agreement with them, That if the Caſtle were not reliev'd within the ſpace of a Month, he was willing to ſurrender it upon their paying him the Sum of ſix thouſand Franks for the Victuals and Ammunition that were therein; whereupon He ſent his Lord the Duke notice of what he had done, and to deſire his ſpeedy Aſſiſtance, who not being able to relieve the Place within the time prefixed, the Governor ſurrender'd it to the Engliſh, and had his Mony duly paid him, and ſo he marched out with his men to Angeers: but when he came thither, he was arreſted by the Governor for what he had done; which the Duke of Anjou hearing of, commanded him to be ſow'd up in a Sack, and thrown into the River, becauſe he took Mony for a Place, which if it had been defended as it ought to have been, might have held out a whole Year. Then the Engliſh Lords having put a ſtrong Gariſon into the Caſtle, went back to the Prince to Angoleſme, and taking their leaves of Him, return'd to their own Houſes for ſome time.

For which the Governor is order'd to be flung into the River.

But we ſhall now ſee what has been the reaſon that King Charles hath all this while ſent no greater Forces to the aſſiſtance of his Brothers the Dukes of Anjou and Berry; [4] for indeed He was engag'd in a higher Deſign, having ſpent the moſt part of this Summer in ſetting forth a Fleet to invade England with a mighty Army, and thereby to make a War by way of Diverſion; on which He was ſo intent, that He lay continually at Rouen, that ſo He might be near at hand to inſpect and haſten the Work, going thrice a week to view his Navy, that then lay below in the River Seine, giving out that theſe Preparations were making againſt Portugal. Nor could He be diverted from it by the Remonſtrances of the Lord Oliver Cliſſon one of his Counſellors, who ſhew'd Him the great Difficulty and Danger of this Undertaking: but when King Edward heard of it, He was not at all diſmay'd; for tho He might have much better encounter'd them at Sea with a powerful Fleet, yet whether it was that He could not ſet one out time enough to prevent the King of France's coming, or that He rely'd upon the Valour of his Subjects; He and his Son the Duke of Lancaſter reſolv'd to fight the French ſo ſoon as ever they landed; and in order to receive them, had ſufficiently man'd all the Ports of England over againſt the Coaſts of Picardy and Ponthieu: and beſides this He had got in readineſs a vaſt Army, which He reſolved to command Himſelf in Perſon ſo ſoon as they could be got together. From whence we may obſerve how ſtrong and conſiderable the Engliſh Militia was in thoſe days, when ſo warlike a Prince durſt truſt Himſelf at the Head of it without any Standing Army.

He ſends the D. of Lancaſter over to Calais.

Yet however, [1] to prevent the French King's coming, He ſent over the Duke of Lancaſter to Calais, accompany'd with the Earls of Warwick, Hereford and Saliſbury, the Lords Manny, Roſs and Piercie, and other Noblemen and old Commanders, with five hundred Men of Arms and as many Archers, who going on board, paſſed over to Calais; where being arrived, He ſummon'd in all the Companions and other Voluntiers, and making up a conſiderable Army within a few days, He marched into the French Territories [2] as far as the Abby of Licques, where he found much Plunder, and brought it away to Calais. Another time He went towards Bologne, where He deſtroy'd all the plain Country round about it; and tho at that time the Earl of St. Paul lay not far from thence at the City of Terouenne, yet he durſt not ſtir to oppoſe Him. So ſoon as King Charles received the News of the Duke of Lancaſter's arrival with his Forces, and the Miſchief He had done, and might do further in his Country, it broke all his former Meaſures: and tho it had been reſolved by Him and his Council, that the Duke of Burgundy ſhould that very week ſet ſail for England, yet after a full Debate it was concluded, that that Expedition ſhould be laid aſide for the preſent, and all the Soldiers deſign'd for the Fleet ſhould be led by the Duke of Burgundy from Rouen towards Calais, to encounter the Duke of Lancaſter: Wherefore ſoon after the Duke of Burgundy marched from thence with his Army toward the River Somme, which He paſſed at Abbeville, and ſo by eaſy Marches He went to Monſtrevil, and there, and about Heſdin, ſtaid for the reſt of his Army that was behind.

Who marching into the French Territories, the D. of Burgundy is ſent to encounter him.

When [3] the Duke of Lancaſter heard that the Duke of Burgundy was advancing towards Him, He was well enough pleas'd, being a young and active Prince that hop'd for ſome Action, whereby He might ſhew his Valour and Conduct; and ſo marched out of Calais with all his Forces, reſolving to meet Him and give him Battel; and to that end encamped in the Vally near Tournham between Ardres and St. Omers. He had not been there above a day or two, before the Lord Robert of Namur came to his Aſſiſtance (as He had lately promiſed the King his Father) with a hundred Lances, and was very kindly received by the Duke his Couſin. Here the Engliſh Army lay, being ſtrongly entrench'd, and well furniſhed with Proviſion from Calais. Not long after which, the Duke of Burgundy marched thither alſo with a great Army, and encamped not far off from the Engliſh upon the Hill above Tournham. But tho the latter were by much the fewer in number, and marched almoſt every day out in Battel-Array to meet the Enemy, yet would not the French venture to come to a ſet Battel; for King Charles, taking warning from the ill Succeſs of his Father and Grandfather, not downright to oppoſe the Courage of an Engliſh Army, gave his Brother expreſs Orders to reſt ſatisfied with keeping the Enemy at a ſtand, and not to come to a Battel: So that great part of the time was ſpent in Skirmiſhes between Parties, in which ſometimes the French, and ſometimes the Engliſh had the better.

He ſends again, but is put off.

Whilſt the two Armies thus lay idly confronting each other, let us ſee what hath been doing in [o] Poictou and Aquitain, between the Forces of the Lord Chandois and the Earl of Pembroke, and the reſt of the Commanders of the Prince of Wales, who had perform'd divers remarkable Exploits. The Lord Audley being retired into England, either for his Health or his own Occaſions, is by Froiſſart falſly ſuppoſed to be dead; but after his departure Sir John Chandois being made great Seneſchal of Aquitain in his ſtead, muſtered up the Prince's Forces, and reſolved to make an Expedition into Anjou, and return back by Tourain, to ravage and ſpoil the French Territories. But to make his Party the ſtronger, He ſent to the Earl of Pembroke, who then lay at the Caſtle of Mortagne in the Borders of Anjou with two hundred Lances, to accompany Him in this Expedition; but the Earl being over-perſuaded by ſome young Gentlemen that were then about him, they inſinuated, that He being ſo great a Peer, and ſo nobly ally'd, it was below him to accompany one ſo much his Inferior, and who being a Commander of ſo great a Reputation, would be ſure to have the Glory of any great Action that ſhould be perform'd; ſo that he refus'd to come to Sir John: which childiſh Emulation proved not only a great Hindrance to this Expedition, but alſo a mighty Shame and Prejudice to the Earl himſelf, as you will find by and by. Notwithſtanding this, the Lord Chandois would not alter his Reſolution, but having muſter'd up three hundred Men at Arms and eleven hundred Archers, and being alſo attended by divers Noblemen and experienc'd Officers, he marched into Anjou, ſpoiling and plundering the Country for fifteen days together: But his Forces being not numerous enough, He could not take any Town or Caſtle of note; however having notice that the Marqueſs of Sancerre, Mareſchal of France, was at la Hay en Touraine with a conſiderable Body of Men, and being deſirous to march that way, but not thinking Himſelf ſtrong enough to encounter the Mareſchal, He ſent a Herald again to the Earl of Pembroke to deſire his Company and Aſſiſtance. To which Meſſage the Earl only return'd, That he could not come, being now engag'd another way. Upon the receipt of which Sir John Chandois being much diſpleas'd, only reply'd, Well then, in God's name be it ſo, ſince a Man of Honour can be biaſs'd from the good of his Country by private Deſigns. And therefore finding he was able to do nothing more conſiderable, he diſmiſs'd his Troops, and return'd to Poictiers.

[3] Id. c. 271.

The Earl of Pembroke goes with his Forces into Anjou, and ſpoils the Country.

Now [3] when the Earl heard he had ended his Expedition, he thought it high time to do ſomething that might eſtabliſh his own Reputation; wherefore he marched out with three hundred Lances, and ſome Voluntiers of Quality, that had lately been with the Lord Chandois; and with theſe he marched thro Poictou, and from thence into Anjou, taking almoſt the ſame way the Lord had done before, ravaging the Country, and getting all the Plunder the other had left: and ſtaying ſome time in the Country about Loudun, went from thence into the Lands of the Count de Rochechouart, who had lately revolted from the Engliſh Intereſt, burning the Country, and doing what Miſchief he could; which when Sir Robert de Sancerre, the Mareſchal's Couſin, with other French Commanders who lay in thoſe Parts, underſtood, and knowing the Earl was a young man, raw and unexperienc'd, they reſolv'd to ſurprize him, and ſo muſtering up what Forces they could out of the adjoining Gariſons, they made up a Party of about ſeven hundred Men; which being commanded by the Mareſchal de Sancerre, they marched after the Earl, then upon his return home with a great Booty; and coming to a certain Village called Puirenon, he reſolv'd to bait there, but having no Scouts out, nor Intelligence of the Enemy, they were upon them before they were aware, and falling into the Town, kill'd the Engliſh in the Streets and Houſes; ſo that all the Earl of Pembroke could do, was to rally about two hundred of his Men, and with them immediately to take refuge in an Encloſure pretty ſtrongly wall'd, belonging to an old Houſe of the Templars, where ſhutting up the Gates, and cloſing them with Stones and Earth, they reſolved to defend themſelves as long as they could; but the French ſoon followed them, and made a briſk Aſſault upon the Place, and clapping Ladders to it, endeavour'd to ſcale it; but the Engliſh from within ſo well defended themſelves with Stones and Arrows, that tho the Aſſault laſted till it was dark night, yet could they not take the Place. So ſoon as the French were retir'd, the Earl conſider'd with himſelf what to do, and finding he could not long hold out, without ſurrendring either by Force or Famine, preſently diſpatched away an Eſquire of his by a Poſtern to Sir John Chandois, who was not far off at Poictiers, to deſire his ſpeedy Aſſiſtance; but the Meſſenger loſing his way, could not get thither till about Nine the next Morning. In the mean while, ſo ſoon as it was day, the French renewed the Aſſault; but being again repulſed with loſs, they reſolved to take another courſe, and to imploy Pioneers to undermine the Walls: but whilſt the Workmen and Tools were providing for that purpoſe, the Earl not ſeeing Sir John Chandois coming to his relief, took this opportunity to ſend another Meſſenger to him with a Diamond Ring for a token, again to deſire his ſpeedy Aſſiſtance. When this Meſſenger got thither, he found Sir John, who, tho he had already notice of it, yet out of ſome Reſentment of the Earl's late unkind Dealings towards him, was not very haſty to go; but at laſt calling to mind, that he was the King's Son-in-law, he preſently roſe from the Table (being ſat down to Dinner) and marched away with his Forces to the Earl's Aſſiſtance; but the French Officers, who had now renew'd the Aſſault, having timely Intelligence by the Scouts they had ſent out, that Sir John was upon his March with a ſtrong Party to reſcue the Beſieged, they thought it the ſafeſt way to march off with what they had got, and to return homewards before the Engliſh could arrive, which they did accordingly, carrying away a great deal of rich Booty with many Priſoners. When the Earl and his Company ſaw that the French were gone off, and out of ſight, they ventur'd out of the Place, and taking Horſe, rode forward towards Poictiers, to ſee if they could meet Sir John Chandois, which they did about a League off, who upon their meeting congratulated their eſcape, and ſeem'd very ſorry that the French were gone before they could arrive. Then taking their leaves of each other, the Lord Chandois return'd to Poictiers, and the Earl to the Caſtle of Mortagne, from whence he firſt ſet out; having, I ſuppoſe, learn'd by a dear bought Experience the evil effects of Raſhneſs, bad Conduct, and needleſs Emulation. But we ſhall now look to what was doing on the ſide of France.

The French aſſault the Engliſh Camp, but are repulſ'd.

In the mean while, the French and Engliſh Armys near Calais ſtill [1] lay facing each other, without coming to any Engagement; only once it happen'd, that certain Knights and Voluntiers of Artois and Picardy reſolved (unknown to their Captains) to aſſault the Engliſh Camp, and ſo fell ſomewhat before day upon that Quarter, where the Lord Robert of Namur lay with his Troops: He having been that night upon the Guard, was not gone to Bed, but was taking ſome Refreſhment, when upon the hearing of the Alarm, He immediately ran with his drawn Sword in his Hand to head his Men, which He did with that good effect, that the French were beaten off, and retired for fear of the coming in of greater Forces.

Yet it [2] diſpleas'd many warm Spirits of both Parties, that the two Armys ſhould lie thus long confronting one another to no purpoſe; tho on both ſides they were alarm'd every day by Reports, that they ſhould fight without fail on the Morrow, which to Morrow it ſeems, never came; for (as we ſhew'd before) the Duke of Burgundy durſt not diſobey the Commands of the King his Brother, who had ſtrictly charged Him by no means to fight the Engliſh without expreſs Order. But it is related by divers of our [3] Hiſtorians (both in Print and Manuſcript) that Thomas Beauchamp, Earl of Warwick, continuing ſtill in England, and hearing how meanly the Engliſh Commanders then declin'd a Battel with the French, muſter'd up ſome choſen Troops, and paſſed over with them to Calais; and that upon the News of their Arrival the French decamped in great haſt, and march'd off into their own Territories; and that ſo ſoon as the Earl arrived at the Engliſh Camp, He highly blam'd thoſe who occaſion'd that ſhameful Delay, and ſaid, I will go on and fight the Enemy, whilſt the Engliſh Bread and Beef is yet in their Bellys: and that thereupon he immediately enter'd the Iſle of Caux in Normandy, which he laid waſt. But this, tho related by good Authors, may very well be queſtion'd; for Froiſſart, who wrote not long after, ſays expreſly, that this Earl went over at firſt with the Duke of Lancaſter; and alſo that the fault lay not on the Engliſh, but French ſide, that they did not come to a Battel: and it is very much that the Duke of Lancaſter and the Lord Manny, Perſons of great Courage and Experience in Military Affairs, ſhould be blam'd for not doing their Duty; whereas it would have been next to Madneſs to have ſet upon the French in their Trenches, when they had ſo much the odds in number. And as for the buſineſs of Caux, tho Froiſſart makes the Duke to have been there, yet he aſcribes the main Honour of it to the Duke of Lancaſter, who commanded in chief, as you will find by and by; ſo that as for this Action of the Earl of Warwick's, I ſhall leave it to the Reader to judg as he pleaſeth, ſince 'tis very doubtful, if not improbable. But to come to ſomewhat more certain.

The [2] Duke of Burgundy being uneaſy in lying ſo long encamped againſt the Engliſh without any Action, at laſt grew quite tired of it, and ſent to the King his Brother, either that He would give him leave to come to a Battel, or elſe to break up his Army and return home; which he judging but reaſonable, thought the latter to be more ſafe, and ſo ſent him immediate Orders to decamp; thereupon the Duke preſently roſe, but ſo privatly, that the Engliſh Commanders had not the leaſt notice of it: So that when one of the chief Officers, who was that night upon the Guard, ſaw the great Light proceeding from the burning of the Huts in the French Camp (which they had ſet on fire before their Departure) He believed it to be ſome Stratagem of theirs, and went immediately to inform the chief Commanders of the Army thereof. Whereupon the Duke of Lancaſter expecting ſome ſudden Surprize or Aſſault, immediately gave Orders for the whole Army to be drawn out in Order of Battel; which being done, and ſeeing no Enemy advance, Scouts were ſent out to diſcover what was doing in the French Camp, who not long after brought word, that it was entirely deſerted, none being left behind but ſome few Sutlers that had followed the Army. This ſeem'd very ſtrange News to the Engliſh Generals, ſince they did not imagine the French would have ſtolen away as they did; but upon it the Duke of Lancaſter decamp'd, and return'd to Calais with all his Forces.

Then [3] after a few days reſt to recruit his Army, the Duke again drew out his Forces, and being attended by the Earl of Warwick and the Lord Beauchamp, the two Marſhals of the Camp, marched into the French Territories; and paſſing by the Towns of St. Omers and Terouenne, as too ſtrong then to be undertaken, they went into Artois, intending to have ſurprized the ſtrong Town of St. Paul, belonging to the Earl of that Name; but he, upon the approach of the Engliſh Army, ſuſpecting their deſign, left Terouenne, where he was Governour, and marching all night with a Body of ſelect men, got into the Place abovemention'd, and thereby ſaved it from being taken: So that tho the Engliſh made an Aſſault, yet they were forced to leave it, and then advancing further, burnt the Town of Luchen, but the Caſtle they could not take. Thus the Engliſh marched three or four Leagues a day, burning and deſtroying the Country as they went, until they paſſed the River Soame at Blanchettaque, with a deſign to march to Harfleur, and there ſet fire on the French King's Navy, whilſt the Earl of St. Paul and the Conſtable de Fiennes follow'd them at ſome diſtance with a conſiderable Body of Men at Arms to obſerve their Motions; but tho they could do nothing upon the Engliſh in their March, by reaſon they kept ſo good Order, yet the Earl of St. Paul having got into the Town of Harfleur before they could arrive, thereby fruſtrated that Deſign: So that after they had lain three or four days before that Place, they were forced to leave it, and then paſſing thro Normandy, burnt and deſtroy'd that part of the Country called le Pais de Caux, and then repaſs'd the River Soame at the ſame place they went over before. And thus the Duke of Lancaſter return'd in Safety to Calais with his Army, without any conſiderable loſs, except that of the [1] Earl of Warwick, who deceaſed on the thirteenth of November of the Plague, or ſome other infectious Diſeaſe of the Camp; of whom my Author giveth this Character, that He ſcarce left his Equal behind him both for Loyalty and Courage. His Body was brought into England, and buried in the Choir of the Church of Warwick, where his Tomb and Statue of white Marble, with that of his Counteſs, are ſtill to be ſeen.

When [2] the Duke of Lancaſter had been for ſome time at Calais, He gave leave to all the German and other foreign Auxiliaries to return home, promiſing them to come again the next Year much better provided than He was now; and not long after He himſelf went for England on the nineteenth of November, the Seaſon being then paſt for any conſiderable Action: tho indeed all that the Duke did this Summer was rather to play a ſaving Game; the King of France having by this wary Management ſo far diſappointed the main Deſign of the Engliſh in coming to a deciſive Battel. And tho they afterwards did his Country a great deal of Miſchief, yet was it without any other advantage to his Enemies, beſides the getting ſome Plunder, ſince they loſt never a conſiderable Town or Caſtle on this ſide of France during this Campagne. But before we conclude this Year, let us ſee what hath been doing in Poictou this Autumn.

[3] Id. ib. E. of Pembroke marches again into Anjou, where he plunders the Country.

The [3] Earl of Pembroke being reſolv'd to revenge the late Affront he had received from the French, went to Angoleſme to the Prince of Wales, and deſired his leave to undertake another Expedition into Anjou; and upon Sir Hugh Calverley's being returned with five hundred of the Companions from an Excurſion he had made into the Territories of the Lord of Armagnac (where he had committed great Devaſtations) the Prince commanded him to join his Forces with thoſe of the Earl of Pembroke, and to accompany him in this Deſign. He was alſo attended by the Lord Lewis of Harcourt and divers other Voluntiers of Quality, who made up in all a ſmall Army of about eight hundred Horſe and fifteen hundred Foot, with which he again marched into Anjou, and burnt and plunder'd the Country as far as Saumur; but that being too ſtrong to be taken by his ſmall Forces, he contented himſelf with burning the Suburbs. While the Earl lay here, Sir Hugh Calverley and his Troops went to a Town on the Loire, called Pont de Ce, about a League from Angiers, which being not very well fortified, they eaſily took, and put a good Gariſon into it; and not long after they alſo took in the Abby of St. Maure, which they ſo ſtrongly fortified, that it proved a conſiderable Defence on that ſide, and did much harm to the Country adjoining, all that Winter, andSummer following.

But theſe ill Succeſſes on the French ſide were ſomewhat made up by their Surprizing the ſtrong Town of St. Salvin, in which there was an Abby; and a Monk there having an implacable malice againſt his Abbot, had no other way to be revenged of him than by betraying the Abby into the hands of Sir Lewis of St. Julian, who with ſome Troops of the Companions getting into it, from thence eaſily maſter'd the Town, which they preſently new fortified. The loſs of this Place was a great vexation to Sir John Chandois, becauſe being Seneſchal of Poictou, it lay within his Government; wherefore He reſolved to retake it as ſoon as he could, but loſt his Life in the Attempt, as you will find hereafter.

[1] To give the Reader ſome Diverſion from the Affairs of War; about the beginning of April this Year, the Match was concluded between Philip Duke of Burgundy, Brother to the King of France, and Margaret Daughter to the Earl of Flanders, which was chiefly effected by the Counteſs of Artois, Mother to that Earl; and not long after it was Conſummated, to the great joy of the French, who thereby defeated the hopes King Edward had of making this Match for one of his Sons, and alſo their Power and Intereſt were greatly ſtrengthened by this Alliance.

If we look into England, [2] we ſhall find nothing there but Grief and Mourning, for the Death of that good Queen Philippe, Wife to King Edward, who deceaſed at Windſor on the Fifteenth day of Auguſt, after a long Sickneſs. Froiſſart gives a large Account of her Death, and the handſom Speech She made to the King before her Departure; wherein after She had call'd to mind that great Happineſs, Peace and Proſperity they had liv'd in for ſo many years, She concluded with making Him theſe three Requeſts: The firſt was, That He would be pleas'd to pay all her Debts; the Second, That He would make good all her Charities and Donations to Colleges, Churches and Religious Houſes; and the Third, That He would give Orders when ever He died that his Body ſhould be bury'd by Her's at Weſtminſter. Theſe being granted by the King with moſt tender Expreſſions, She then, having recommended Him, with Her ſelf and Children, to God's Mercy and Protection, quietly departed, to the great Grief of all her Subjects, who highly loved and honoured Her, as being a true Friend to the Engliſh Nation, Liberal to her Servants, and highly Charitable to the Poor. She lies buried in the Abby Church of Weſtminſter under a Tomb of black Marble, on which lyes her Effigies in Alabaſter, with an odd Head-dreſs according to the Faſhion of that Age. Near it hangs a Tablet, containing ſome indifferent Latin Verſes, ſetting forth Her Birth, Marriage and Vertues, the two laſt Verſes concluding with Her being Foundreſs of Queen's College in Oxford:

In the beginning of this Year, [4] notwithſtanding the late great Aſſiſtance the Parliament had given the King, He was ſtill in ſuch great want of Mony, that not being willing again to have Recourſe to his People (in Parliament I ſuppoſe) for fear of being deny'd, He followed very unhappy Councils, and borrowed great Sums of Mony of Merchants and other Perſons of Eſtates, affirming He had need of it for the Defence of the Kingdom, and would lay it out accordingly; tho my Author ſays, it did not turn to any good Account.

Sir John Chandois endeavors to ſurprize the Town of St. Salvin, but is diſappointed.

But ſince I find nothing ~~now~~ more in England worth our remarking, We ſhall look into France, and ſee what was doing there in the mean while. [5] Preſently after Chriſtmas, Sir John Chandois being reſolved to ſurprize the Town of St. Salvin, which was not long before unhappily betray'd (as hath been already related) He to that end muſter'd up a ſmall Army of Engliſh and French, to the number of about Three thouſand Men, who marching thither in the Night, intended to have got over the Ditches of the Place, it being a great Froſt, and the Ice then very thick; but coming thither about Midnight, their Deſign was by an Accident (which I need not here relate) unluckily defeated: whereupon He together with his Forces turn'd aſide to Chavignie there to reſt themſelves, where the Poictovin Voluntiers (ſince there was no more to be done) deſired leave to go Home, which was granted them; but the Lord Chandois ſtaying behind to take ſome reſt, received Intelligence before Day, that there was a Party of the French Companions led by Sir Lewis of St. Julian, and one Carlonet the Breton, not far off upon the Road: upon which News He would needs go out to look after them, which He did with thoſe few Gentlemen and Voluntiers that were left with Him, not being above Forty in all, when meeting with the French Men unluckily at a Bridge call'd Luſak, the Engliſh, tho much the fewer in number, were reſolved to defend that Paſs, where Sir John Chandois, and moſt of his Men alighting, to reſcue an Eſquire of his who was like to be kill'd, He there unhappily fell down, and before He could riſe again, an ordinary French Gentleman, called Jacques de St. Martin, taking advantage of Sir John's Blind-ſide (for he had loſt his left Eye by an Accident) with a Sword ran him in juſt by it, between the Noſe and the Forehead, that piercing to his very Brain, He fell down for dead; and tho the Engliſh behaved themſelves very Valiantly, yet they were all made Priſoners, and might have been very well carry'd off, had not the French Pages at the beginning of the Fight run away with their Maſters Horſes, for fear of the Lord Chandois, who was then coming upon them.

He is reſcued, and the French defeated.

But whilſt they were contriving how to get Home, there came ſuddenly upon them the Lords Guiſchard D'angle and Lewis de Harcourt, with divers other Engliſh and Gaſcoignes to the number of two hundred Lances, who having parted from the Lord Chandois early that Morning, rode about to ſeek for the French Men, whom they had heard were abroad; and ſo falling into their Track, came accidentally where this Skirmiſh had happen'd; upon the ſight of whom the French beg'd Pardon of the Engliſh Gentlemen their Priſo-

[illegible] insisting upon the Homage which he had before renounced ... during the time of the treaty and whilst the King expected his friendly answer ... that ... however ... under the ... of sovereignty and ... which he supposed ... force of Arms taken the Kings Authority ... and Territories, which were to be delivered to him by the ... killing and making Prisoners of his subjects and thereby ... dissolving that Peace which the King was ready to have maintained [illegible] agreed on had been duely observed. therefore since the had been said Charles so notoriously broke the [illegible] Peace and had not kept that faith which he ought, it was [illegible] the King [illegible] likewise no reason to observe it towards him, since it was [illegible] referred, [illegible] [illegible] the sd. Peace that he would never be obliged by his sd. Oath, if the things [illegible]

Priſoners, and deſir'd they might rather ſurrender themſelves to them, which they readily granted. So when theſe Lords came up, and ſaw in what a ſad condition Sir John Chandois lay, they were highly concern'd; for He was now ſpeechleſs, and indeed never ſpake more: but being carefully convey'd to Poictiers (as were alſo all the French Priſoners) He died of his Wounds within two Days after, to the great Grief of the whole Army, eſpecially of Prince Edward and his Royal Brothers the Earls of Cambridge and Pembroke, who now, by the Death of ſo Great a Commander, began to fear the loſs of all they had on that ſide the Sea; inſomuch that the King of France Himſelf, when He heard of this Miſchance that beſel ſo Noble a Kinght, is reported to have wept, becauſe of his exceeding Valour, Modeſty, Generoſity, and admirable Prudence; Beſides that He was of ſo great Worth and impartial Sincerity, that He knew none living ſo likely as He to have renewed the Peace between the two Crowns.

Soon [1] after the King of France ranſom'd thoſe Commanders of the Companions lately taken priſoners in the ſkirmiſh at the Bridg of Luſak; and about the ſame time divers Barons and Lords of thoſe Parts finding the Engliſh Intereſt began to decline, conſpir'd to quit it, and go over to the King of France; whereupon the Lord Felton caus'd the Lord William de Pamiers with his Secretary, and one more of his Council to be apprehended: and being brought to a Tryal, it was proved upon them, that the ſaid Lord de Pamiers had covenanted to yield himſelf, and all his Caſtles to the French King; whereupon he and his Servants were condemn'd to be beheaded in the City of Bourdeaux. There were alſo divers other Knights and Perſons of Quality apprehended upon the like account: but there were [2] ſeveral great Lords of Aquitain and Poictou who refuſed to break their Oath of Allegiance to King Edward and the Prince his Son, the Chief of whom were the Lord John de Bourbon Earl of Marche, and a great Baron of Limoſin, called Pierre de Buffier, (who notwithſtanding the very next Year proved falſe to the Engliſh Intereſt) yet theſe were but a few in compariſon of that far greater number of the Nobility of thoſe Parts, who out of Levity or Diſcontent quitted the Engliſh, and went over to the French Intereſt. But the Lord de Coucy, tho made Earl of Bedford, having a great Eſtate both in England and France, and finding the Breach between the two Kings impoſſible to be made up, and that if he ſtaid at Home he muſt take up Arms againſt King Edward his Father-in-Law, or his Natural Sovereign of France, to avoid either of theſe Inconveniences, rather choſe a Voluntary Baniſhment; and ſo paſſing into Italy with ſome of his Retinue, ſerved the Viſcounts of Milan in their Wars againſt the Florentines, and afterwards the Pope. Upon which conſideration, he quietly enjoy'd his Eſtate in France during his Abſence; tho I ſuppoſe that which made him take this Reſolution might be, that Solemn * Arreſt or Confiſcation of the Dukedom of Aquitain, now iſſued by King Charles againſt King Edward and his Son the Prince of Wales, dated at Bois de Vincennes the Fourteenth of May 1370. wherein after it is poſitively (tho falſly) affirm'd, That the Superiority and Reſſort of the whole Dukedom of Aquitain, and the other Lands delivered and aſſigned to the Engliſh by the Treaty of Bretigny, were eſpecially and expreſly reſerved to his Father, Himſelf and Succeſſors; and then it farther ſets forth, That K. Edward and the

She is not long after ſet free by Exchange.

But We ſhall now return to the reſt of the Actions of this War in France, ſome of the moſt conſiderable of which happen'd before the Date of this Inſtrument above-mention'd: for in the beginning of this Year, [1] Sir Lewis of St. Julian and Carlonet de Bretagne, with other Captains that had been taken Priſoners and lately ranſom'd, joyning their Forces together, which conſiſted for the moſt part of the Companions, marched to Chaſtelheraut one Morning early, and ſurprized that Place; the Lord Lewis of Harcourt, who was then Governour, hardly eſcaping half naked. In the mean while Lewis Duke of Bourbon, knowing that the Lady his Mother was kept Priſoner in the Caſtle of Belleperche, muſter'd up a ſmall Army, and went and lay'd cloſe Siege to it, and having raiſed a ſtrong Work or Baſtion before it, encompaſſed with a Ditch, from thence ſo batter'd it with great Stones caſt by certain Engines, that the Beſieged finding themſelves in very great hazard of being taken, ſent to Sir John d'Evereux, Seneſchal of Limoſin, to deſire his ſpeedy Aſſiſtance; but not having Forces ſufficient for that purpoſe, He went to Angoleſme, and moved the Prince to ſend his Brothers the Earls of Cambridge and Pembroke, with other old Officers and Soldiers to the number of between four and five thouſand, to relieve the Place; where when they arrived, they found the French Army ſo ſtrongly entrenched, that tho the Engliſh ſat down on the other ſide of the Caſtle, yet could they not raiſe the Siege. The Engliſh Generals indeed challenged the French to come out of their Trenches and fight them; but all the Anſwer they could get from them, was, That they would not fight at their Appointment, and yet would for all that take the Caſtle before their Faces. Upon this the Engliſh finding they could neither oblige the French to fight, nor yet ſecure the Caſtle from being batter'd down by the Enemy, they took the Counteſs of Bourbon (for whoſe ſake the Duke her Son had undertaken this Siege) and ſetting Her on Horſeback with her Waiting-women, convey'd Her to a ſafer Place: and then the Companions having quite ſpoiled the Caſtle, marched out of it, with all their Baggage, and left the Caſtle to the French, which they preſently repair'd, and new fortified ſtronger than it was before. But [2] as for the Lady of Bourbon, She was not long after ſet free by Exchange for Sir Simon Burley, the Prince's Favourite; which was done by means of the Lord d'Ambreticourt, who had not only many Thanks, but was nobly preſented by the Queen of France for his great Kindneſs and Civility to her Mother.

Much about this time, [1] Sir Robert Knolles took Leave of the Prince, and went into Bretagne, from whence he was not long after ſent for into England by King Edward, in order to make him Commander in Chief of thoſe Forces, which He was now about to ſend over to carry on the War in Picardy; and about Eight Days after Midſummer, Sir Robert taking Shipping at Southampton, arrived at Calais with his Army, which being there muſter'd amounted to near Six thouſand Men, whereof there were Fifteen hundred Men of Arms, and Four thouſand Archers on Horſeback; over whom the Chief Commanders were, Sir Thomas Grandiſon, Sir Alan Boxhul, with others of good Note. Then marching from Calais, they reached the firſt day to a Town called Fiennes; but the Conſtable of France (who was then Lord of it) being in the Place with a competent number of Men to defend it, the Engliſh Commanders thought fit to paſs it by, without attempting it; and then marching thro the County of Faukenberg, they deſtroy'd all before them, till they came to Terouenne, which they let alone for the ſame reaſon. Then paſſing the River Lys, they enter'd Artois, and came by eaſy Marches to Mount St. Eloy near Arras, where they refreſhed themſelves for two days; in the mean while ſending out Partys to burn and deſtroy the Country round about. But as for the City of Arras it ſelf, they paſſed it by without doing it any other harm than burning the Suburbs, which they did without any oppoſition, for not one of the Gariſon offered to ſally out to hinder them. The reaſon was, becauſe the King of France having before the Arrival of the Engliſh Army very well mann'd and fortified all his Towns upon the Frontiers, ſtrictly enjoyn'd his Governours and Chief Officers, not to be drawn to any Set-fight, but merely to Act on the Defenſive: which Order being punctually obey'd, proved more prejudicial to the Engliſh than downright Force; for by this means they could be Maſters of no more than what lay abroad in the Country, or in open and indefenſible Towns, moſt of the Inhabitants of any Note being retir'd with their Effects into ſtrong and well fortified Places.

Sir R. Knolles made General of the Army which K. Edward ſent into Picardy.

They march into the French Territories, and deſtroy the Country, but are not ſtrong enough to take any Conſiderable Town.

Then [2] the Engliſh Army leaving Artois paſſed into Vermandois, and went towards the Town of Ham, whither all the People of thoſe Parts had retired with their Goods for Security: But they let this Place alſo alone, as they had done ſeveral others; to which Sir Robert Knolles ſent the Marſhals of his Camp to parly with the reſpective Governors thereof about compounding with them, with Aſſurances that for a good Sum of Mony preſently to be paid down, the Engliſh Army ſhould march off, without doing any Miſchief to thoſe Towns, or the adjacent Country; and ſo by this means Sir Robert Knolles gained in this Expedition for his own ſhare above an Hundred thouſand Franks: but this Bargain had like to have coſt him very dear, for he was afterwards accuſed to the King, as having ſpared his Enemies for Mony, as you will find hereafter. But to proceed: Sir Robert marching from Ham, came to the Town of Roye, which he took, plunder'd and deſtroy'd, as he did alſo the Country round about, without ſparing any thing, except the Lands of the Lord de Coucy, King Edward's Son-in-Law, whoſe Tenants and Dependants came off very well for his Sake. Thus they went on until they came before Noyon in Picardy, which, being very well provided to hold out for a Siege, they likewiſe paſſed by, none of the Gariſon offering to make any

Then the Engliſh Army went thro Laonnois without any Oppoſition; only the Viſcount of Mouſe, and the L. Chauny with ſome other French Noblemen and a Flying Party, coaſted along at a pretty diſtance from the Engliſh Army, watching for ſome Advantage; but they having Intelligence of it, kept ſo good Order that they could not effect their Deſign: Inſomuch that they encamped every night in the open Country, where they found plenty of Victuals and New Wine, the Vintage being but lately over. [2] Thus they marched thro the Archbiſhoprick of Rheims, Champagne and Brie, burning and plundering all before them, till paſſing the Seine, they came near the City of Paris it ſelf, hoping thereby to provoke the French King to come out and give them Battel. But tho He was at that time in the City with a Conſiderable Army, and attended by the Conſtable of France, and the Earls of St. Paul, Tankerville, and divers others of the Principal Nobility, and that He ſaw from his very Palace the ſmoak of his burnt Towns and Villages; yet did it not ſuit with his cautious and timorous Temper to run the riſque of a Battel: wherefore He followed the Advice of his Great Counſellor the Lord Cliſſon, who diſſuaded him from ſending out any Forces to oppoſe thoſe Hot-headed Engliſhmen, whoſe Fury, like a Torrent, if not reſiſted, would ſoon abate of it ſelf; which proved true enough: for when Sir Robert Knolles had lain near two days before Paris, without the leaſt Oppoſition, he thought fit to retire of his own accord, and that Night took up his Quarters between Paris and Montlehery, by a little River named Yvette, and from thence marched back, and retreated into the more Southern Provinces on the Borders of Anjou, where he continued till part of the Army, thro their own Wilfulneſs and ill Conduct, received ſuch an entire Defeat, as broke all his Deſigns for the future, which you'll find by and by.

The King ſends the Duke of Lancaſter into Aquitain to oppoſe the Dukes of Anjou and Berry.

Who being aſſiſted by Sir Bertrand de Gueſclin, &c. take divers ſtrong Places.

But We will now look back into England, and ſee what K. Edward hath been doing in the mean while, to oppoſe thoſe great Preparations that the Dukes of Anjou and Berry had been making, to carry on the War in Aquitain this Campagne. Now in order to this, [3] the King not long after Sir Robert Knolles's going over with his Forces to Calais, thought fit to ſend his Son the Duke of Lancaſter, as his Lieutenant General into Aquitain, together with a ſmall Force of Four hundred Men of Arms, and as many Archers commanded by the Lord Roſs, Lord Abergaveny, and ſome others, who taking Shipping at Southampton, landed at Rochel; but before they could arrive, the Duke of Anjou had marched from Tholouſe with an Army of about Ten thouſand Men, whereof Six thouſand were Foot, being commanded by Sir Bertrand de Gueſclin, who being ſent for by the French King was now return'd out of Spain, from aſſiſting King Henry the Baſtard; the Horſe were commanded by the Earls of Armagnac, Perigort and others. With theſe Forces they marched thro Agenois, and no Body being there to oppoſe them, they took Moyſac, ~~and~~ a ſtrong Town of Quercy, yielded as ſoon as ever they appeared before it. Then they marched towards Monpeſat and Aguillon, the latter of which (tho one of the ſtroneſt Caſtles in France) was ſurrender'd after Four days Siege, thoſe that then defended it, not being like the Lord Manny, who about Twenty years before, had held it out againſt the Duke of Normandy and an Army of near a hundred thouſand Men; but after they had taken theſe Places, the French Army marched forward without any Reſiſtance along the Garonne, until they came to Port St. Mary, which they took, as they did afterwards both the Town and Caſtle of Tonniens, into which they put new Gariſons.

In the mean while [a] the Duke of Berry made an Incurſion into Limoſin with an Army of twelve hundred Lances and three thouſand Foot, commanded by the Duke of Bourbon, the Earl of Alenſon, and divers other Noblemen, with which having done great miſchief to the Country, they laid Siege to Limoges. When the Prince of Wales, who was then in the City of Angoleſme, had the News brought Him of theſe two great Armies invading his Principality on both ſides, and who (as he heard) deſign'd to come and beſiege Him in that City, He thereupon declar'd, that his Enemies ſhould never find Him ſhut up in a Town or Caſtle, but He would forthwith take the Field, and give them Battel; and then immediately ſent out his Summons to all his loyal Subjects in thoſe parts to come in to his aſſiſtance; and tho He was now by reaſon of his Dropſy unable to ride, and therefore was carried in a Litter, yet He went to Cognac on the River of Charente, where He muſter'd up an indifferent Army, conſiſting of his Barons and Subjects of thoſe Parts, with which He reſolved to give his Enemies Battel, if they would tarry for his coming. Whilſt He lay there, the Duke of Lancaſter with his Forces arrived at Bourdeaux, where he ſtaid but one Day and a Night, and then marched towards Cognac; for he heard that the Prince his Brother was there, and reſolved to give his Enemies Battel, or elſe to march to Limoges and relieve it.

The Duke of Berry makes an Incurſion into Limoſin, and lays Siege to Limoges.

Whereupon Pr. Edward muſters up an Army, and is join'd by the Duke of Lancaſter.

In the mean while, [b] the Duke of Anjou having now conquer'd above forty Cities, Caſtles and Strong-holds, was come within five or ſix Leagues of Bourdeaux; and having waſted all the Country about Bergerac, He was then inform'd that the Prince of Wales was come to Cognac, and that beſides a great Army, which He had newly raiſed, the Duke of Lancaſter was alſo come to join Him with a conſiderable Reinforcement; whereupon He called a Council of his great Lords and Barons, in which it was unanimouſly agreed, that conſidering the great Strength of the Prince of Wales's Army, and that even his Preſence, altho now He could do nothing in his own Perſon, would give great Courage to his Men; and that the Duke had met with ſufficient Succeſs this Campagne, in taking ſo many ſtrong Places; as alſo that the Lords of Armagnac and Perigort, with other Barons of Gaſcoigne (who made up the better part of the Army) muſt now return home to defend their own Eſtates; upon all theſe conſiderations, it was thought the beſt and wiſeſt courſe for the Duke to diſmiſs his Army for the preſent, which He did accordingly, and ſo went to the City of Cahors, where He put his Men into the Towns round thereabout. But as for Sir Bertrand de Gueſclin, he went to the City of Limoges, before which the Dukes of Berry and Bourbon lay ſtill with their Army, and ſomewhat ſtraiten'd the Place; ſo that by the Biſhop of that City's Procurement and Mediation, the Citizens were then upon the point of ſurrendering upon good Conditions, and which being agreed on, they ſoon after open'd their Gates to the Duke of Berry, and ſwore Allegiance to the French King; and ſo having put a ſtrong Gariſon into the Place, the Duke broke up his Army, and retired into the Province from whence he took his Title, whilſt the reſt of the Nobility went to other Places; only Sir Bertrand de Gueſclin remain'd ſtill in Limoſin with two hundred Lances, to keep the Caſtles of the Lord Maleval, a Baron of thoſe Parts, who had newly revolted to the French.

When [1] Prince Edward, who was going to its relief, received the News that his City of Limoges was thus betray'd, and given up by the Citizens and their Biſhop, He was very much incens'd, eſpecially againſt the latter, in whom He had put ſuch great Confidence; and therefore vow'd to be reveng'd upon all of them for their Treachery: So marching from Cognac with twelve hundred Lances, one thouſand Archers on Horſeback, and four thouſand Foot, and accompany'd by his Brothers the Duke of Lancaſter and Earl of Cambridge, with divers other Noblemen, beſides the Captains of the Companions; with theſe Forces making up a gallant Army, He marched towards Limoges (tho not being able to ride on Horſeback, He was carry'd in a [2] Chariot:) But before he ſat down to beſiege it, He ſent certain Heralds to the Biſhop and Inhabitants, commanding them to drive out the French Gariſon, and by ſurrendering the Place to return to their former Allegiance; but they truſting in the Strength of it, and their great Stores of Proviſions, and being alſo encourag'd by the French Commanders, wholly ſlighted the Summons. Whereupon [3] the Prince ſitting down before the Town, ſolemnly ſwore by his Father's Soul, (the greateſt Oath He was ever known to make) that He would never ſtir from before the Place, until He had reduced it again to his Obedience, and reveng'd Himſelf upon thoſe Rebels. And ſo laying cloſe Siege to the City, He remembred that He himſelf had formerly fortified it ſo well, that there was no way to take it by Aſſault, but only by Mining; and tho He heard that Sir Bertrand de Gueſclin ravag'd the Country of Limoſin with his Forces, and had daily Complaints made to Him of it, yet would He not leave the Siege. But notwithſtanding all the Counter-Mines the Beſieged could make, his Pioneers carry'd on their Works with ſuch Succeſs, that a great Pane of the Wall was juſt ready to fall, when the Prince having notice of it, gave Orders for a ſtrong Brigade of Foot-men and Archers to be as ready to enter the Breach; which being now made by the Fall of the Wall into the Ditch, and thereby filling it up, the Soldiers immediatly giving a Shout, enter'd the Town, and running directly to the Gates, broke them down with their Axes, as they did alſo the Paliſados; for there was no great Reſiſtance made, the thing happen'd ſo unexpectedly. Then the Prince being carried in his Chariot, enter'd the Gates accompany'd with his Brothers and the other Lords and great Officers of the Army, together with a vaſt number of Foot, who were ready not only to plunder the City, but to kill Man, Woman and Child. This ſevere Commiſſion they executed upon all they met in the Streets without any diſtinction, the Prince himſelf taking no notice of their Cruelty, [4] ſo much was He incens'd againſt the Treachery and Obſtinacy of the Townſmen; ſo that within an hour or two's time, till the Prince Himſelf put a ſtop to the Slaughter, above four thouſand Perſons of all ſorts (moſt of whom were innocent) were miſerably kill'd. This I mention as the laſt and cruelleſt Action of this Prince's Life, and of which during his more youthful and healthy State, He never would have been guilty.

The Prince having now enter'd the City, diſpatch'd [1] a ſtrong Party of Engliſh to the Biſhop's Palace, where they found him, who had been the chief Occaſion of all this Miſchief, and the conſequent Slaughter upon it; who being brought before the Prince, tho he beg'd for Mercy, was notwithſtanding his Character, threaten'd to loſe his Head; and being hurried out of his Preſence, was clap'd up a cloſe Priſoner: but as for Sir John de Villemure, Sir Hugh de la Roche, and Roger de Beaufort, (Son to the Earl of that Name) who were the Captains of the Gariſon, together with the moſt valiant of the Soldiers (being about eighty Men at Arms) having no hopes of Mercy, were reſolved to ſell their Lives as dear as they could; and thereupon ſetting their Backs againſt a Wall, defended themſelves with great Gallantry: Whereupon the Duke of Lancaſter, and the Earls of Cambridge and Pembroke with their Men came upon them, and alighting from their Horſes, the Princes encounter'd theſe reſolute French-men. The Duke of Lancaſter engag'd with Sir John de Villemure, and the Earl of Cambridge undertook de la Roche, whilſt the Earl of Pembroke fell upon Roger de Beaufort, who all fought with that Courage, which their natural Tempers, as well as Deſpair, then excited, until the Prince happen'd to come by that way, and ſeeing the Engagement, not only put a ſtop to them, but gave theſe three valiant Captains their Lives for the ſake of their Valour; but as for the reſt of the Gariſon, they were all put to the Sword, and the City was made a ſevere Example of the Prince's Revenge, being plunder'd, burnt, and almoſt level'd with the Ground. And as for the Biſhop above-mention'd, he eſcap'd better than he deſerv'd; for the Duke of Lancaſter being privately his Friend, yet outwardly expreſſing great Indignation againſt him, obtain'd the Cuſtody of him from the Prince his Brother; and ſoon after he wrote a Letter to the Pope, wherein he repreſented to Him the great danger the Biſhop was in, if He did not ſpeedily interpoſe. Whereupon He wrote preſently to the Duke, deſiring him that he might be pardon'd and ſet free; which Letter being ſhewed to the Prince, He was afraid to diſpleaſe the Pope, and therefore immediately order'd the Biſhop to be ſent to Him to Avignon, to which City his Holineſs was lately return'd upon a Buſineſs of great Importance, as you will find anon.

At which time the Prince gave leave to the greater part of his Forces to repair to their ſeveral Quarters, reſolving to do no more that Campagne: For it was now late in the Year, and his Sickneſs ſtill increas'd upon Him; whereat his Friends and Relations were much diſcourag'd. Indeed this proved the laſt warlike Exploit which that Gallant Prince ever perform'd; for this Winter He went for England together with his Princeſs, as you will hear in a little time. ces that were left him invaded the Viſcounty of Limoſin, a Country which belong'd to John of Montfort Duke of Bretagne, tho the Engliſh had alſo ſeveral Gariſons and Towns in thoſe Parts. There Sir Bertrand began to make War in the name of the Widow of Charles Count of Blois: And his Succeſs was as conſiderable as his Invaſion was ſudden; for the Duke of Bretagne was now at Peace with the King of France, and did not expect any ſuch Treatment: but it ſeems this implacable Commander remember'd that the Duke was not only Son-in-law to K. Edward, but had alſo lately given leave to the Earl of Cambridge and his Forces to paſs thro his Country into Aquitain. Wherefore Sir Bertrand, to begin the War, went before the Town of [1] St. Hyriel, which not being commanded by any one Man of note, was ſoon ſurrender'd to him; but he took it in the name of the Dutcheſs of Bretagne, and put a ſtrong Gariſon into it. Whilſt Sir Bertrand lay in thoſe Parts, and had newly taken a Town called Brandonne, came Meſſengers to him from the King of France in order to his advancement to a much higher Dignity; for the Conſtable de Fiennes being now worn out with Age and the Fatigues of War, reſign'd up his Conſtable's Sword to the King, who thereupon was adviſ'd by his Brother the Duke of Anjou, and others of his Council, that there was none ſo fit for that great and eminent Office, as Sir Bertrand de Gueſclin: Wherefore the King ſent for him (as hath been already ſaid) and when he came told him what He intended to beſtow upon him. At firſt this Great and Valiant Perſon modeſtly refuſ'd it, excuſing himſelf, by reaſon of his mean Quality in reſpect of the King's Brothers, and ſo many Princes of the Blood and other Great Lords, who would expect to be prefer'd before him, and whom he fear'd (ſhould he accept of it) would be very unwilling to obey one every way ſo much inferior to them; but the King would receive none of his Excuſes, and ſo deliver'd him the Sword, being the Badge of that high Office; in which he acquitted himſelf ſo well, that for his many and great Victories againſt the Engliſh, he was at laſt looked upon as the Reſtorer of France.

Great Diviſions in Sir Robert Knolles*'s Army.*

Then, [1] in the beginning of October, ſo ſoon as the Conſtable was ſettl'd in his new Dignity, He ask'd the King's leave to make an Expedition againſt Sir Robert Knolles, who was now retir'd into the Borders of Anjou and Maine; but the [2] cautious King, fearing his bold and enterprizing Temper, gave Him but few Troops, that He might act only on the defenſive, and not be tempted to come to a ſet Battel; but the Conſtable had other Views, and ſold his rich Jewels and Furniture which He had gotten in Spain, that He might thereby encreaſe his Forces: ſo taking the Lord Cliſſon in his Company, he left Paris, and came to the City of Mans, which he made his Head-Quarters, and there muſter'd up above five hundred Lances. Sir [3] Robert Knolles was now in theſe Parts with a good Army, but his Officers were much divided; for the young Lords, Grandiſon, Fitz-Walter, and others of them, would no longer obey their General, nor follow his Directions, becauſe he now adviſed them, ſince Winter was drawing on, to retire with him into Bretagne, where they might quarter more ſafely among their Friends and Allies, ſince ſo many of them could not well ſubſiſt in a Country ſo much haraſs'd by the Enemy, who would ſtill take an occaſion to beat up their Quarters. But the major part of the younger Officers would not hearken to this wiſe Propoſal, ſaying, that they were ſtrong enough to deal with the French, who durſt not look them in the Face, ſince they had try'd their Courage ſufficiently the laſt Campagne; and therefore they were now reſolv'd to quarter in that Country, and not to burden their Friends. Theſe Differences being raiſed in the Engliſh Army, were fomented and encreaſed by one Sir John Menſterworth, * an Engliſh Knight, ſtout enough, but falſe, covetous and diſloyal; for having embezel'd great Sums that were deſign'd to pay the Soldiers, he had no other way to eſcape being call'd to an account by the General, than by raiſing a Mutiny againſt him, by whom he had been advanc'd to that Command he had in the Army: And this [3] ungrateful Man did alſo ſet the young Lords againſt Sir Robert, by ſlyly inſinuating into them, that it was below them to be commanded by one ſo much beneath them in Quality and Extraction; that now the Campagne was at an end, ſo likewiſe was his Authority; that all of them had experience enough to do what belong'd to them without the direction of an old Free-booter.

* Froiſſart by miſtake calls him Maiſtreur-ac.

[3] T. W. Ypod. Neuſt. ad hunc An.

Upon theſe and the like Inſinuations, they divided into different Parties, and into ſeveral Places; Sir Robert Knolles and Sir Alan Boxhul were at this time not far from Mans, tho they deſign'd ſhortly to go into Bretagne, and quarter there; but the Lords Grandiſon, Fitz-walter, and Sir John Menſterworth, with a great part of the Officers, were a day's March farther on the Borders of Anjou and Touraine. When the Engliſh General and the Officers that were with him heard of the Approach of the new Mareſchal of France, with the Lord Cliſſon, into thoſe Parts, they were reſolved not to go into their Winter-Quarters, till they had met with and encounter'd him; and to this end they ſent forthwith to Sir Hugh Calverly, who was then in Gariſon at Saumur, as alſo to Sir Robert Bricquet, with other Captains of the Companions in thoſe Parts, to come and join with them at a Place appointed, that they might give the French-men Battel. They ſent alſo at the ſame time to the Lords Grandiſon, Fitz-walter, and the reſt of that Party, to the ſame purpoſe; which Summons, notwithſtanding their late Diviſion, they obey'd.

Sir R. Knolles reſolves to encounter the new Conſtable, and ſends to the reſt of the Officers to meet him.

But whether Sir John Menſterworth gave the French Conſtable any Intelligence of this Deſign (as it is not unlikely by what after happen'd) or that he knew it ſome other way, is uncertain; but about the time appointed, he marched out with four hundred Lances, beſides many other Light Horſe, and planted Himſelf in the way, where He knew the Engliſh muſt of neceſſity paſs, at le Pont Vallain in the County of Main, that very Night the Lords Grandiſon and Fitz-Walter with about two hundred Lances, and ſix hundred others, left their Quarters, and began to march toward the Place appointed, to join with Sir Robert Knolles. But their Journy was ſhortned by the Conſtable de Gueſclin, who came upon them early in the Morning at the Place above-mention'd, and gave them a brisk and ſudden Charge, by which and the odds in number on the French ſide (being as many again) tho the Engliſh behav'd themſelves very gallantly, yet they were at laſt totally routed, and moſt of them, to the number of one hundred and twenty men, were kill'd, and many taken Priſoners, the chief of whom were the two Lords abovemention'd, with divers other Knights and Officers of note, and were all carried away to the City of Mans. D'Endreghan died of the Wounds he received in the Battel. The News of the Loſs was preſently carried to Sir Hugh Calverly at Saumur, and Sir Robert Bricquet, and their Followers, who thereupon forbore going to Sir Robert Knolles, as they had deſign'd; but the General himſelf, with Sir Alan Boxhul, retir'd with their Forces to their former Quarters, and wholly quitted their Deſign of doing any thing againſt the Conſtable; and not long after Sir Robert retired into Bretagne to his Caſtle of Derval, and then diſmiſs'd his Soldiers to go where they pleas'd. Thus ended Sir Robert Knolles's Expedition this Campagne, which as it began with more Terror than Prejudice to the French, ſo it ended to their Glory and Advantage. And from the manner of this Engliſh Commander's acting in this Expedition, we may draw this Obſervation, that tho the over-running and plundering of a Country by a flying Army, may prove very beneficial to the Officers and common Soldiers, and may ruin the Fortunes of a great many private Perſons that were ſo plunder'd; yet unleſs ſome ſtrong Towns and Caſtles can be taken and maintain'd, it proves no more than a ſlight Incurſion, and the adverſe Prince and Country may ſoon recover thoſe temporary Loſſes. But we ſhall now ſay ſomewhat farther of the French Affairs before we end this Year.

[1] Id. ib. The Conſtable returns to Paris, where he is received with great reſpect.

Then the [1] Conſtable de Gueſclin returned to Paris with moſt of his Engliſh Priſoners, and having gain'd a great Reputation, He was received with much reſpect by the King and the whole Court; after which He admitted his Priſoners to eaſy Ranſoms, taking their Faith for the true Payment of it; ſo courteous were the French and Engliſh Commanders to each other in thoſe times, not acting as the Germans were then wont to do, who kept their Priſoners of War in Irons, to the end they might extort the greater Ranſoms from them.

[2] Mezeray. He procures a Meeting between the Kings of France and Navarre, where the latter is bought off from the Engliſh Intereſt.

But to ſay ſomewhat further of the Conſtable de Gueſclin; this was not the only Service he did the Crown of France this Year: [2] for about this time he alſo procured a Meeting at Eureux, between King Charles and his Brother-in-law of Navarre, who, by means of the Engliſh, with whom he had man'd his Towns and Caſtles in Normandy, was able to find the French ſufficient Employment on that ſide; and therefore He was at this Juncture to be bought off on any Terms: For this Prince, who was as inconſtant as He was malicious, tho He had not long before agreed to a Truce, yet would never make a final Peace with his Brother-in-law of France, till He had it now by the Mediation of the Conſtable, upon condition, that his Places in Normandy ſhould be all left free to Him, and that upon the Surrender of Mante and Melac He ſhould alſo have the County and City of Montpellier in exchange. Then having engaged himſelf by Oath truly to obſerve the Peace, and renounce the Friendſhip and Alliance of King Edward and the Prince his Son; He accompany'd the French King from Rouen to Paris, where leaving his two Sons with their Uncle, as Pledges of his Fidelity, He went from thence to take poſſeſſion of Montpellier, after which He return'd into his Kingdom. But it is now time to ſay ſomewhat of England.

Sir [3] John Menſterworth having made a ſhift to eſcape from the above-mention'd Fight, went immediately over to King Edward, and accuſed Sir Robert Knolles of Treaſon, as being the ſole occaſion of the late Defeat, as alſo that he had taken great Sums of Mony the laſt Campagne of certain French Governors to ſpare their Towns and the adjacent Country. And tho the great worth of this Commander made his Accuſer to be generally look'd upon as a Lyar, yet (it ſeems) he at firſt found ſo much credit with the King and his Council, that He not only withdrew his Favour, but alſo a Penſion which He had before granted him: and it might have gone farther, had not Sir Robert received ſpeedy Intelligence how he had been traduced; [1] whereupon not being able to come himſelf, he ſent over two diſcreet Gentlemen that belong'd to him, to juſtify himſelf, and give the King a true Account of the matter; and theſe by the help of Sir Alan Boxhul, his Brother Commander, as alſo of ſome other Knights of good Reputation, who had ſerved in the late Expedition, ſo well repreſented Matters in his favour, that the King and Council ſeeing they had been miſinform'd, wholly acquitted Sir Robert as an innocent Perſon, and he was then reſtor'd to the King's Favour, and his Son's the Prince. Then to make Sir Robert ſome ſatisfaction, Sir John Menſterworth his Accuſer was ſummon'd before the King and Council by a Day prefixed, there to anſwer what ſhould be objected againſt him; [2] but his evil Conſcience not permitting him to come to a fair Trial, he got over into France, and revolted to the French King, with whom he ingratiated himſelf, by diſcovering whatever he knew might do prejudice to his King and his Native Country; but he received not long after the Reward due to his Treaſon, being afterwards taken Priſoner, and executed as he deſerv'd.

Sir J. Menſterworth not making good his Accuſation, flies into France.

I find nothing elſe to have been tranſacted this Year, only that King Edward, in hopes of reclaiming ſome of his rebellious Subjects in Aquitain, and bringing them back to their former Allegiance, in the beginning of this Winter ſent over his Letters Patents under his great Seal, of free Pardon and Indemnity, with large Promiſes of Reformation of whatever had been done amiſs by the Prince his Son, being to this effect: "That [3] He (the King) being inform'd of certain " Troubles, Grievances, and Moleſtations, done, or ſuppos'd to be " done by his Dear Son the Prince of Wales, in his Seigniory of Aquitain;
" and being obliged and deſirous to remedy all things tending to evil

“ And then declared He was ſworn to maintain and make them good, “ by the Body of Jeſus Chriſt. Given in the Preſence of his dear “ Son, John Duke of Lancaſter, the Earls of Saliſbury, Warwick, “ Hereford, and many others there named, at Weſtminſter the fifth “ day of November, in the forty fourth Year of his Reign, and of “ our Lord 1370. But Matters were now gone too far to be ſo eaſily recal'd, and the Revolt was too far ſpread, and of too long a continuance to be reclaim'd by a piece of Parchment; for I do not find that this Charter of Pardon had any effect, or reduced any of thoſe Lords of Gaſcoigne, or their Subjects, to their Allegiance, that had revolted near two years before. But not long after the King, by the Reſignation of the Prince his Son, reſum'd thoſe Territories into his own hands.

Which yet had no effect on the Lords of Gaſcoigne.

[1] Buchan. l. 9. The Death of David King of Scots, ſucceeded by K. Robert 2*d*.

In the beginning of May this Year happen'd a great Alteration in Scotland, [1] by the Death of David Bruce, the laſt Heir Male of that Family, a Prince of greater Courage and Vertue than good Fortune in his Enterpriſes, tho He paſſed the laſt ſix years of his Life in Peace, after his Impriſonment in England. He left no Iſſue by either of his Wives; and therefore his Nephew the Lord Robert Stewart ſucceeded Him, being the Anceſtor of the Family of the Stewarts that have ſince reign'd in Scotland, and according to the Settlement of the Parliament of Scotland already mention'd. This Prince, as ſoon as He came to the Crown, renewed the Truce which had been formerly made between the two Kingdoms for the ſpace of nine Years; it being left free to the Scots during that time to ſerve either the Kings of England or France, which they ſhould think fit.

[2] Froiſ. c.291. Pope Urban returns to Avignon, and there dies; and is ſucceeded by Gregory XI.

As for Eccleſiaſtical Affairs, whilſt the War was thus hotly carry'd on in France, [2] Pope Urban V. who had been for about two years and a half at Rome, was now return'd to Avignon the laſt Autumn, where He uſed all his endeavours to make a Peace between the two Kings; but they remaining deaf to all his Mediations, He not long after deceaſed on the nineteenth of December, having enjoy'd the Papacy eight Years and almoſt two Months. He was ſucceeded by Peter Rogerii, a Deacon Cardinal of about forty Years of age, who was Son to the Earl of Beaufort, by Joane Siſter to Pope Clement VI. who called himſelf Gregory XI.

This Year begins with the like Continuance of ill Fortune as the former: for that valiant Leader, [3] Sir Euſtace D'Ambreticourt, going to paſs the Chriſtmas Holidays with a Baron of Gaſcoigne, called the Lord Buſſiere, whom he looked upon as his Friend, and intirely in the Engliſh Intereſt, found himſelf much miſtaken; for his treacherous Entertainer admitted Sir Tibauld du Pont, a Knight of Bretagne, and an Enemy to England, into his Caſtle with ſome Soldiers, whom he ſuffer'd to ſeize upon Sir Euſtace, while he ſuſpected no harm, and to carry him away Priſoner; and he was like to have been put to death, as being one of the Captains of the Companions, had it not been for the Interceſſion of the Duke of Bourbon, who for the kindneſs he had formerly done in procuring his Mother to be exchanged, got him ranſom'd for twelve thouſand Franks, whereof Sir Euſtace paid four thouſand down, and left his eldeſt Son as a Hoſtage for the reſt. Sir Euſtace being thus at liberty, went to Charenton in Lower Normandy, where he ſhortly after died, having been in his days a moſt Valiant Knight and Prudent Commander. And this was the Third Man of Note, whom King Edward loſt in leſs than a Year's time.

Anno Dom. MCCCLXXI.

In [1] the beginning of January, Edward Eldeſt Son to the Black Prince deceaſed at Bourdeaux, to the great Affliction of his Father and the Princeſs his Mother, who had no more Children left them, but Richard an Infant, of whom I have already ſpoken. And now Prince Edward, being very much indiſpos'd as well by Sickneſs as diſcontent of Mind, was adviſed by his Phyſicians and Chirurgeons to return into England, to try if his Native Air might reſtore Him to his Health, which was in a very ill State and Condition; which Advice being approved of by the Prince, He appointed the Earls of Cambridge and Pembroke with their Retinues, to be his Convoy: and while the Fleet was rigging out in the Haven of Bourdeaux on the Garonne, He ſent forth his Summons to all the Loyal Knights and Barons of Gaſcoigne and Poictou and other Parts of his Dominions, to come unto Him by ſuch a Day to that City. And being met in his Chamber, He made them a ſhort Speech, wherein He ſet forth "That He "had for the ſpace of almoſt Ten Years govern'd them as a Gracious "Prince, and had done his Endeavours to maintain them in Peace, "Plenty and Proſperity; until the Enemy of Mankind had found "out new occaſions of War and Diſſenſions, tho He had done "what He could to defend them againſt their Neighbouring Enemies. But ſince now for the Recovery of his Health, which He "very much wanted, He had deſign'd to return into England; He "would leave behind Him his Dear Brother the Duke of Lancaſter, "to ſupply his Place, whom He deſired them to Honour and Obey "as they had done Himſelf, and to aſſiſt Him in all his Undertakings. Then the Lords and Barons of Gaſcoigne promiſed to obſerve what the Prince had enjoyn'd them; and thereupon in his Preſence ſwore Fealty to the Duke of Lancaſter, as his Lieutenant. Not long after this, the Prince leaving Bourdeaux, went on Board in the beginning of January, and landed ſafe at Southampton; from whence He with his Princeſs went to Windſor, where He was joyfully received by the King his Father: then after ſome ſtay there, the Prince with his Family retired to the Caſtle of Berkhamſtead, for the goodneſs of the Air, where we ſhall leave Him for a time, and look back into France.

The Pr. lands in England, and goes to Windſor to the King his Father.

Not [2] long after the Prince's Departure, the Lords de Houſſaye and de Mailly, with divers other French Noblemen, marched forth of Perigeux with two hundred Lances, French and Bretons, and rode to a ſtrong Caſtle called Montpaon, belonging to a Knight of that Name, but under the Dominion of the Prince of Wales, which was treacherouſly ſurrender'd to them by the Owner of the ſame Name, who was ſecretly in the French Intereſt. But ſo ſoon as the Duke of Lancaſter had heard that the French had ſeiſed a Place of ſo great Strength and Importance, he was very much incenſed at it, and raiſing a conſiderable Army of Five hundred Lances, and Seven hundred Archers on Horſeback, beſides Foot, [3] he marched to recover the ſaid Place, and having laid cloſe Siege to it for ſome time, he found it ſo well fortified and ſtoutly defended, that it was not eaſy to be taken, unleſs it were by Famine or undermining of the Walls; which laſt proving the readier way, was preſently undertaken, and that with ſo good

But it had far'd much worſe with Sir William Montpaon, who betray'd it, had he not eſcaped out of it before it was taken *. Then the Duke having repair'd and new fortify'd the Caſtle, and ſupplied the Place with Proviſions and a ſtrong Gariſon, diſmiſſed his Forces, and returned back to Bourdeaux.

[1] Id. ib.

But notwithſtanding this Succeſs, [1] the Engliſh Power in Gaſcoigne and Poictou daily declined; for the Barons and Gentlemen of thoſe Parts and their Dependants were ſtill expos'd to the Incurſion and Depredations of the French Gariſons upon the Frontiers, and particularly in Poictou, where the War was carried on more hotly than in any Place elſe; for thoſe from the Fortreſs of Moncontour plundered and ravaged the Country round about, killing and deſtroying thoſe that held out for the Engliſh. The like was done by the Gariſons of La Roche de Pozay and St. Salvin, each of which tyrannized as much as they could about their Precincts; ſo that the Loyal Barons of Poictou who held out ſtill for England durſt hardly ſtir abroad unleſs in conſiderable Bodies, for fear of the French who lay quartered about in the Country; inſomuch that they were forced to keep a Frontier War againſt their Enemies.

King Charles ſends ſome French Gentlemen into thoſe Parts, who buy off many Noblemen from their Allegiance to K. Edward.

About this time King [2] Charles, to do all He could to reduce Poictou to his Obedience, ſent into thoſe Parts the Viſcount of Rochehoart, and divers other French Gentlemen of that Country, who by cunning perſuaſions, as well as by Bribes and Rewards (which the French King had furniſhed them with for that purpoſe) bought off ſeveral Barons and Noblemen of thoſe Parts from the Engliſh Allegiance; ſo that many of the Great Lords, whom either the Reputation, Fortune or Liberality of the Black Prince had made to follow Him, fell now away to the French King after his Departure; and particularly the Lord du Pont of Poictou revolted, whilſt his own Lady with the Townſmen continued firm to King Edward: ſo that by this means the Barons and Gentlemen of Poictou were in a very diſtracted condition, being engaged in a terrible Civil War; and the French and Engliſh Gariſons being ſtrangely intermix'd, the Weaker ſtill became a prey to the Stronger; and [3] there ſcarce paſſed a Day without ſome mutual Loſſes and Repriſals, inſomuch that all things being in a Confuſion, neither Law nor Reaſon, but mere Force and Violence prevail'd in thoſe Parts.

The L. Piercy takes the Caſtle of Moncontour, and puts it into the cuſtody of Sir W. Hewet one of the Capt. of the Companions.

But to remove ſome of theſe Miſchiefs, [4] the Loyal Barons and Gentlemen of Poictou, finding the Caſtle of Moncontour in the Borders of Anjou above-mention'd, to do them more prejudice than any other Gariſon, they deſired leave to beſiege it; whereupon the L. Thomas Piercy Seneſchal of Poictou, being then at Poictiers, muſter'd up a ſmall Army of about Five hundred Lances and two thouſand Foot, beſides Archers, commanded by Himſelf, the Lord de Harcourt and other Noblemen of thoſe Parts, marched from thence, and laid cloſe Siege to the ſaid Caſtle. But tho it was very ſtrong and provided with a good Gariſon, yet the Engliſh ſo batter'd it Night and Day with their Engines, that after ten Days it was taken by Storm, and all the Beſieged put to the Sword, except the Chief Commanders, and five or ſix Men at Arms. Upon which Succeſs the Lord Thomas Piercy committed the Cuſtody of the Caſtle to Sir Walter Hewet, and ſome other Captains

Anno Dom. MCCCLXXI.

Captains of the Companions, amounting to above Five hundred Men, who not only undertook to keep the Place, but to maintain a Defenſive Frontier War againſt the French of Anjou and Tourain. And this they did a good while after, to the no ſmall prejudice of their neighbouring Enemies; but upon this Succeſs the Lord Piercy diſcharged his Troops for the preſent, and ſent them to their ſeveral Quarters.

About the ſame time ' Sir John Devereux was juſt return'd into Limoſin, whereof he was Seneſchal, having lately paſſed in a Hoſtile manner thro Auvergne and Givaudan, till he came into Vivarais, where he took the City and Caſtle of Uzes; ſo that the Engliſh in the beginning of this Year, not only behaved themſelves with much Bravery, but met with conſiderable Succeſs: which News being brought to the Conſtable de Gueſclin, he reſolved to put a ſpeedy ſtop to their Carrier; and to this end leaving Paris about Candlemas, with a conſiderable Army, Commanded by the Dukes of Berry and Bourbon, and ſome other Principal Noblemen of France, they marched into the Province of Vivarais, and beſieged the City of Uzes, which being vigorouſly defended by the Engliſh, the French General thought fit after lying before it Fifteen Days, to raiſe the Siege, and go towards Rovergue, where he found better Suceſs, taking many Places of Importance; and among the reſt lay'd Siege to the ſtrong Town of Millaud, which had been kept by Sir Thomas Wake above a Year and an half; but now upon the Conſtable's ſitting down before it, Sir Thomas, either ſeeing no hopes of Relief, or for ſome other Reaſons, capitulated to deliver up the Town, upon Condition that he might depart with Bag and Baggage, and Colours flyings. And his Example was ſoon after followed by many other Fortreſſes on the Frontiers. Then the Conſtable, after ſome time ſpent to refreſh his Men, return'd back, and again lay'd Siege to Uzes, where the Gariſon being terrified by the Engines of Battery which the Conſtable had order'd to be brought before it, thought fit to capitulate, upon the ſame Terms as Sir Thomas Wake had already done, and ſurrend'ring the Place marched out with their Baggage into the County of Limoſin, where they were not at all blamed for what they had done. The like good Succeſs the Conſtable met with where ever he went during this whole Expedition, in which he gain'd a great many Towns and Caſtles from the Engliſh.

King Edward, being now alarum'd at the great Progreſs the French Army had made in Aquitain, * on the Eighth of January iſſued out Summons for a Parliament to meet on Monday the Firſt Week of Lent, being the Feaſt of Sr. Matthias, or Four and twentieth of February; † on which Day the King, Prelates, Great Men and Commons aſſembled in the Painted Chamber, and William of Wickham Biſhop of Wincheſter, then Chancellor, declared the Cauſe of Summons to be, That ſince by their Aſſent at the laſt Parliament, the King did retake upon Him the Title of King of France, becauſe his Adverſary had broke the Peace, and claimed the ſame Reſſort or Superiority over Aquitain, which had formerly belonged to his Father; for which and ſeveral other Cauſes He had been at great Expences, and ſent ſome Great Men and Others to a mighty Number, to Recover and Conquer his Right; and that the King had received News from his Friends and Allies, that his Adverſary had made Himſelf

And beſides this, the Clergy alſo granted the King a ſeparate Aid of Fifty thouſand pound more towards his War in France for one Year; for the raiſing of which Sum (being very extraordinary) the Chantry Prieſts were taxed according to their Annual Receits, as likewiſe all other ſmall Benefices, which had not been taxed before; and ſo the Parliament broke up.

The [1] Commiſſion of this Grant was read before the King, Great Men and Commons, and the Names of the Collectors given in by the Knights of Shires, and alſo the Names of the Lords and Others that were aſſigned to ſee the Tax duly and reaſonably aſſeſſed and levied; and the Petitions of the Commons, that were not anſwered in the preceeding Parliament, were anſwered in this Council; amongſt which this following is very obſervable.

The Commons petition that only Laymen might be made great Officers of the Kingdom.

> " For that it had been declar'd to the King in the late Parliament

> " vernment of the Kingdom had for a long time been managed by

The King's Anſwer was, He would do in this Point what ſeemed beſt to Him by Advice of his Council.

The * Members of this Great Council were Four Biſhops, Four Abbots, Six Earls, Six Barons, and ſuch and ſo many of the Commons as the King named in his Writs to the Sheriffs, who were of the laſt Parliament: for Kent there were only Thomas Apuldrefeld, one of the Knights of the Shire; Edmund Horner, one of the Citizens of Canterbury, and John Tynchynfeld, one of the Citizens of Rocheſter.

This is a plain Proof of the Difference between a Council and a Parliament; the Former conſiſting of ſuch Biſhops, Peers and Commoners as the King pleas'd to call to it; and the Other of all the Biſhops, Earls, Barons of England, together with the Knights, Citizens, and Burgeſſes elected by their ſeveral Cities, Counties, &c. But how ſuch a Council could take upon 'em to alter or add to a Tax that had been already given by the whole Parliament, I do not well underſtand.

The Pope ſends two Cardinals to mediate a Peace with France, without any Succeſs.

This [2] Summer King Edward ſent Humphry Bohun Earl of Hereford and Eſſex with ſome Knights, his Ambaſſadors, to treat and confer with John Duke of Bretagne his Son-in-Law, about ſome Important Matters; but becauſe it was a time of War, and the Seas infeſted with the Fleets of France and Spain, the King thought it fit to ſet out a ſtrong Fleet under the Command of the Lord Bryan; and there went alſo the Lord Thomas of Woodſtock the King's Youngeſt Son, with a choice number of Archers for their Defence. In their paſſage thither they met the Flemiſh Fleet on the Coaſt of Bretagne, near the Port called La Baye, in their return from Rochel, laden with Wine and Salt; but whether it was that the Flemings would not ſtrike Sail, or that there was ſome former Quarrel, I will not determine; only my Author relates, that the Flemings began the Fight, and tho they were ſuperior in number and very well provided, yet after a brisk Engagement, the Victory fell to the Engliſh; John Peterſon the Flemiſh Admiral being taken Priſoner, together with all that were left alive, the reſt being either either drown'd or ſlain; for the Engliſh were more than uſual by ſevere, when they had the full Maſtery of 'em, becauſe they had been ſo bold as to begin the War. After this the Earl of Hereford landed at La Baye, from whence he went to Breſt, where he found the Duke of Bretagne; but the Engliſh Admiral return'd with the Fleet into England, where he was well received by King Edward, who being now reſolved to be farther revenged on the Flemings, again ſent forth his Fleet with Orders to block up the Forts of Flanders, and to make a brisk War upon their Merchants; which the Citizens of Gaunt, Bruges and Ipres, finding the great prejudice they were like to receive by making War with England, they immediatly apply'd themſelves to their Earl, and procured Him to ſend Envoys to King Edward to renew the Peace between the two Nations; in which they met with ſo good Succeſs, that within a ſhort time they return'd with a Confirmation thereof, it not being found convenient for either of them to continue it any longer.

The Earl of Heicford lands in Bretagne.

The Merchants of Flanders being prejudiced by a War with England, procur'd their Earl to make a Peace.

In the mean time the [1] Duke of Lancaſter remain'd in the City of Bourdeaux, where He kept a Court little inferior to that of the Prince his Brother, being attended with a great Retinue of Knights both of England and Aquitain: but whilſt He lay here this Winter without Employment, being now a Widower, He made a new Match, which tho it gave Him a higher Title, and proved of ſome Advantage to Himſelf and Family, yet produced a long War between the Kings of England and Caſtile, to the great prejudice of both Nations; the ground of it was thus: You may remember that Pedro King of Caſtile, when He came to implore the Aſſiſtance of Prince Edward, brought two ~~Young~~ Daughters along with Him, who were left there as Pledges for their Father's Performance of the Conditions, that had been agreed on betwixt Him and the Prince; which their Father taking no care to perform, and being kill'd not long after, the young Ladys were left upon Prince Edwara's hands.

The D. of Lancaſter makes a new Match for Himſelf, and on what Conſiderations.

Theſe being now grown up to Women's Eſtate, the Elder of them call'd Conſtantia, who was looked upon as the true Heireſs to the Crown of Caſtile, being propoſed to the Duke, he was adviſed by Sir Guiſcard D'angle to marry her, thereby to obtain a Right to that Kiugdom for himſelf and the Children eh ſhould have by her; beſides the Honour he ſhould obtain, in thus aſſerting the Right of an Orphan and diſtreſſed Princeſs. This was very well received by the Duke, who was Young and Ambitious; and forthwith ſent for both the Ladies to his Court; but Himſelf and the Earl his Brother going out to meet them as far as a Town called Rochefort, they liked them ſo well, and made ſuch cloſe Love to them, that their Suits were eaſily granted by them both, tho they did not expect ſo good Fortune; and there the Duke of Lancaſter privatly married the Lady Conſtantia, as the Earl of Cambridge did Iſabella her younger Siſter; who tho they had nothing at all, but bare Hopes for their Portions, yet had their Weddings kept with great Magnificence. x no good

But before his departure, the Duke ſummon'd the Barons of Guienne to meet him at Bourdeaux, where he declar'd to them the reaſons of his intended Voyage to England, and that he hop'd by his Father's leave to come back to them again the next Spring, time enough to take the Field; which Speech was very well received by all there preſent. Then he appointed the Lord John de Greille, Captal of Buche, (a powerful Lord of that Country) his Deputy in Guienne, who was to be aſſiſted by the Lords of Mucidan and L'eſparre; and having alſo made other Noblemen Governors of the reſt of the Provinces that were left to the Engliſh, he went on Shipboard with his new Dutcheſs and her Siſter the Counteſs of Cambridge, who was pleas'd to go along with them: They had a ſafe and pleaſant Voyage, and arrived at Southampton, from whence they went to Windſor, where they met with a kind Welcome from the King, who ſeem'd mightily pleas'd at his marrying ~~of~~ the Spaniſh Princeſs.

K. Edward makes great Preparations againſt France, which prove unfortunate.

This † Winter there were held in England many great Conſultations by the King and his Council, how to carry on the War the Summer following; for He deſign'd to ſend over two powerful Armies, the one to act about the Parts of Aquitain, and the other from Calais to march thro Picardy into France: and all the while He neglected not to ſtrengthen Himſelf with Friends on every ſide, eſpecially in Germany and the Countrys adjacent, where He gain'd over by his great Preſents, as well as large Promiſes, divers Knights and Gentlemen of note to his Service. Beſides all this, He made ſuch mighty Preparations in England, as the like had ſcarce been ſeen before; but God thought it fit to render all theſe his Deſigns abortive, and from henceforth to order the Courſe of Victory and Succeſs to run as much on the French ſide, as it had done on the Engliſh before: and it is from this Year we may date thoſe great Misfortunes in all his Military Affairs, tho He was ſerv'd by two gallant Princes his Sons, beſides many other able and experienc'd Commanders. But to return to the Hiſtory.

K. Charles uſes his utmoſt Endeavours to prevent K. Edward's Deſigns.

[1] King Charles of France being well inform'd of all King Edward's Deſigns, thereupon provided in all Places accordingly; and firſt He ſtrongly fortified all his Towns and Caſtles in Picardy, and the Marches towards Flanders, ſupplying all his Gariſons with good Captains and Soldiers, as well as other Neceſſaries: Nor did He forget his Concerns in Guienne; for beſides the Armies on that ſide in Gariſon, which were well enough able to reſiſt the Engliſh, He ſent alſo to his Confederate the King of Spain, deſiring Him effectually to aſſiſt him with a ſtrong Fleet the next Summer on thoſe Coaſts.

[2] Id. ib.

In the mean while [2] King Edward this Spring, as ſoon as He had ſolemniz'd the Feaſt of St. George at Windſor (as it was his conſtant Cuſtom) and had created Sir Guiſcard D'Angle Knight of the Garter, in the room of Sir Walter Manny deceas'd, return'd to London, and held a great Council of his Nobility about the foreign Affairs, wherein He ordain'd the Duke of Lancaſter his General to invade France with a great Army by the ſide of Picardy, the Earl of Cambridge being to accompany him. Then at the inſtant Requeſt of the Lord D'Angle, and all the Poictovin Lords, whom he and his Fellows repreſented, He order'd the Earl of Pembroke to go as his Lieutenant into Aquitain, and preſerve Poictou and to make a brisk and vigorous War againſt the Fr. on that ſide: For the Gaſcoigners and Poictovins, had earneſtly deſired of the King, both by their Letters and by the Ld D'Angle, that if He could not ſpare ſome one of the Princes his Sons, yet at leaſt He would pleaſe to ſend the Earl of Pembroke his Son-in-law, unto them, whom next to thoſe, they lov'd and honour'd moſt, as having had good Experience of his extraordinary Courage and Conduct. Whereupon King Edward, in the preſence of all his Earls and Barons that were aſſiſting at that Council, appointed the ſaid Earl his Lieutenant and chief Commander over all his Forces in Aquitain, which was cheerfully accepted of by that young Nobleman; and indeed he was a Perſon endu'd with a great many brave and ſhining Qualities.

All [1] things being thus ſettl'd, and a ſufficient Fleet provided (as was then ſuppos'd) to tranſport thoſe few Forces the Earl took along with him into France (for he was to raiſe more men there) he went on board, attended by the Lords Grandiſon and D' Angle, beſides ſeveral other Knights both of England and Poictou, and ſet ſail for Rochel; but when they came before the Iſle of Rhee, and thought to have landed there, he found a ſtrong Fleet conſiſting of forty Men of War, and thirteen ſmaller Barks, under four experienc'd Admirals, ready to fall upon him: for the French King having Intelligence of the great Preparations that were making in England, had been as diligent to prevent them, and uſed all his Intereſt with the King of Caſtile to ſend this Fleet to ſurprize the Engliſh, and hinder their Landing. Nor had theſe latter any notice of it, tho the Spaniards had lain there a good while waiting for their coming. But whether it happen'd thro Careleſneſs here in not having Cruiſers abroad, or that the Rochellers being falſe to the Engliſh Intereſt, fail'd to give King Edward any Intelligence of it, I will not determine.

But to come to the matter, the Spaniſh Fleet, upon the approach of the Engliſh, preſently ſail'd out to meet them; for beſides the Enemies being much ſuperior in the Number of their Ships, they were alſo better provided with Ammunition, their Veſſels being furniſhed with great Cannon (which now became of more uſe than ever before) moreover, their Ships were much ſtronger and higher built than thoſe of the Engliſh; but for all theſe diſadvantages, the Earl of Pembroke, and the Noblemen, Knights and Officers under his Command behav'd themſelves with ſo noble a Courage, that they maintain'd the Fight for almoſt a whole Day, without any conſiderable Loſs more than of two Barks laden with Proviſions; [2] and the Night coming on, both Fleets caſt Anchor until the Morning, and then the Fight was again renewed with keener fury than before, in which tho the Engliſh ſhewed the ſame Bravery and Courage as they had done the Day preceding, yet they were at laſt overcome by the greater number of the Enemy (for the Townſmen of Rochel could not be prevail'd upon by all the means Sir John Harpedon their Governor could uſe to go on board and aſſiſt the Engliſh Fleet) and beſides this, the Spaniſh Ships (as I ſaid juſt above) being higher built, and having got the windward of the Engliſh, ſo plaid upon them with their Cannon, and ſo attacked them, by caſting down Iron-Bars, Lead, Stones, and other things on their Heads, that about three of the Clock in the Afternoom they were all either ſunk, or elſe boarded and taken by the Spaniards; and in particular the Earl of Pembroke's Ship, being grappl'd with no leſs than four Spaniſh Veſſels at once, was by them at laſt boarded, ed, notwithſtanding all the Defence he could make, and himſelf made a Priſoner, with the Lord D' Angle; not to mention ſeveral other Knights and Perſons of Quality, who were all either taken or kill'd: and among the Engliſh Ships that now fell into the hands of the Enemy, there was one laden with twenty thouſand Pounds in ready Mony to pay the Army; but this was nothing comparable to the Loſs which England received by the Death and taking of ſo many valiant Gentlemen. And yet the ill Conſequences of this Day were far greater than the Loſs it ſelf; for it was evident that King Edward now received the greateſt Blow that ever He had felt before, becauſe by this Defeat He loſt in a manner all that ever He had won in France, except Bayonne, Bourdeaux and Calais, as will appear in the ſequel of this Hiſtory; ſo fatal has it proved to England, whenever it has been overpower'd at Sea.

The Earl is carry'd into Spain.

After [1] this Victory, the Spaniards left the Haven of Rochel, and ſailed away with the Earl of Pembroke, and the reſt of the Priſoners for the Coaſts of Galicia; a little after whoſe Departure, on Midſummer-day, there came to Rochel a great number of Men at Arms both Engliſh and Gaſcoigners, who had as yet heard nothing of this Miſchance of their Friends, for they had been only inform'd that the Spaniards lay before Rochel, with deſign (as it ſhould ſeem) to block it up; and therefore they came thither now to preſerve the Place. The chief Commanders of theſe men were the Lord John de Greilly, Captal de Buche, who, upon Sir John Harpedon's being taken Priſoner on board the Fleet (whither he had gone to aſſiſt the Engliſh in the late Engagement) the Captal being one of the Duke of Lancaſter's chief Deputies in thoſe Parts, conſtituted Sir John Devereux Seneſchal of Rochellois, with whom he left two hundred Men at Arms to ſecure the Caſtle of that Town. Having thus ſettl'd his Affairs there, he left Rochel, and marched away with four hundred Lances toward Soubize; for he heard that certain Troops of Bretons held ſeveral ſmall Fortreſſes thereabouts, which they had made defenſible; but as ſoon as the Captal and the Engliſh came thither, they eaſily won thoſe Holds, and ſo rid the Frontiers of their Company.

In the mean while one [2] Owen (whom Froiſart and the French Hiſtorians corruptly call Jvan) a Welſh Nobleman, is by our Author (tho falſly) reported to have been outed of his Principality of Wales by King Edward, which He had then given to the Black Prince his Son; and that thereupon this Owen flying into France, and taking upon him the Title of Prince of Wales, was well received by King Charles; and being a Man of Courage and Conduct, had been by Him imploy'd in divers Enterprizes againſt the Engliſh, and was now ſent on board a Fleet with four thouſand men that landed in the Iſle of Guernſey. Edmund Roſs a valiant Gentleman, who was then Governor of it, gave Battel to this pretended Prince Owen; but the Engliſh Forces not amounting to above eight hundred men, were over-power'd by the French, and put to flight, four hundred of them being kill'd upon the Spot; yet he himſelf retreated to Cornet-Caſtle, which being very well fortified and victual'd, was immediatly beſieged by the Welſh Prince; but the Place was ſo ſtrong and well provided, that it was not ſo eaſy to be taken as he thought it.

[2] Id. c. 305.

About the ſame time, King Charles [1] received the joyful News of the late Victory of the Spaniards over the Engliſh Fleet, and was reſolved to puſh on the Succeſs with greater vigour than ever: For He concluded, that when once the good Towns and Cities of thoſe Parts ſhould ſee the Engliſh begin to decline, they would preſently put themſelves into his hands; wherefore He forthwith determin'd to ſend his Conſtable de Gueſclin into Poictou, to the Counties of Saintogne and Rochellois, there to make War both by Land and Sea; for the Engliſh had now never a conſiderable Captain left in thoſe Countries: And the better to furniſh himſelf with a Navy, He ſent a Letter to this counterfeit Prince Owen, lying then before Cornet-Caſtle, thereby commanding him upon ſight thereof to raiſe the Siege from before that Place, and to go on board a ſwift Sailor preſently for Spain, there to ſollicit King Henry to ſend his Fleet to join with that of France, and thereby to maintain the Command of the French Seas. Theſe Orders Owen immediately obeying, ſent away his Forces for Harfleur, whilſt he himſelf ſet ſail for Spain, where he arrived preſently after the Spaniſh Fleet was come home from their late Expedition and Victory. The Welſh Prince was no ſooner landed there, but he immediatly addreſs'd himſelf to the Spaniſh Admirals, and deliver'd them the Meſſage which had been ſent him from the French King. And here I cannot forbear telling you, that [2] Froiſart (to whom we are beholden for this Relation) makes this Owen to have an Interview with the Earl of Pembroke, and the other Engliſh Gentlemen then brought in Priſoners, and he alſo gives us a Dialogue between the Earl and him, over whom he makes him inſult, but in ſuch a manner as declares the Diſcourſe to be a plain Forgery or Miſrepreſentation at leaſt by this Author, ſince he brings in this Counterfeit Prince calling himſelf Owen, Son to Edmund late Prince of Wales, and on that account challenging him to a ſingle Combat, which was prevented by the interpoſing of the Spaniſh Admirals. But this ſeems all a mere Romance, ſince it is certain there never was any ſuch Prince of that Country call'd Edmund; tho I will not deny but that there might be ſuch a Meeting between him and that Earl, and ſome part of the Converſation may be true enough. What was the Iſſue of this Prince's Ambaſſy into Spain, you will hear anon; but we ſhall at preſent return to the Affairs of Poictou.

When [3] King Edward had heard of the great Defeat his Navy had received before Rochel, He was mightily concern'd at the loſs of his Mony, but more at that of the Lives of ſo many brave men killed and taken, whereby thoſe Parts were left in a manner naked. Wherefore after a cloſe Conſultation about this important Affair, the King order'd the Earl of Saliſbury immediatly to go thither with five hundred Men at Arms beſides Archers. But whatever was now determin'd, there was no ſuch matter done; for the troubleſom Affair of Bretagne coming on preſently after, this Buſineſs was put off, which King Edward repented when it was too late.

In the mean while Matters went very ill with the Engliſh in Poictou, for [4] Sir Bertrand de Gueſclin Conſtable of France, the Dukes of Berry and Bourbon, the Earl of Alenſon, and many other Lords of France with their Forces, in all to the number of above three thouſand Men at Arms, which being join'd to the Conſtable's, made a conſiderable Army; theſe went and laid Siege to Montmorillon ſtanding on the River Gartempe, which they took by Aſſault, and put all within to the Sword, and new gariſon'd the Place with French-men. From thence they proceeded to Chauvigny on the River Creuſe, where they lay two days, and on the third that Place was yielded up, and the Engliſh within taken to mercy. From thence they went to the Town and Caſtle of Luſats, both which ſurrender'd without ſuffering one Aſſault: After that they came before Poictiers, where finding too ſtrong a Gariſon to be eaſily taken, they parted Forces, and the Duke of Berry went one way with a conſiderable Body, whilſt the [1] Conſtable led the reſidue of the Army toward Moncontour, and ſat down before it, the Captains whereof were John Creſwel and David Holcroft, and with them were ſixty Men at Arms of approv'd Valour; and beſides this, the Place was very ſtrongly fortified: but the French Army being ſuperior to them, and making many vigorous Aſſaults on the Place, they at laſt fill'd up the Ditches, and having approached the Walls under the Cover of a Teſtudo, they began to make ſuch great Breaches in them, that the Commanders of the Gariſon being afraid the Place would be taken by Storm, and that they ſhould be all put to the Sword, treated with the Enemy, and ſurrender'd upon condition, that they ſhould march out with their Arms and Baggage (except only Gold and Silver) and ſo they left the Place, and were convey'd to Poictiers.

Then [2] the Conſtable joining his Forces again with thoſe of the Duke of Berry, and thereby making a great Army, marched into Limoſin, and beſieged the ſtrong Caſtle of St. Severe, which was under the Command of Sir John Devereux; but he being then at Rochel, had committed the Place to the Cuſtody of Sir William Piercie and other Gentlemen, who upon the approach of the French immediatly ſent away to Sir John the Governor, deſiring his ſpeedy aſſiſtance; who thereupon conſulting with Sir Thomas Piercie, agreed to go to the Captal de Buche, and deſire him to join his Forces with theirs, in order to relieve the Place. So leaving Sir John Reynolds Governor of Rochel in his room with a ſufficient Gariſon, they went with what men they could ſpare to meet the Captal, who joining with divers Barons of Poictou that came in upon Summons, made up a ſufficient Army to cope with the Enemy: But [3] the Duke of Berry and the Conſtable having received Intelligence what the Engliſh Commanders then intended, they ſo vigorouſly ply'd the Siege, that tho Sir William Piercie and his Men made a ſtout Defence, yet finding they were not able to hold out long, and not knowing when they ſhould be relieved, they capitulated and deliver'd up the Caſtle, upon condition only to march out with their Arms. But the ſame day before night, the Engliſh Army coming up to its relief, the Conſtable drew up his Forces in order of Battel; but the Engliſh ſeeing the Place loſt, had no mind to engage, and ſo left the Field without fighting, and thereby gave the French an opportunity of taking the City of Poictiers. great Diviſion in the City, for the major part of the Townſmen were for letting in the French; but Sir John Reynolds the Mayor and moſt of the Commonalty reſolved to remain true to the Engliſh, yet the Chief and Richeſt Burgeſſes, of whom there were a great number, would have the Conſtable ſent for preſently,to come and take poſſeſſion of the City, for they promiſed to open the Gates to him; at which News Gueſclin was glad, and having communicated the Matter to the Dukes of Berry and Bourbon, it was then agreed, That he ſhould go immediatly from the Army with Three hundred Lances; and ſo he marched the remainder of that Day and the Night following (taking little Reſt) above thirty Leagues another way,than that which he knew the Engliſh had taken. The next Morning he came to Poictiers, where he found the Gates open, and his Friends ready to receive him; yet if he had tarried but an hour longer, he had come too late, for Sir John Reynolds and thoſe of his Party had ſent in all haſt to the Captal and Sir Thomas Piercy, to give them notice of it, who immediatly diſpatch'd away one hundred Spears, and as many Archers on Horſeback; and theſe were then come within a League of the City, when the Conſtable enter'd it.

[1] Upon the News of the Loſs of this Conſiderable Gariſon and City, all the Lords and Men of Quality of England and Gaſcoigne that were left behind (tho they then made the number of above Twelve hundred Men of Arms beſides Archers) were ſo dejected, that they began to diſtruſt the Fidelity of the Poictovin Nobility, who ſeem'd yet to continue in the Engliſh Intereſt, until they were by them well aſſured that they would ſtill remain faithful to the King of England, ſo long as they had any Place to retire to; but however they reſolved to part their Forces for the preſent, and the Poictovin and Gaſcoigne Lords went to the City of Thouars, whilſt the Engliſh Commanders with their Forces marched to the Town of Niort, where they thought to have had ready entrance, but upon their coming thither, they found the Gates ſhut againſt them, being told by the Townſmen that they ſhould have no admittance there; but they did not well conſider the Conſequence of this Action, for the Engliſh Commanders being highly incenſed at this Affront, order'd their Men to make a vigorous Aſſault upon the Place, which was executed accordingly, inſomuch that they took it by Storm, the Town was plundered, and moſt of the Inhabitants put to the Sword; but this was but a ſmall amends for the ill Succeſſes that both preceded and follow'd this Action.

Upon which the Engliſh diſtruſt the Fidelity of the Poictovin Nobility, who go to the City of Thouars.

[2] For whilſt the Engliſh Forces thus lay at Niort, and durſt not divide themſelves for doubt of their ſeeming Friends, and fear of their prevailing Enemies, Owen the pretended Welſh Prince had ſucceeded ſo well with Henry King of Caſtile, that He ſent him before Rochel with a ſtrong Fleet of Forty Capital Ships, Thirteen Barks and Eight Galeons full of good Soldiers, under the Command of Don Rodrigo de Roſes Admiral of Spain; and therewith ſo blocked up the Haven, that none could paſs in or out, without a great deal of Danger. The Rochellers ſeeing themſelves in ſo ill a Condition, and being more inclinable to the Spaniards that were now engaged to the French Intereſt than to the Engliſh,fell into a ſecret Treaty with Prince Owen and the Admiral of Spain,with whom they agreed for a mutual Truce to be kept kept between them, promiſing, that whenever they could, they would make themſelves Maſters of the Caſtle, and declare themſelves True Frenchmen. In the mean while the Spaniſh Fleet lay hovering thereabouts, having their Spies on Shore, who gave them an Account of whatever was done.

But are reſcued by Prince Owen, whereby the Engliſh are routed, and the Caſtle forced to ſurrender.

During this Tranſaction, [3] the Conſtable of France being then at Poictiers, which he had newly taken, ſent forth the Sieur du Pons and Sir Thibald du Pont, with Three hundred Lances to the Caſtle of Soubize, a ſtrong Fortreſs in Saintonge, ſtanding on the Sea-ſide near the Mouth of the Charente; within the Caſtle was the Lady thereof with a ſmall Gariſon: wherefore upon the firſt apprehenſions of Danger, She ſent immediatly to the Captal de Buche, requeſting his ſpeedy Aſſiſtance, who in compliance with her Deſire muſter'd up about Two hundred Lances, which he reckoned ſufficient for the Relief of that Place,and for ſurprizing the French in the Night. And they fell upon them with ſuch terrible Outcries,that he put them that lay before the Place into the greateſt Confuſion,ſo that he took their Commanders Priſoners, whilſt the Men were either kill'd or ran away. But whilſt the Engliſh were thus imploy'd in taking and perſuing their Enemies, they themſelves fell into as great a Misfortune; for Prince Owen, who then lay with the Spaniſh Fleet before Rochel, having Intelligence of the Engliſh Deſigns, reſolved to ſail immediatly to the aſſiſtance of the French before Soubize; ſo having took about Four hundred Men at Arms, and put them on Board thirteen Barks, he ſail'd away privatly up the River Charente towards that Place, and landing in the Night (with many Torches and other Lights) he came very opportunely for the Relief of the French that had been lately routed, and fell upon the Rear of the Engliſh, who thought themſelves then ſecure, being diſpers'd either in the Chace, or looking to their Priſoners and Plunder; but being thus aſſaulted on the ſudden by ſo many freſh Men, they were quickly routed, kill'd or taken, and the Captal himſelf with Sir Thomas Piercy made Priſoners; which was a great Loſs to the Engliſh Intereſt, he being one of the moſt Conſiderable Warriors in that Age: but ſome of the Knights and Men of Quality made a ſhift to get into the Caſtle of Soubize, tho it did not prove any long Refuge or Shelter to them; for Prince Owen having ſet free the French Commanders, and rallied together the remainder of their Forces, laid freſh Siege to the Caſtle both by Sea and Land; whereupon the Lady thereof and the Gariſon, ſeeing no further hopes of Relief, ſurrender'd the Place upon Condition, that She might ſwear Fealty to the King of France, and the Officers and Soldiers be convey'd with their Arms as far as Niort.

St. John d'Angely is ſurrender'd to certain French Noblemen.

After [4] this Succeſs, Prince Owen with the French Commanders went on Board their Veſſels, and return'd to the Spaniſh Fleet that lay ſtill before Rochel: but the Sieur du Pons, and the Bretons and French being aſſiſted by freſh Recruits under the Conduct of certain Noblemen,immediatly undertook another Expedition; and marching before St. John d'Angely,they preſently aſſaulted it,whereupon the Inhabitants ſeeing how faſt the whole Country fell off, and deſpairing of any timely Succour, now their Chief Governour the Captal was taken Priſoner, yielded themſelves, and voluntarily engag'd for the French Intereſt.

Angouleſme alſo ſubmits to them.

After [1] this they marched on, and came before Angouleſme, which ſubmitted in the ſame manner: and this Example was followed by Taillebourg, a Town of Saintonge; from whence they went and lay before Saintes, the Chief City of that Province, where they were two days without any Succeſs, becauſe the Governour Sir William Ferenton, reſolved not eaſily to yield up ſo Conſiderable a Place, but rather to ſtand manfully upon his Defence. But whilſt he was about to do this, the Biſhop of the Place being a true Frenchman, made ſuch Harangues to the Citizens, that they ſeiz'd the Governour and threatned to kill him, unleſs he would agree to deliver up the Town; ſo thro fear he was obliged to conſent, but on this Condition, that he and his Men might go away freely without any Harm or Impeachment: and thus was Saintes alſo deliver'd to the French, but Sir William Ferenton with his Men had Safe-Conduct to go to Bourdeaux.

Whilſt [2] the Spaniſh Fleet lay at Anchor before the City of Rochel, the Townſmen held underhand a Treaty with them, for they durſt not openly declare themſelves ſo long as the Caſtle continued in the hands of the Engliſh; but they now found a fit Opportunity to expreſs their Malice to them, by reaſon that Sir John Devereux had lately gone from thence to the Relief of Poictiers with a great part of the Gariſon, and had left the Caſtle in the Cuſtody of Philip Manſel, a Gentleman of ſufficient Courage, but of no great reach, as you will ſee by the Event; for John Caudorier then Mayor of the Town, being a ſecret Enemy to the Engliſh, held a Conference with ſeveral other Burgeſſes of his Faction, wherein they reſolv'd to ſeize upon the Governour and Gariſon that was in the Caſtle, and then they knew that and the Town would be in their own power, which was brought about by this means. The Mayor pretending he had newly received freſh Orders from King Edward, invited Manſel the Deputy-Governour to Dinner, in order to communicate them to him: and after the Entertainment was over, the Mayor knowing that the Governour could not ſo much as read, had the Confidence to produce a Letter with the King's Seal to it, which the Deputy pretended to read tho he could not; and thereupon the Mayor took the Letter, and read it to him as he pleas'd, the Tenour of which he pretended was, that the King had commanded the Governour and the Mayor to make joint Muſters of the Forces in the Town, and therefore required him to draw out his Men the next Morning, and take a View of them, as he (the Mayor) would do at the ſame time of thoſe belonging to the Town. Upon reading which counterfeit Letter, the Captain, who ſuſpected nothing, promiſed to do his Duty the next Day.

Then the Mayor muſter'd up Two hundred Men at Arms of his Party, and a little before day placed them behind the ruins of certain old Walls, by which he knew the Governour was to paſs with his Men; and at ſuch an hour he cauſed the Watch-Bell to be rung out, and all the Inhabitants to appear in Arms. Then Manſel having armed Fourſcore of his beſt Men, marched forth of the Caſtle in good Order at the head of them toward the Field where the Rendezvous was to be: but when he was once paſſed the old Walls, the Ambuſh ruſhed forth, and placed themſelves between him and the Bridge, and then he ſaw he was betray'd; however he faced about courageouſly upon them, hoping by Force to recover an Entrance into the Caſtle again; but the Mayor came upon his Rear with the Commons of the City, to the number of Two thouſand fighting Men: ſo that the Engliſh being thus unequally matched, and aſſailed from before and behind, were compelled to yield for ſafety of their Lives, tho they could obtain nothing further. But for all that the Caſtle was not yet taken; for there were about twenty Valiant Men left in it, beſides Servants, who hearing what had happened to their Governour, drew up the Bridge and ſhut the Gates, and ſeemed reſolved to ſtand upon their Defence to the laſt; but the Mayor being vexed at this Diſappointment, threatned the Governour and the reſt of thoſe he had taken Priſoners, that unleſs he would command thoſe in the Caſtle to ſurrender it, he would immediatly cut off their Heads; whereupon the Engliſh ſeeing themſelves in this Condition, prevailed with thoſe in the Caſtle to ſurrender the Place accordingly: but however thoſe within by this means obtain'd not only pretty good Conditions for themſelves, but for thoſe that were taken Priſoners, that they ſhould all be put into a good Ship, with all their Goods and Monies, and ſafely convey'd by the Mayor and Burgeſſes of Rochel to the Port of Bourdeaux. Thus the Impregnable Caſtle and Town of Rochel fell into the hands of the Citizens, and the Engliſh were ſent away as they deſired.

The Rochellers deny admittance to thoſe French Lords, or to the King Himſelf, unleſs on Conditions, which the Conſtable dares not conſent to without the King's Leave.

The K. grants all their Demands by his Charter.

When [1] the Dukes of Berry, Bourbon and Burgundy, with other Lords of France, had received this agreeable news, they reſolved to puſh on their Succeſs; and therefore marching out of Berry and the Country of Limoſin, they deſigned for Poictiers to joyn the Conſtable of France: but in their way thither they took in ſeveral Caſtles and Places of Srength, as Brion and Meſle, and divers other Fortreſſes, particularly St. Maixent, a Town in Poictou, which yielded upon their firſt Approach; but the Caſtle that ſcorn'd to follow ſo mean an Example, was not taken without Aſſault. After which Succeſſes, they coming to Poictiers, ſent Meſſengers to treat with the Burgeſſes of Rochel; but they being now at their own Diſpoſal, poſitively refus'd to admit any of the French Lords into the Town, or ſurrender the Place into the hands of their King Himſelf, but upon certain Conditions; in order to which, they demanded a Safe-Conduct for ſuch of the Chief Burgeſſes of the Town, as they ſhould name, to go to Poictiers, and there make their Propoſal to the Conſtable and the reſt of the French Lords: this being granted them, the Conditions they demanded were, That they would become ſubject to K. Charles, provided the Caſtle that commanded their Town ſhould be raſed to the Ground; they likewiſe required to have a Mint allowed them to coyn Florins and other Mony, both * Black and White, of the ſame Form and Alloy with that of Paris. To theſe ſtrange Conditions, thus unuſually propoſed by Subjects, the Lords of France durſt not agree, but refer'd them to the King Himſelf, and gave them their Safe-Conduct to go to the King about it; upon this Twelve Rochellers went to Paris to the King, who ſeeing it no time now to ſtand upon Punctilio's, not only gave them his Pardon for preſuming thus to capitulate with their Prince, but alſo treated and highly preſented them; they likewiſe obtain'd a Charter of their Liberties in as ample a manner as they deſired, having been confirm'd in the Chamber of the Peers of France, and ſealed before the King Himſelf: hereupon they began immediatly to demoliſh their Caſtle, which had been one of the ſtrongeſt in France, and raſed it down to the Ground; and when they had thus ſecured themſelves of that Fear, they ſent to Poictiers to the Conſtable and Lords, letting them know they might now come to Rochel, for they were ready to open their Gates, and receive them. Upon this intelligence the Conſtable went thither with two hundred Men at Arms in his Company, and the Rochellers received him in triumph, and there perform'd their Fealty and Homage to him, as unto the French King, from whom he had a Procuration for that purpoſe; and I ſuppoſe that it was in conſideration of this Service, that the Rochellers enjoy'd thoſe great Privileges and Immunities, which continued till about fourſcore Years ago, when they forfeited them by taking up Arms againſt Lewis the XIII. in defence of the Proteſtant Intereſt. But to return to the matter in hand.

[1] After the Conſtable of France had tarried ſome days at Rochel to ſet things in order there, he return'd to Poictiers to the other Dukes and Lords of France; with whom being join'd, he marched with three thouſand Spears further into the Country, for he deſign'd to recover all the Caſtles and Fortreſſes in Rochellois, and about the Marches, which were as yet in the Engliſh hands: and firſt they came before St. Benont, a ſtrong Caſtle, but however they vow'd to reduce it before their Departure; and notwithſtanding the Engliſh Gariſon from Surgieres came upon the French Army in the Night, and beat up their Quarters, carrying away certain Priſoners, and cauſing a great Alarm in their Camp, yet did it not hinder them from proſecuting the Siege with that vigour, that they ſoon after took the Place by undermining it; and entring it, put the whole Gariſon to the Sword.

[1] Id. c. 311. The Conſtable takes ſeveral ſtrong Towns and Caſtles in Rochellois.

Then the Conſtable, after he had order'd the Caſtle to be repair'd, and had put a ſufficient Force into it, advanced forward to another called Marant, which being leſs defenſible than the former, ſurrender'd upon Terms. From thence he went to Surgieres to revenge the Affront he had lately received from that Place; but that Gariſon fearing the Conſtable's Revenge, had deſerted the Place before the French could come up to it: ſo having plac'd a Gariſon likewiſe there, he went back to Fontenay le Comte, a Caſtle belonging to the Lady of Sir John Harpedon, who was then a Priſoner in Spain; and here the Conſtable laid Siege both to Town and Caſtle, and many fierce Aſſaults were made; but at laſt it was agreed by Compoſition, that the Lady her ſelf, and as many as would remain true to King Edward, ſhould go to Thouars, their Lives, Honours and Goods preſerv'd; and accordingly they were ſafely convey'd thither by the Conſtable's Order.

Then not long after, [2] He with the Lords of Partenay, Pauſanges, Cors, and many other Noblemen, undertook the Siege of Thouars, it being the preſent Refuge for all the Barons of Poictou, that ſtill continued firm to the Engliſh Intereſt: and the Conſtable having inveſted the Place, and brought thither from Poictiers and Rochel ſeveral Engines, they continually play'd night and day upon the Town, to the great terror of thoſe that were in it; ſo that at laſt with deſign to gain as much time as they could, and in hopes of Succour from England, they agreed with the French for a Truce for them and their Eſtates until Michelmas-day next enſuing; within which time if they were not reliev'd by the King of England, or one of his Sons, they promis'd then to yield both themſelves and their Lands to the Obedience of the French King. Theſe Terms being agreed to on both ſides, the Conſtable, with the other Lords of France, return'd to Paris, whither by this time the Captal de Buche was brought a Priſoner, and put under ſafe Cuſtody in a Tower of the Temple. The French King being extremely pleas'd to ſee him, very well rewarded an Eſquire of Vermandois who took him, with a preſent of twelve thouſand Franks: But becauſe the Captal would by no means renounce the Engliſh Intereſt, tho it were to purchaſe his Liberty, the French King, who was afraid of his Valour, would not let him be put to ranſom, nor ſet free by Exchange; tho the Engliſh offer'd one Earl and three Knights for him: So that he never enjoy'd his Liberty any more, but remain'd in cloſe Confinement till his Death, which happen'd about four Years after, being a Nobleman worthy of a better Fortune and an Immortal Memory; for he yielded to none in that Age for Valour, Courteſy, Piety or Conduct: And as for his Nobility, he was nearly allied to the Kings of Navarre, France and England; and from his Blood is deſcended the preſent Royal Family of France. But we will now return to the Affairs of England, where we ſhall ſtill find nothing but Loſſes and Diſappointments.

The French King refuſes to ſet the Captal de Buche free on any Terms.

Immediately after the abovemention'd Truce, [l] the Poictovin Lords that were firm to King Edward ſent Meſſengers to Him, who declar'd to Him and his Council the deſperate State of Poictou and Saintoigne, and the dangerous Condition of the Lords and Gentlemen that were beſieged in Thouars, and what Agreement they had made with the Conſtable of France; which when the King heard, He was exceedingly vexed to find a Prince, whom He looked upon as wholly unwarlike, to be a harder Match for Him than either King Philip or John, who were Brave and Valiant Princes; and which indeed ſhews us, That a Prince that acts offenſively, if he has by his own natural Prudence made choice of Brave and Experienc'd Commanders, may have the better of another more warlike, who wants thoſe Advantages. But however, when King Edward had taken advice of his Council, their Reſolution was to command the Duke of Lancaſter (who was juſt then ready according to former Orders to go for Calais with a conſiderable Army) to attend a while, for He deſign'd to go along with Him in Perſon into Poictou and Saintoigne, to retake Rochel, the greateſt ſtreſs of his Affairs lying there. In the mean while the King ſent an extraordinary Summons throughout the Realm, commanding all men of ſuch and ſuch an Age and Degree, to come ready armed to Sandwich, or thereabouts, by a Day appointed, to go over Sea along with Him, and his Sons, the Prince and the Duke of Lancaſter; ſo that none of thoſe who were concern'd either would or durſt diſobey this general Command of the King, but drew as faſt as they could to the Sea-ſide, where lay ready for them four hundred great Ships, beſides other Veſſels.

with Edward the Black Prince (who was now ſo well recover'd as to be able to go to Sea with his Father) and divers of his chief Nobility, as well as his whole Army, embarking in four hundred Veſſels of all ſorts, ſail'd toward the Coaſt of France: but the Wind (tho proving fair at firſt) quickly turn'd ſo contrary, that He could never land in France at all; ſo about five weeks after, in the beginning of October, when the time limited for the Relief or Surrender of the Town of Thouars was expired, He was forced to return into England. This was the laſt and moſt unfortunate Voyage that King Edward ever made, ſince by this and the laſt Diſaſter of the Earl of Pembroke, He loſt almoſt his whole Dominions on that ſide the Water.

The King with a great Army puts to Sea, but is forced back by a contrary Wind.

But I muſt here obſerve, that before the Black Prince went to Sea, the King at his Requeſt had by his [2] Letters Patents conſtituted his Grandchild Richard, then ſcarce ſeven Years of Age, Guardian and Lieutenant of the Kingdom during his Abſence, appointing Him a Council for the management of all publick Affairs: and two days after, viz. on the firſt of September, they [3] iſſued out Writs of Summons in the Guardian's Name for a Parliament to meet fifteen days after Michaelmas; but before that time King Edward was return'd into England, and then by Writs dated at Winchelſea on the ſixth of October, He prorogu'd the Parliament to the morrow of All Souls, or third of November, when being met accordingly, [4] Sir John Knivet declar'd in part the Cauſes of the Summons to this Parliament; but they were further adjourn'd until Friday following, and then Sir Hugh Bryan in the White Chamber acquainted the Prelats, Dukes, Earls, Barons and Bannerets, that the Prince, who had the Principality of Guienne by the Grant of the King his Father, had, whilſt He was there, often ſignified to Him by Letters, &c. that the Revenues and Profits ariſing from that Principality, did not, nor could ſuffice to maintain him, and ſupport the Government and Wars againſt the French their Enemies, and other neceſſary Charges, without a great Aſſiſtance from the King; and that the Prince having made theſe things appear to the King and Council, when firſt he came into England, had therefore ſurrender'd into the King's hands the ſaid Principality, and all he could claim there by virtue of his Grant, in the preſence of the King's Council and ſome other Great Men.

Sir John Knivet declares in part the Cauſes of the ſummoning this Parliament, which are farther related by Sir Hugh Bryan.

On [5] the next day, being Saturday, the ſaid Sir Hugh, in the Preſence of the Prince, Prelats, and the reſt of the Eſtates (as before recited) in the ſame Chamber, more expreſly declared the Cauſes of that Summons, which were, that the King by Advice of the Great Men, had order'd ſeveral Commanders of note to go with ſufficient Power, ſome into Gaſcoigne, others to Calais, to oppoſe the Deſigns of his Enemies, and to make War upon them by all the ways they could; but that afterwards, upon the ſudden News that came to the King of their March, He went Himſelf to Sea with the reſt of his Forces; yet by reaſon of the Winds being contrary, and other unavoidable Cauſes, He was forced to return into England, without doing any thing: And then having ſummon'd and prorogu'd this preſent Parliament, that ſo the Great Men, who were with Him at Sea, might be alſo there, and that by the good Advice and Counſel of them all, He might do the beſt He could for the Safety of the Nation, to reſiſt and oppoſe the Malice of his Enemies, who had made

And then deſires them to give the King the beſt Advice and Aſſiſtance.

And [1] then He deſired the ſaid Prince, Prelates, Dukes, Earls, Barons and Commons, on behalf of the King, that they would adviſe upon this matter, and give Him ſuch Counſel and Aid, as ſhould ſeem to them moſt profitable for the Nation, and to reduce the Power of his Enemies. Whereupon the Prince, and all the reſt of the Eſtates above recited, having had full Deliberation upon the Points of their Charge, and the Dependences thereon, and alſo conſidering the great and exceſſive Charges and Expence the King was to be at for the Defence of the Nation, and maintaining the Wars againſt his Enemies, granted Him the former Subſidy of Wool, Leather and Woolfells, for two years longer, to begin at Michaelmas laſt paſt, viz. of every Sack of Wool which was ſhipt out of England 2 l. 3 s. 4 d. of every twelveſcore of Wool-fells as much, of every Laſt of Leather 4 l. of Denizens, beſides the old Cuſtom; and of Foreigners four Marks of every Sack of Wool, beſides the old Cuſtom, and as much of every twelveſcore of Wool-fells, and five Pound ſix Shillings and eight Pence of every Laſt of Leather.

They grant the King a Fifteenth.

And [2] whereas the Subſidy and Cuſtom ſo granted could not be ſufficient for the great Expence and Charge the King was to be at, for the Cauſes aboveſaid, as it was openly ſhew'd unto them, the ſame Eſtates already recited, moreover granted a Fifteenth for one Year, to be levied as the laſt was. Then on the 23*d* of November, the King, Prelates, Dukes, Earls, Barons, and Commons again aſſembl'd in the White Chamber; and there the Chancellor declar'd to the King how kind the Lords and Commons had been to Him in granting Him the ſaid Subſidies and Fifteenth, who very kindly thanked them all for their great Aid: and afterwards the Petitions of the Commons were read and anſwered according to Cuſtom. After which the Knights of Shires had leave to depart, and ſue out Writs for their Wages or Expences; but the Citizens and Burgeſſes were commanded to ſtay.

The Citizens and Burgeſſes grant the King a Cuſtom.

Whereupon the ſame day, they being aſſembl'd before the Prince, Prelates and Great Men, granted, for the ſafe conveying of their Ships and Goods, a Cuſtom of two Shillings upon every Tun of Wine coming in, or exported out of the Kingdom, and 6 d. in the Pound of all their Goods and Merchandize for one Year.

But there is no credit to be given to that which Froiſart [3] relates concerning what was further tranſacted in this Parliament, that it was there agreed between King Edward, and the Prince his Son, if he ſhould happen to die before the King his Father, that then his Grandſon Richard ſhould ſucceed to the Crown of England, as next Heir, after the Deceaſe of the King his Grandfather; and that thereupon all the Prelates, Lords, and Knights, and the Commons of the Realm, had ſuch a Veneration for the Prince of Wales, becauſe of his heroick Vertues, that with one conſent they all agreed to this reaſonable Propoſal, which was ſworn to by the King, his Sons, and all the reſt there preſent, that the Lord Richard ſhould ſucceed, in the manner already recited. [1] Id. ib. The English and Gaſcoigne Barons march towards Thouars, and offer the Barons within it their Aſſiſtance, who refuſe it.

But we ſhall now look back to the Affairs of France, where a [1] little before Michaelmas the Barons of England and Gaſcoigne went from Niort toward Thouars in order to join King Edward, whom they then ſuddenly expected; but they were extremely ſurprized, when they could not hear any News of the King's arrival. However to acquit themſelves of their Duty to the utmoſt of their Power, they ſent certain Officers to the Barons of Poictou that were in Thouars, with a Meſſage to this effect: That they were come from the loyal Lords of Gaſcoigne and England, to let them know that they were marched from Niort with above twelve hundred Men at Arms, ready prepared to aſſiſt them; only they deſired to know, whether in the abſence of the King of England and his Sons, they would accept of it, or not, ſince as for their own Parts they were ready to venture their Lives and Fortunes with them. To which Meſſage the Barons and Noblemen in the Town after ſome Conſideration returned this Anſwer, That unleſs the King of England or one of his Sons had arrived within the time limited, they could not according to their late Agreement with the Conſtable of France, accept of their Aſſiſtance. At which Anſwer the Engliſh and Gaſcoigne Forces, that were without the Town, being much diſpleas'd, return'd again to Niort from whence they came.

[2] Id. ib. The Conſtable comes again before Thouars, and ſummons thoſe within it to ſurrender, which they for the preſent defer.

Not long after this, [2] on Michaelmas Eve, there came from Poictiers (according to the late Agreement before Thouars) the Conſtable and the Lord Cliſſon, with divers other Noblemen of France, to the number of ten thouſand Men at Arms, beſides others. This vaſt Army ſtood ready drawn up in Battel-Array in the Field before Thouars on the Eve of, and upon Michaelmas-day likewiſe, and towards Night they withdrew to their Tents; but on the morrow morning the Conſtable and the Dukes ſent a Summons to the Barons and Knights of Poictou within the Town, demanding of them to deliver up the City, according to their Promiſe and Oaths on that behalf made. To theſe Summons 'twas anſwer'd by them, that they would ſhortly come to Poictiers, and there ſubmit themſelves, and all their Lands, to the Protection of the French King. This Anſwer ſeeming ſufficient to the Lords of France, they broke up from before the Town, and the Dukes diſmiſs'd the greater part of their Army, only retaining ſuch competent Forces, as they had before they expected King Edward's Arrival; and I ſuppoſe not long after the Noblemen in Thouars were as good as their words; tho why they did not ſurrender at that time, I can give no good account, unleſs it were that they ſtill expected King Edward's Arrival. But in the mean while the Lord Cliſſon was appointed to go with the Conſtable, and take in other Places; and ſitting down before Mortaigne, with two hundred Lances beſides Foot, he had like to have been there ſurpriz'd by a Party of five hundred Engliſh that came from Niort in the Night; of which having notice by a Spy, he had only time enough to eſcape with his Men, and leave his Carriages behind him. But however the Lords and Gentlemen of the Engliſh Party that were ſtill at Niort, finding they were able to do nothing more conſiderable this Campagne, reſolved to diſperſe; Sir Walter Hewet with ſome few more returning into England, and all the reſt to Bourdeaux; but as they went, they burnt and ravag'd all the Lands of the Sieur de Partenay, who lately turn'd to the French before Thouars. Thus all the County of Poictou was reduced under King Charles's Obedience, except a few Fortreſſes, as Niort, Les Eſſars, Mortimer, and ſome others, which made divers Excurſions and Inroads among their Neighbours, with various Succeſs.

[1] Id. c. 212. The Duke of Bretagne ſends over to K. Edward for Aſſiſtance.

[1] Nor was the Engliſh Intereſt more fortunate in Bretagne, where tho John Duke of that Country, King Edward's Son-in-law, could not without ingratitude declare againſt the Intereſt of his Father-in-law; yet the chief Nobility of his Country, eſpecially the Lord Cliſſon, the Lord de la Val, and the Viſcount of Rohan, were wholly in the Intereſt of France; and theſe had the aſſurance to tell the Duke to his face, that if he ſhould take part with King Edward againſt their Sovereign the King of France, they would quit his Service together with the Country: And the French King, who by his politick Arts had debauched moſt of the Lords of Bretagne, had aſſured them that ſo ſoon as ever they ſhould ſee the Duke begin to take up Arms, they ſhould give him notice of it, and he would immediately ſend them Aſſiſtance. But the Duke perceiving by theſe Declarations of his Lords, what he was to expect from them, and fearing they ſhould ſeiſe upon his Perſon, and ſend him Priſoner into France, ſent ſecretly to King Edward, repreſenting the great Danger he was in, and deſiring Him that He would ſend him ſome Forces for his Defence. Whereupon the King, who loved him intirely, ſent him four hundred Men at Arms, and as many Archers, under the Command of the Lord John Neville, who arrived at St. Matthew de Fine Paterne, and lodg'd in the Town without doing any Injury or Violence; for they behav'd themſelves regularly, and paid juſtly for whatever they had; and the Duke never offer'd to put them into any Fortreſs, but let them quarter there all that Winter: However the Lords of Bretagne were ſo much incens'd at this Action of the Duke's, that he had brought Engliſh-men into their Country, that they fortified their Caſtles, and began to ſtand upon their Guard, againſt the Duke and his Adherents. And in this tickliſh Poſture ſtood the Affairs of Bretagne all this Year, which was one of the moſt unfortunate to the Engliſh Affairs, that ever had been yet, tho thoſe that follow will not prove very much better. ✝

England affording us nothing worth our notice, we ſhall again proceed with the War in France, [2] where no ſooner was the unactive Seaſon of Winter paſt, but the Conſtable de Gueſclin began to take the Field, marching from the City of Poictiers with fourteen thouſand fighting men under many other Commanders of note. With theſe he went and laid Siege to Sireth, or Siveray, a Place of Strength, and well fortified his Camp with a Ditch and Paliſadoes. During this Siege Sir Robert Mico, and another Gentleman, who were Captains in the Place, and had defended themſelves with great Valour againſt the Attacks of the French, ſent private Intelligence of their Condition to Sir John d' Eureux, and to Monſ. D' Angouſe, the chief Commanders that were left in Niort; who joining their Forces with thoſe of Luſignan and other Places, they made all together a conſiderable Army,

Army, tho not ſtrong enough to encounter that of the Conſtable in the open Field. Theſe being come near Siveray, inſtead of falling ſuddenly upon the French Camp (as in prudence they ought to have done) they made a halt to reſt and refreſh themſelves, of which the Conſtable having notice, he immediately put his men in order to fight, and then placed an Ambuſh of two hundred choſen men to receive thoſe of the Gariſon, if they ſhould offer to make a Sally upon them, as he verily believed they would: nor was he at all deceived in his expectations; for the Commanders within the Caſtle ſeeing from the Walls that there were Forces come to their Aſſiſtance, immediately ſent out about ſixty Soldiers to ſkirmiſh with the French, but with very ill ſucceſs, for they fell into the Ambuſh that was laid for them, and were all ſlain or taken Priſoners; after which the Conſtable marching out of the Camp in Battel-Array, ſtoutly received the Charge of the Engliſh Forces, who, tho they had ſome advantage at firſt, and broke thro the Body that the Conſtable himſelf commanded, yet being at laſt over-powered by the too great numbers of their Enemies, they were utterly defeated, and moſt of them either ſlain, or taken Priſoners, among whom were ſeveral of the chief Commanders both of England and Poictou. This Battel was fought on the twentieth of March this Year.

Sir John D' Euereux and others of the Engliſh march from Niort to relieve it, but are all ſlain or taken Priſoners.

The Victory being thus obtained, [1] the Conſtable return'd to his Camp, where having taken care of his wounded men and Priſoners (of both which he had many) he ſent a Summons to thoſe in the Caſtle, to let them know, that if they did not immediately ſurrender it, they ſhould die without mercy; upon which terrible Threat, and knowing there was no further Relief to be expected, they ſubmitted, and had the favour to go off, without ſuffering any harm either in their Goods or Perſons, the Conſtable allowing them a Convoy to Bourdeaux. Thus this ſtrong Fortreſs, and all the Lands pertaining thereunto, returned to the Obedience of the French King. After this the Conſtable advanced before Niort, that ſtrong Town ſo often mention'd, where the Engliſh ſome time ſince had a good Gariſon; but that being gone, ſo ſoon as the Inhabitants heard that the Conſtable himſelf was coming againſt them, they went out to meet him with the Keys of the Town in their hands, and ſo conducted him within their Walls with great Joy. The Conſtable having tarried there ſome days to refreſh his men, went thence with an Army of fourteen hundred Lances, beſides other Soldiers, and preſented himſelf before the Caſtle of Luſignan, which yielded unto him upon Compoſition, thoſe of the Gariſon being permitted to go off with their Lives and Goods ſaved.

receive into her Caſtle any freſh Men, Victuals, Ammunition, other than She had at preſent. And ſo the Siege was raiſed, upon the Duke of Berry's Order to the Conſtable for that purpoſe. From thence He went before the Caſtle of Mortimer, the Lady whereof ſubmitted her ſelf and her Lands to the Obedience of the French King, and She alſo delivered up the Caſtle of Dienne, which belonged to her: Thus was all Poictou, Saintonge and Rochellois quite clear'd of the Engliſh; whereupon the Conſtable having put good Gariſons in all the Places he had taken, and ſaw no ſign of Reſiſtance in thoſe Parts, all being reduced even as far as the River Garonne, he return'd into France, as alſo did the Dukes of Berry, Bourbon and Burgundy, and moſt of the French Barons, who had been engag'd on the French ſide, where they were all very well received, and highly careſſed by the King of France, eſpecially the Conſtable de Gueſclin, whoſe Glory eclipſed all the reſt, being look'd upon (as indeed he was) the Reſtorer of the French Monarchy.

Whilſt [1] the Conſtable remained thus at Paris, the Lords de Cliſſon, de la Val, and other Noblemen of Bretagne took up Arms, and ſided with the French King, and marching with a powerful Army of Bretons and Normans, layd Siege to the ſtrong Caſtle of Becherel in Normandy, which they very much ſtraitned by their continual Aſſaults; but it being at that time gallantly defended by the Governour, Sir John Cornwal, it could not be then taken. During this Tranſaction, the French carried on another Siege before St. Saviour le Vicount, which continued a good while; for it is to be noted, that theſe two Gariſons, before they were beſieged, had over-aw'd all the Lower Normandy; ſo that nothing could be ſecure from them, but what was in ſtrong Fortreſſes; which was conniv'd at by the King of Navarre, who often aſſiſted them with Men and Proviſions, for he was not as yet thorowly reconciled to the French King his Brother, tho He was quickly after, when going to Paris He made a full Agreement with Him, and having put his Territories in Normandy under the King's Protection, and left his two Sons as Hoſtages for his Fidelity, He took his leave of France, and went into his own Kingdom, where He continued in Peace for about Six Years, and then took occaſion again to renew the War with his Nephew King Charles VI. as you will find in the next Reign.

Whilſt [2] theſe Sieges were carried on by the French before Becherel and St. Saviour le Vicount, there was a Report that Prince Owen was coming by Sea with Six thouſand Men at Arms to invade England; whereupon King Edward appointed William Montacute Earl of Saliſbury, his Admiral, to guard the Engliſh Seas, He Himſelf being at that time retain'd by Indenture to ſerve the King with Three hundred Men at Arms (whereof Twenty were Knights, and Two hundred ſeventy nine Eſquires) beſides Three hundred Archers; not to mention the great Retinues of other Lords and Officers that went along with him, as Sir John Montacute his Brother, Sir William Neville, Sir Philip Courtney, with divers others. The French King ſends his Conſtable to ſeize upon the Dutchy of Bretagne.

The [3] Duke's ſecret Intentions to ſide with the Engliſh had before this been fully diſcover'd to the French King by certain of ~~his~~ (the Duke's) Servants, to whom he had let fall ſome words in favour of the King of England; whereupon He order'd his Conſtable to undertake an Expedition into Bretagne, commanding and impowering him to take into his hands all Cities and Fortreſſes, and to ſeize the Bodies and Goods of all that ſhould reſiſt; for the King and his Council had already agreed, That the Duke had now forfeited all his Territories, as having received his Enemies the Engliſh, and he alſo Himſelf having took part with the King of England, and entred into a ſecret Alliance with Him againſt the Crown of France, of which He held his Dutchy of Bretagne by Homage and Fealty. Upon this the Conſtable went from Paris to Angiers, where he made his general Rendezvous; and thither came to him the Duke of Bourbon, the Earls of Alenſon, Perche, and Portien, and many other Lords and Great Men of France, beſides thoſe that came from the Marches of Anjou, Poictou and Touraine.

But I ought firſt to have told you, [5] that a little before this, the Duke of Bretagne was gone for England; for when he heard how the Conſtable was coming with ſuch vaſt Forces againſt him, he durſt not truſt to any of the Fortreſſes, and therefore reſolved to go thither himſelf, as well to avoid the impending ſtorm, as to haſten Succours from thence: but having conſtituted Sir Robert Knolles, whom he left his Lieutenant of all Bretagne during his Abſence, he went firſt to viſit his Caſtle of Auray (lying between Vannes and Hennebond) which held firm to him; and an Engliſh Knight named Sir John Auſtin, being Captain thereof under him, with whom he left his Dutcheſs, he conjured him to guard her well, which he promiſed to perform to the utmoſt of his Power. Then the Duke left Auray, and went to St. Matthew du fine Poterne, which undutifully ſhut her Gates againſt him; wherefore he paſſed on to Le Conquet, and there took Shipping for England.

With theſe joint Forces the Conſtable went firſt to the City of Rennes, and upon his declaring that John de Monford their late Duke had forfeited his Dutchy by rebelling againſt his Sovereign the King of France, the Citizens open'd their Gates and received him; from thence he came before Dinant, which ſubmitted in like manner, as did alſo the City of Vannes; but Luzemont, after a bold reſiſtance, being taken by Force, all within it were put to the Sword. the Conſtable ſoon reduced all that part of Bretagne to the French Obedience without ſtriking a ſtroke, except at Quimperlay, whereof one John Rous was Governour; who, when the Town was taken, was ſlain by the hands of the Lord de Cliſſon; but he in Return for all the Favours he had formerly received from the King of England, did now ſo hate all Engliſhmen, as he hardly took any to Mercy that once fell into his hands. But it was the Conſtable's Reſolution firſt to reduce Bretagne * Bretonant, becauſe that part was always more inclinable to Duke John's Intereſt, than Bretagne Gallicant; and therefore he chiefly beſtir'd himſelf in theſe Parts.

As for † Sir Robert Knolles, who was the only Commander of Note that ſtuck to the Duke's Intereſt, and had been left his Lieutenant during his Abſence; tho he wanted neither Courage nor Conduct, yet he had not ſufficient Forces to oppoſe the Conſtable of France; ſo that all he could then do was to ſtrengthen thoſe Gariſons that remain'd, and render them as defenſible as they could be, as he did in particular his own Caſtle of Derval, which he committed to the Cuſtody of Sir Hugh Bright his Kinſman; he himſelf going to Breſt, ſtaking all his Fortune upon the ſtrength of that Place.

The Conſtable beſieges the Town of Hennebond, takes it, and puts all the Engliſh to the Sword.

About the ſame time the Conſtable, who had by ſeveral Detachments taken in moſt part of the Towns on that ſide of Bretagne, came in Perſon, and laid Siege to Hennebond, the Commander whereof under the Duke was an Engliſh Gentleman, named Thomas Wicke, to whoſe Aſſiſtance Sir Robert Knolles had lately ſent a Valiant Knight, called Sir Thomas Prior; ſo that in all they made about Fourſcore Men at Arms, beſides others. As ſoon as ever the French Army was come thither, they began to aſſault the Caſtle, having brought with them certain terrible great Guns, wherewith they had won divers Caſtles and Fortreſſes. When theſe ſtrange Engines were planted againſt the Town and Caſtle, the Conſtable commanded it to be proclaim'd in the Hearing of the Beſieged, That having ſworn he would Sup within the Town that Night, whoever ſhould preſume to make any Reſiſtance, he would put them all to the Sword as ſoon as ever he enter'd the Place. Upon which Threatning Proclamation, the Townſmen were ſo diſcouraged, that they ſlunk away, and left the Defence of the Walls to the Engliſh Gariſon, which being too inferior in number to hold out againſt ſo large a Place, it was ſoon taken by Storm, and all the Engliſh, except the Two Chief Commanders, put to the Sword; after which the Conſtable, having ſtay'd there ſome days to new fortify the Place, removed to Le Conquet, a Port Town, which he reſolved alſo to reduce.

Le Conquet is taken, and the Gariſon put to the Sword.

On the Earl of Saliſbury's departure from Breſt, it is cloſely beſieged by the Conſtable.

This Place after a gallant Reſiſtance was taken likewiſe by Aſſault, and all within it put to the Sword, except only the Captain, Sir John Langlay an Engliſh Knight, who was received to Mercy. Le Conquet being thus won, the Conſtable taking care to repair it, then reſolved to go before the ſtrong Fortreſs of Breſt; for tho the Earl of Saliſbury had lately been there, yet when he had very well ſupplied the Place with Men, Archers, Artillery and Victuals, he took Shipping again, and coaſted along the Country to ſee if happily he might find out the Frenchmen that were expected to invade England by Sea; but ſoon after his Departure, the Conſtable came and ſat down before Breſt, wherein at that time was Sir Robert Knolles himſelf, and

But to let you ſee how powerful the French were at this time, [2] they had now laid Siege to Five ſeveral Places at once; the one before Becherel, the other before Breſt, a third before Derval, a fourth before St. Saviour in Normandy, and the fifth before Roche ſur Yon, in Poictou, which belonged to the Duke of Lancaſter: and to each of them were given many ſhrewd Aſſaults; but thoſe of Roche ſur Yon, who were furtheſt off from any Succour, were firſt oblig'd to a Compoſition; which was, That unleſs they ſhould be reliev'd within the ſpace of a Month, they would ſurrender the Place to the French King's Pleaſure.

But [3] to proceed with the Siege of Derval. So ſoon as Sir Hugh Bright and the Gariſon of that Place ſaw themſelves beſieged by ſo great an Army, they very much doubted that they ſhould not be able to make good the Place; and that if it ſhould be taken, they ſhould be all put to the Sword; therefore they enter'd into a Treaty with the French, whereby they obtain'd a Truce for Two Months, on Condition, That in caſe they were not relieved within that time, either by the Duke of Bretagne, or ſome other able to keep the Field againſt the French, and to raiſe the Siege, they would ſurrender the Caſtle to

The Conſtable, being willing to gain ſo Important a City, preſently ſwore, as the King of France's Procurator, to whatſoever they required of him; and upon this he was received into the City.

Sir R. Knolles quits Breſt on Conditions, and goes to relieve Derval.

Whilſt theſe [4] Affairs were thus tranſacting, and Sir Robert Knolles (who was ſtill in Breſt) underſtood that Sir Hugh Bright had made ſuch a Compoſition with the Conſtable and the Duke of Anjou, as has been already related, he was much concerned; and ſeeing, that unleſs he quitted that Place for a time, he could by no means ſave his Caſtle, he reſolved therefore to enter into a Treaty, and make ſome Conditions with the Conſtable for that purpoſe; and having ſent to him about it whilſt he lay before Nantes, he gave his Commanders that beſieged Breſt Power to agree with Sir Robert on this Condition, That the Gariſon ſhould have a Truce for forty Days; and if by that time they were not relieved by an ~~able~~ Army to fight the Conſtable, they ſhould then forthwith ſurrender the Caſtle, but the Gariſon was to remain in the mean while (as now they were) without Revictualling, or taking in any new Supplies of Men or Ammunition, or any other ſort of Proviſion: and for this Agreement Sir R. Knolles ſent certain Knights and Eſquires to the Conſtable as Hoſtages, to ſecure him that there ſhould be no Default on his part. After which Sir Robert taking with him ſome Brave Men at Arms, went to his Caſtle of Derval, hoping ſtill to defend it againſt the French: but upon the Conſtable's having thus rais'd the Siege, he ſent thoſe Troops that lay before Breſt, together with the reſt that were under his own Command, to reinforce the Gariſons in Picardy: For the Duke of Lancaſter being then made the King his Father's Lieutenant of Aquitain, and General of all his Forces on that ſide the Sea, was newly arriv'd at Calais with a great Army; of whoſe Succeſs We ſhall ſpeak by and by.

The E. of Saliſbury ſails to relieve Breſt.

14. [illegible]
date June 12.

In [5] the mean while, the Earl of Saliſbury was at Sea cruiſing with his Fleet about the Coaſts of Normandy and Bretagne; and having received a powerful Reinforcement from England of above Three thouſand Landmen, when he heard of the Compoſition the Gariſon of Breſt had made, he immediatly ſail'd thither to relieve it; and landing his Men, drew them up before the Place in Battel Array, and this he did for ſeveral days together, offering the French Battel if they ſhould think fit to attack him: but finding that neither the Conſtable nor any other French Commander durſt come thither to meet him, when the Forty Days Truce was near expir'd, he ſent a Herald to the Conſtable to let him know, That ſince he had made Articles with the Gariſon of Breſt, that unleſs the Caſtle was reliev'd by ſuch a Day, it was then to be ſurrender'd to him; therefore the Earl of Saliſbury and the reſt of the Engliſh Lords were come to Breſt within the time prefixed, had relieved it, and were ready to defend the Place, and now expected to meet Him there with his Forces, in order to give them Battel; and if he refus'd, they deſired then their Hoſtages ſhould be return'd, ſince the Articles had been truly perform'd on the Engliſh ſide. To which Meſſage the Conſtable return'd an Anſwer more full of French Fineſſe than of true Honour and Plain-dealing; for he bid the Herald tell thoſe that had ſent him, That he was as deſirous to fight as they could be, but Breſt was not the Place where the Treaty was confirm'd; and therefore if they would march to him, they ſhould find that he would not fail to give them Battel.

He offers to give the Conſtable Battel before Breſt.

Which he puts off by a cunning Excuſe.

This ' Meſſage the Politick Conſtable ſent, becauſe he knew that there were near forty Leagues between Breſt and Nantes, where he then was, and that it was morally impoſſible for them to march ſo far thro an Enemy's Country: however upon the Receipt of this Meſſage, the Earl of Saliſbury return'd another by the ſame Herald, wherein he let the Conſtable know, That the Men he had with him, belonging to the Marine Service, had no Horſes, and could not march ſo far on foot; but if the Conſtable would pleaſe to furniſh them with Horſes, he ſhould endeavour to meet him, and give him Battel too, whenever he ſhould appoint. But to this the Conſtable thought not fit to return any other Anſwer, than, That he was not bound to provide them Horſes; and asked what Security they could give him, that the Horſes (if lent) ſhould be ſafely return'd? To which the Herald not being able to give any Anſwer, only demanded the Return of the Hoſtages; and this being refuſed by the Conſtable, the Meſſenger went back to thoſe that had ſent him. At laſt, the forty Days being expir'd without any Battel offer'd on the French ſide, the Earl enter'd Breſt, and victualled the Town, and reinforced the Gariſon; after which he return'd on Board his Ships to guard the Sea Coaſts, as he had been commanded by King Edward: whereupon the Conſtable pretending that the late Agreement was not truly kept, ſince the Earl of Saliſbury had newly reinforced and victualled the Gariſon of Breſt, he committed the Hoſtages cloſe Priſoners.

' Id. ib.

The Earl again offers to fight the Conſtable, provided he would furniſh his Men with Horſes, which he refuſes.

The Earl reinforces Breſt, and then goes again on Board; whereupon the Conſtable commits the Hoſtages cloſe Priſoners.

But ' tho this Proceeding of the Conſtable might ſeem very ſevere, it was far leſs cruel than what was not long after uſed towards thoſe Hoſtages that had been deliver'd at Derval upon much the ſame Conditions: for when Sir Robert Knolles was return'd to his Caſtle, and had reinforced the Gariſon (as hath been already related) and that the Duke of Anjou found, that ſince the Duke of Lancaſter's Arrival in France, he could not ſpare ſo many Men as were requiſite to take in that Place by Force; he therefore ſent to Sir Robert Knolles to let him know, That ſeeing the time of the Truce was expired, and that the Gariſon in Derval had not as yet been relieved by any Forces ſufficient to raiſe the Siege, he expected to have the Caſtle ſurrender'd. To this Meſſage Sir Robert Knolles return'd in Anſwer by the Herald that that brought it, That it was not in the power of the Deputy-Governour of that Place to make any Compoſition concerning the Delivery of what was not his own, nor would he be bound by it. To which the Duke ſent back the Herald again, with this further Meſſage, That the Agreement was, That They of the Gariſon ſhould not receive any freſh Men or Proviſions into it, within the time prefixed; yet notwithſtanding this they had admitted him Sir R. Knolles into it, with a freſh Supply both of Men and Proviſions, which being contrary to the ſaid Agreement, if he did not immediately ſurrender the Place, the Hoſtages ſhould loſe their Heads. At which Reply Sir Robert being much incenſed, bid them do their worſt, and if the Duke put any of his Men to death, he would do the like by as many of his; but for all that, the Duke in a Paſſion, immediately executed the Hoſtages; and in Revenge Sir Robert cauſed Three French Gentlemen Priſoners, of the ſame Quality, to be beheaded on a ſmall Scaffold at a Window of the Hall, and their Heads to be flung into the Caſtle-Ditch in ſight of the Beſiegers: upon which the Duke of Anjou, not being able to proſecute the Siege, roſe from thence, and return'd to Paris to the King his Brother; but the Conſtable, the Lord de Cliſſon, and the reſt of the French Noblemen were then gone towards Troyes in Champagne, to obſerve the Motions of the Engliſh Army, which now was marching under the Conduct of the Duke of Lancaſter towards Auxerre.

Which being refuſed, the D. puts the Hoſtages to death; and Sir Robert revenges it, by beheading three French Priſoners.

The D. of Lancaſter is made the King's Lieutenant in France, with a great Power.
* Rot. Franc. 47 E. 3. m. 18.

But it is now high time to give you an Account of the Expedition that this Valiant Prince made this Summer thro France; for he had lately been appointed by the * King's Letters Patents, dated the Twelfth of June, by the Title of King of Caſtile and Leon, and Duke of Lancaſter, his Majeſty's Lieutenant in Aquitain, with full Power to reduce and take under his Protection all Cities, Towns and Caſtles that ſhould return to their Duty; and to pardon all Treaſons and other Offences, and perform all other things, in as ample a manner as the King Himſelf. So that being inveſted with this Great Power, [2] he went on Board accompanied with the Duke of Bretagne, and many Earls and Barons of Note, with an Army of above Thirty thouſand Men, whereof Three thouſand were Men at Arms, and Ten thouſand Archers, and took Shipping at Dover, and landed at Calais the Four and twentieth of July; where after ſome ſhort ſtay to refreſh his Men, he marched with this Army, divided into three Columns or Bodies, thro the Countries of Artois, Picardy, Champagne, Foreſt, Auvergne and Limoſin, and ſo into Guienne; in which Expedition, tho they ſpoiled thoſe Provinces, and did a great deal of Miſchief, yet ſince they only marched thro the Country without making any Conqueſts, they did themſelves more Prejudice by the great Loſs of Men and Horſes, than they could do their Enemies; and the French thinking it their ſafeſt way rather to avoid than reſiſt the preſent Storm, would not come to any ſet Battel with them, for the Prudent and Cautious King Charles had given expreſs Commands againſt it.

[2] Froiſ. c. 311. He ſails over to Calais with a great Army, and paſſes thro the Heart of France into Guienne, without any reſiſtance.

[3] Id. ib.

And thus the [3] Engliſh Army paſſed through Picardy, Champagne and other Provinces by the Loire, without coming to any Battel or general Engagement, more than ſome ſmall Rencounters and Skirmiſhes with various Succeſs, until they arrived at Bourdeaux; and what happen'd very remarkable in their March, was, That the Pope ſent ſent again into France two Legates to treat of Peace between the two Crowns; but tho theſe Prelates took a great deal of Pains in riding to and fro between the French King and the Engliſh Duke, yet it was all to no purpoſe: the Demands of the latter on behalf of his ~~Nephew~~ Father being ſo high, and the Offers of the former too mean and low to come to any Accommodation; tho Froiſart erroneouſly ſuppoſes, that they made a ſhort Truce for ſome Months, in order to another Treaty. And thus the Duke paſſed thro the very Heart of France, burning and ſpoiling the Country as he marched, without any conſiderable Oppoſition, or ſitting down to beſiege any City or Walled Town: ſo that tho this Expedition ſeem'd very glorious for the Engliſh, yet it was of more Fame than true Profit or Advantage to their Affairs; for they loſt a great many Men, and almoſt all their Horſes in ſo long a March, partly thro the Diſeaſes incident to Camps, but chiefly for want of Forage and Proviſions, the French having taken care to carry all the Corn and Provender they could into the Walled Towns before the Engliſh could arrive; beſides the French Army under the Command of the Duke of Anjou and the Conſtable of France marching in the Rear of their Enemies, ſo watched their motions, that they durſt not ſtraggle far from their main Body for fear of being ſlain, or taken Priſoners.

At laſt the Duke of Lancaſter arrived at Bourdeaux, together with the Duke of Bretagne, about the beginning of November, where he lay ſtill with his Forces all the Winter; and when Spring came on, they were ſo weakned, that they were not able to perform any great matter, as you will find hereafter. But before we proceed further, give me leave to obſerve the evil management of this Expedition; for had King Edward been able to ſet out a numerous and powerful Fleet, He might have ſent his Army into Gaſcoigne in half the time they marched by Land, and that with nothing near that hazard in the Loſs of Men and Horſes; ſo certain it is, That whatever King of England intends to do any thing conſiderable abroad, He muſt firſt make himſelf Maſter at Sea.

N. B.

But it is now time to look back into England, where during the Duke of Lancaſter's March thro France, the King his Father * ſummon'd a Parliament to meet on the morrow of St. Edmund the King, or Twenty firſt of November, which was this Year on Monday. In the Writs of Summons to the Sheriffs were theſe unuſual Clauſes of being enjoined to cauſe to be choſen two dubbed Knights, or the moſt worthy honeſt and diſcreet Eſquires of the County, and the moſt expert in Feats of Arms, and no others; and of every City of that County two Citizens, and of every Burgh two Burgeſſes of the moſt diſcreet and ſufficient, who had the greateſt skill in Shipping and Merchandizing.

Duke of Lancaſter, with many Great Men, and others to oppoſe the Malice of his Adverſaries, who by their good and noble Conduct and Feats of Arms, had done great Damages and Deſtructions to his Enemies, as they well knew, to the high Honour, Quiet and Tranquillity of the King, the Clergy, and others of the Kingdom: That the Sum granted the laſt Parliament to the King in aid of his Wars, tho great and heavy upon the People, yet He expended a great Sum of his own more than that. Further, that the Great Men and others, who ventur'd their Lives and Fortunes to defend them from their Enemies, ought to be well refreſh'd and comforted with Force and Aid, and that as ſpeedily as might be, as was well known to many of them to be neceſſary, who had been in the ſame condition themſelves; and that alſo their Enemy of France made himſelf as ſtrong as He could, not only by his own People and Allies, but by Strangers of divers Countries, and by all the ways He could both by Land and Sea.

* Ib. n. 4.

* Wherefore (he ſaid) the King beſeeched and charged them, conſidering the Perils and Damages that might happen to the Kingdom and all the People for theſe Cauſes, that they would ſpeedily conſult upon the matter, and give the King ſuch Advice, as might be for the Safety of Him, the Kingdom, and themſelves.

† Ibid. The King willeth that all Buſineſs remain in ſuſpence till his was diſpatch'd.

And † further ſaid, that ſince the buſineſs required ſpeedy diſpatch, the King would that all manner of Petitions, and other particular Buſineſs might remain in ſuſpence, until this had a good Iſſue. And then, commanding the Commons to conſider and give good Counſel and Advice upon the Points aboveſaid, told them they might depart for that day, and come thither again on the morrow.

† Ib. n. 5. The Commons deſire a Committee of Lords to treat with them.

At which time ſome of the Commons, in the name of the reſt, went to the Lords, and prayed they might have ſome Biſhops, Earls and Barons, with whom they might treat and confer, for the better iſſue of the Matter enjoin'd them; and deſired that the Biſhops of London, Wincheſter, and Bath and Wells, the Earls of Arundel, Marche and Saliſbury, and the Lords Guy Brian and Henry le Scrope might come; and it was agreed they ſhould go to the Commons, and treat with them in the Chamberlain's Chamber: And there deliberation between the Great Men and Commons being had until Tueſday the Eve of St. Andrew, the King, Prince, Prelates, Great Men and Commons then being all in the White Chamber, the Commons granted the King an Aid for the Wars againſt his Enemies, and deliver'd a Schedule thereof to the King, which was read, and begins thus: The Lords and Commons of England have granted to the King in this preſent Parliament a Fifteenth, &c. The effect of the Grant was, two Fifteenths to be levied in two Years, according to the antient manner, to be paid at the Feaſts of the Purification and Pentecoſt: If the War ended the firſt Year, the ſecond Fifteenth not to be paid as yet. Alſo ſix Pence upon every Pound value of Merchandize going out of the Kingdom, except upon Wools, Leather, Wool-fells and Wine, &c. and of every Tun of Wine, two Shillings for two Years, upon the ſame Condition. Likewiſe the Subſidy of Wool to be received after Michaelmas next coming, without condition for the firſt Year, and under the ſame condition for the ſecond. Theſe were granted on condition that no other Charge or Impoſition might be laid upon the People of England

I ſhall conclude this Year with an Account of ſome Eccleſiaſtical Affairs abroad. [1] In the beginning of January, Pope Gregory had ſent his Letters to the Kings of England and France, to deſire them to conſider how much their late Wars and mutual Diſcords hinder'd the Recovery of the Holy Land, and what great advantage it gave their common Enemies, the Infidels, over the Chriſtians, which might bring grievous Troubles, and an irreparable Loſs upon all Chriſtian Kings, their Kingdoms and People: Wherefore He (the Pope) not being able any longer to bear theſe Wars and Diſcords, and conſidering how frequently his Predeceſſors had by their Cardinal Legates uſed their utmoſt endeavours to promote Peace, if it could not be now brought about according to his deſires, He did not intend any longer to delay, but forthwith to proceed, without any favour, againſt that Party (of the two) that ſhould appear to be the Occaſion thereof, and all their Favourers, Counſellors and Aſſiſtants whatſoever, by Eccleſiaſtical Cenſures and other Remedies. This was dated at Avignon 3 Non. Jan. An. Pontif. 2.

The Pope ſends Letters to the 2 Kings to make Peace and join againſt the common Enemies of Chriſtendom.

from the original. R.

But the Rancour of theſe Princes Minds at that time, and the difficulty of adjuſting Affairs to both their Satisfactions, were too great and inſuperable then to admit of any Agreement between them; and tho the Pope had ſent two Cardinal Legates, who ſpared no pains in this Affair, during the time of the Duke of Lancaſter's march thro France, and all things tending to a deſperate War; yet recalling them, He again ſent two other Legates to try what they could do. Theſe pious Prelates took much pains in riding to and fro, between the French King and his Brethren on the one part, and the Duke of Lancaſter on the other, but all to no purpoſe; for the Duke marched on thro the midſt of France (as you have already heard) without taking any great notice of their Admonitions; nor were they much more hearken'd to on the other Side: And indeed it ſeem'd wholly impracticable to propoſe any terms of Peace, that could ſeem equal to both Parties, where one expected a Reſtitution of all that had been violently taken from Him, and the other was reſolved to part with nothing He could keep.

He alſo ſends two Cardinal Legates about the ſame Affair, but to no purpoſe.

As [2] for Church Affairs tranſacted in England, they were not many, only King Edward ~~now~~ ſent Ambaſſadors to the Pope, to deſire Him for the future to deſiſt from making Proviſions or Reſervations of Benefices in his Court, and that the Clergy might enjoy their antient manner of electing Biſhops; and that being duly elected, they might be confirm'd by their own Metropolitans: for the Parliament had not long before enacted, that all Churches ſhould enjoy free Elections, and that the King ſhould not write Letters to the Pope againſt the Perſons ſo elected, but ſhould rather promote their Confirmation. But this Statute had no great effect.

A ſtrange Frenzy that happen'd this Year in ſeveral Countries.

This Year there happen'd in [a] Italy and France, but eſpecially in the Low-Countries, a certain Maniack Paſſion or Frenzy, unknown to former Ages: for thoſe who were tormented therewith (which for the moſt part were the ordinary ſort of People) ſtript themſelves ſtark-naked, put Garlands or Flowers on their Heads, and taking one another by the Hands, ran about the Streets, and into the Churches, dancing, ſinging, and turning round with ſuch vehemence, that they would often fall down to the Ground quite out of breath. This Agitation made them ſwell ſo prodigiouſly, that within an hour's time they would burſt, unleſs ſomebody took care to bind their Bellies about with ſtrong Swathing-bands. Thoſe who looked on them too earneſtly, were often tainted with the ſame Malady. This was thought to have come by ſome Diabolical Operation, and that Exorciſms did much prevail againſt it. The Vulgar call'd it St. John's Dance.

[b] Froiſ. c.318.

This Year begins with nothing but freſh Loſſes the Engliſh ſuſtain'd in France; for the Duke of Lancaſter being it ſeems unable to take the Field, the [b] French King was before-hand with him; and tho He did not think it convenient then to fall upon the Duke, ſince a Treaty for a Truce was now by the Pope's Mediation ſet on foot between them, yet preſently after Eaſter the Duke of Anjou being at Perigueux, raiſed a great Army conſiſting of fifteen thouſand Foot-men, beſides a conſiderable number of Genoueſe Croſs-bows, and moſt part of the Barons and Knights of Bretagne, Poictou, Anjou and Touraine; with whom the Conſtable of France join'd, and ſeveral Lords of Lower Gaſcoigne, as the Lord John of Armagnac, the Lords of Albret and Perigort, with other Barons and Noblemen of Auvergne and Limoſin. With this great Army the Duke of Anjou marched towards the higher Gaſcoigne, which then ſtood out, and would not acknowledg either the Kings of France or England for their Sovereigns; and firſt He beſieg'd Mont de Marſan, which having took, he proceeded to St. Silvier, whereof an Abbot was Lord; who, tho the Town was ſtrong, yet doubting he might loſe it by Force, fell to treat with the Duke, and remonſtrated to Him, that his Town and Caſtle being but a ſmall matter, might without any prejudice ſtand Neuter; but if the reſt of the Lords of Gaſcoigne ſhould be reduced by the Duke, he would alſo then yield to him, and do as they did. To this the Duke agreed, receiving of the Abbot Hoſtages for his true performance, and ſo drew off from thence toward the Town of Lourde in Bigorre, to which he laid Siege, and then ſummon'd the Gariſon to yield; but the Governor of the Place utterly refus'd it, and boldly ſaid, that ſince the Earl of Foix had deliver'd it to his care, he was reſolved by no means to reſign it up into the hands of any other Perſon living. With which Anſwer the Conſtable and the Duke of Anjou were ſo nettl'd, that they commanded a General Aſſault to be made; ſo that at laſt the Place was carried by Force, and the Captain and moſt of his men ſlain, and the Town given up to the Plunder of the Soldiers. And then paſſing thro the Lands belonging to Chaſtel-bon and Chaſtel-neuf, which they ſpoil'd and pillag'd, they marched on towards Bearn, and enter'd the Lands of the Lord of Leſcut, from whence whence they marched till they came before the ſtrong Town of Sauc, which alſo held of the Count of Foix; but this was not eaſily to be won, beſides it had within a valiant Governor named Sir William de Ponts.

The Duke of Anjou marches into the higher Gaſcoigne.

[2] When the Earl of Foix heard the French-men had conquer'd ſo much of his Lands, which he muſt have held either of the King of France or the King of England (tho indeed he would have yielded Obedience to neither) he ſent for the Viſcount of Chaſtelbon, the Lords of Marſan, Chaſtel-neuf and Leſcut, with the Abbot of St. Silvier, to conſult what was to be done in this dangerous Conjuncture, who when they all met, agreed to ſend for Letters of Safe-Conduct for them, which having obtain'd, they went immediately to the Duke of Anjou, who ſtill lay before Sauc, where at laſt they came to this Concluſion with him, that the Earl with the reſt ſhould enjoy a Truce for themſelves and their Territories, till the middle of Auguſt next enſuing, by which time there were to be very numerous Forces before the Town of Monſac, both of the French and Engliſh; and then if the Engliſh Army could keep the Field, all the Lords would hold their Lands of the King of England; but if the French Army ſhould become Maſters of it, either by Battel, or non-appearance of the Enemy, then they would hold their Lands of the King of France for ever. For the faithful performance of which Agreement the Earl of Foix and other Lords gave ſufficient Hoſtages to the Duke of Anjou, who then return'd to Perigueux, but would not for all that diſband his Army.

[2] Id. ib. The E. of Foix conſults with the Barons of that County, who agree to a Truce with the Duke.

[3] In the mean while the Duke of Lancaſter's Forces not being in a condition either to march or fight, or elſe the Duke of Anjou had found work for them other ways (as you have already heard) the Pope laid hold on this opportunity to propoſe a Truce between the two Kings, which at laſt was fully agreed upon to be faithfully obſerved by them, their Vaſſals and Aſſiſtants, from the tenth day of April, until the laſt of Auguſt; the two Dukes further engaging to be preſent on the Marches of Picardy about the beginning of September, in order to prolong the ſaid Truce; the Duke of Lancaſter to be at Calais, and the Duke of Anjou at St. Omers. The Truce being thus agreed to and confirm'd, the Duke of Lancaſter, with the Duke of Bretagne, the Earls of Warwick, Suffolk and Stafford, and divers other Lords and Knights both of England and Gaſcoigne; went on board at Bourdeaux about the beginning of July, and ſet ſail for England, where they ſafely arrived a few days after.

[3] Id. ibid. The D. of Lancaſter*'s Forces not being in a condition to fight, the Pope mediates a Truce between the two Kings.*

The Dukes of Lancaſter and Bretagne, &c. return to England.

But the Engliſh Intereſt ſuffer'd greatly by this Truce; [4] for whilſt it was tranſacting, and not quite finiſhed, Sir John Cornwal, Governor of Becherel, who had kept that Fortreſs a full Year againſt the French that beſieged it, finding that no care was taken for his Relief, and that their Victuals were almoſt ſpent, He and the Gariſon reſolv'd to capitulate with their Enemies before it was too late; upon which the Lords of Bretagne and Normandy, who carried on the Siege, came (by the French King's conſent) to this Agreement with the Beſieged, That if the Duke of Bretagne, or ſome other Nobleman from England, did not appear with Forces ſtrong enough to keep the Field, between that and the Feaſt of All Saints next coming, they would then ſurrender the Place, but their Lives and Goods were to be ſafe; the the Reſult of which was, that none appearing there for the Engliſh by the time limited and prefix'd, the Commanders within the Caſtle deliver'd it up to the French, and ſo return'd for England.

[4] Id. ib.

The D. of Anjou marches into Gaſcoigne, and forces the Earl of Foix and the other Lords to ſubmit.

And [4] this was not the only ill effect of the late Truce with the French, who did not think they were obliged to obſerve it, when it was for their advantage to break it; for when the middle of Auguſt drew near, which was the time limited for the Deciſion of the Sovereignty of the Higher Gaſcoigne, to be made before Monſac, the Duke of Anjou drew down thither a great Army, and with his men kept the Field before the Place ſix days together, all which time no Army appeared from King Edward, becauſe the Engliſh thought, that by reaſon of the Truce lately agreed on between the Dukes of Anjou and Lancaſter (which was to continue to the laſt of Auguſt) the Deſign of Monſac was to be given over; but the Duke of Anjou and his Council were it ſeems of another mind, and reſolved to take all Advantages they could, without troubling their heads with the nice Diſtinctions of Honour, Faith or Juſtice. So when that Duke ſaw the Feaſt of our Lady's Aſſumption was paſt, without the appearance of any Army on the King of England's behalf, he ſent to the Earl of Foix, the Viſcount of Chaſtel-bon, with the other Lords of higher Gaſcoigne, to let them know, that if they did not now ſtand to their late Agreement, he would forthwith put all their Hoſtages to death, and after that enter their Lands with ſuch a Power as ſhould oblige them to ſubmit whether they would or not. Hereupon, ſeeing the Engliſh had taken no care of them, they provided for themſelves, and freely yielded themſelves and their Lands to the Obedience and Sovereignty of the French King, and the Inhabitants of Monſac did immediately open their Gates, and receive the French without any diſturbance. The Duke having ſtaid here ſome days to refreſh his men, and the Month of Auguſt being paſt, without hearing any thing of the Duke of Lancaſter's coming over to renew the Truce, which was now expired, he reſolved to begin the War again on the other ſide of Gaſcoigne, and thereupon marched with his Army before la Reole, which after three days Siege was ſurrender'd to him, the Inhabitants returning to the Obedience of the French King. After that the Duke took in Langon, St. Macare, Condouſe, and ſeveral other Towns and Caſtles to the number of forty in all, the laſt being the ſtrong Town of Auberoche in Perigort; in all which he placed good Gariſons. And thus in a ſhort time all Gaſcoigne and Guienne, except Baionne and Bourdeaux, with ſome ſmall Territories about them, were either conquer'd or revolted from the Engliſh. The Duke of Anjou and the Conſtable being ſent for by the French King, gave leave to their men to go whither they would, and they themſelves returned to Paris.

The People of Monſac open their Gates to the D. of Anjou.

The D. of Anjou renews the War on the other ſide of Gaſcoigne, and takes la Reole, &c.

[5] Id. ibid.

All [5] the Succeſs I can find the Engliſh had this Year, was, that Sir Hugh de Chaſtillon, Maſter of the Croſs-bows of France, and Governor of Abbeville, marching out one morning with three hundred Lances; and having Valeran, the young Earl of St. Paul, in his company, rode forth toward Ardres to ſee if he could meet, and take any Party of the Engliſh that might be out for Plunder or Forage; and hearing that the Lord Comegines Governor of that Town, was then abroad with a Party (tho their number was not known) the French

Anno Dom. 1374.

French reſolved to lay an Ambuſh for the Engliſh of three hundred Lances, hoping to draw them into it: and the Earl of St. Paul was order'd with a hundred Horſe to find out the Enemy, and entice them to that Place. The Engliſh likewiſe had the ſame deſign in their heads; for Sir John Harleſton, Captain of Guiſnes, was ſent forth before the reſt to ſee if he could find out the French, and lighting luckily upon the young Earl of St. Paul and his men, they immediately perſu'd the Engliſh, who fled before them till they came to a Hedg, behind which the Lord Comegines with his Archers were drawn up, who received the French ſo warmly with their Arrows, being aſſaulted alſo at the ſame time in the Rear by Sir John Harleſton, they were all either kill'd or taken Priſoners, tho this muſt be ſaid, that they behaved themſelves very gallantly. Amongſt theſe were the Earls of St. Paul, the Lords of Ponts and Clarty, beſides divers other Knights and Perſons of Quality. Immediately after this Defeat Sir Hugh de Chaſtillon came to the Place with his three hundred Lances, but finding the buſineſs over, and fearing the like Miſsfortune might beſal him, he wheel'd off without ſtriking a ſtroke; but the Earl of St. Paul himſelf being redeem'd by the Lord Comegines, was carried over into England, and preſented to King Edward, where he continued for a long time Priſoner, until in the beginning of the next Reign he fell in love with, and married the Half-Siſter of King Richard the Second; yet this could not ingage him to be a Friend to the Engliſh Intereſt, as you will find hereafter.

The E. of St. Paul going out to entice the Engliſh into an Ambuſh, is himſelf taken Priſoner with his men.

And is ſent over into England.

When [1] the Duke of Anjou and the Conſtable were return'd (as we have already ſaid) to Paris, the beginning of Winter, they there found the Arch-Biſhop of Ravenna, and the Biſhop of Carpentras, who had been long with the King, making inſtant and continued Application to Him on the Pope's behalf, as other Legates at the ſame time did with King Edward for the ſame purpoſe; wherefore according to the former Agreement between the Dukes of Anjou and Lancaſter, both the Kings were now again obliged to enter into a Negotiation, thereby (if poſſible) to accommodate all Differences betwen them in order to a final Peace.

[1] Id. c. 320.

A Negotiation for a Peace is again ſet on foot by the Pope's Legates.

But tho [2] Froiſſart, as well as moſt other French Hiſtorians (except Mezeray in his Chronological Abridgment) relate this Tranſaction under this preſent Year, and conſequently the Truce that was afterwards made to have begun from about Autumn this Year, and to have ended in May following, yet it is certainly a Miſtake in thoſe Authors; for all our Hiſtorians, as well printed as in Manuſcript, together with the [3] Records of this Treaty, agree that the * Commiſſion iſſued out by both Kings to their Plenipotentiaries, does not bear date till the Spring or Summer following, and conſequently their going over could not be until after that time: Not but that the Pope's Legates being the Mediators might this Winter prevail with the Kings of France and England to ſend their Commiſſioners to Bruges the Summer following, as you will find they did; and there might alſo be a Ceſſation of Arms during this Winter and Spring following, in all Places except in Bretagne, whither (as [4] Froiſſart relates) the Lords de Cliſſon and de la Valle marched with their Forces to fight that Duke, becauſe this ſhort Truce did not extend to that Dutchy; therefore I ſhall defer the further Relation of that Tranſaction until the enſuing Year.

Little done in England after the Duke of Lancaſter's Return.

England in the mean time affords little worth our noting; for the Tax given the laſt Parliament being now all ſpent in the Duke of Lancaſter's late fruitleſs Expedition, the Burden of it lay ſtill ſo heavy upon the Nation, that it was not thought fit this Year to call a new Parliament for the giving of any more; nor do I find the Duke of Lancaſter did any thing conſiderable after his Return into England.

Alice Pierce taken into favour, and made the King's Miſtreſs, with her Cavalcade thro London.

that [illegible] she had been [illegible] [illegible] ever since he [illegible] [illegible] hears, by a grant he hearing [illegible] by which he [illegible] been

However, notwithſtanding the publick Misfortunes there was as much outward Jollity and Magnificence as ever was known before; for this Summer a certain Gentlewoman of no great Quality, called by our Hiſtorians Alice Perreys or Peirce, did by her Beauty and other Artifices ſo much prevail upon the aged King, as to be his Miſtriſs; and having lately given her the affected [1] Title of Lady of the Sun, She, being richly attir'd, rode alone in a Chariot from the Tower of London thro Cheapſide, accompany'd with many Lords, Knights and Ladies, every Lady leading a Lord or a Knight by his Horſe's Bridle, till they came into Weſt-Smithfield, where began a ſolemn Juſting or Tourneament between divers of our young Engliſh Noblemen. But we ſhall hear more of this Lady, and her intermedling in publick Affairs, before the end of this Reign; therefore we will now come to ſomewhat more ſerious.

The King iſſues a Commiſſion of Enquiry into the Value of Eccleſiaſtical Benefices held by Strangers.

Which is printed at large in Fox's Acts and Monuments, &c. p. 560. 1 Edit.

This Year affords ſome Eccleſiaſtical Matters of moment. The King being alarm'd afreſh by the Complaints of his Subjects againſt the Reſervations and Proviſions of Benefices practis'd by the Pope; and of which tho He had the laſt Year complain'd by his Ambaſſadors, as you have already heard, yet could He obtain no Remedy; therefore to prevent this for the future, his Majeſty now iſſued forth a Commiſſion of Enquiry directed to all the Biſhops of England, commanding them to return an exact Survey of all Benefices and Dignities Eccleſiaſtical throughout his Dominions, which were then in the hands of Italians, French-men and other Aliens, with a true valuation of the ſame; as alſo to know the Names of all and ſingular of thoſe, whether Engliſh or Strangers, who had the Poſſeſſion or Diſpoſal of any ſuch Benefices, or the Profits of them, and whether they were reſident upon them; and to return a true Certificate of the ſame into his Court of Chancery under their reſpective Seals, before the Feaſt of our Lord's Aſcenſion next coming. This was dated at Weſtminſter the ſixteenth of April in the forty eighth Year of his Reign.

Upon the Commiſſioners Return the King ſends certain Envoys to treat with the Pope's Legates about it.

By [2] virtue of this Writ or Commiſſion, Certificates were accordingly ſent up into the Chancery out of every Dioceſs in England, of all ſuch ſpiritual Livings as were then in the Poſſeſſion either of Priors Aliens, or of other Strangers, whereof the number is ſaid to have been ſo great, that it took up many Sheets of Paper. Wherefore it ſeemed high time for the King to ſeek a Remedy in that caſe, either by Treaty with the Pope, or otherwiſe; conſidering what a vaſt proportion of the Revenues of his Realm, was by this means yearly convey'd out of it, being either imploy'd for the Relief of his Enemies, or at leaſt of ſuch, who were neither his Subjects, nor true to his Intereſt. Shortly [3] after the Return of the ſaid Certificates, the King ſent John Biſhop of Bangor, Mr. John Wickliff Reader of the Divinity-Lecture at Oxford, Mr. John Guttern Dean of Segovia, with divers other Civilians, as his Envoys, to treat with the Pope's Legates beyond Sea, and to make a full Relation to him of all the matters that that were to be tranſacted at the ſaid Meeting; to the end that all thoſe things which might tend to the Honour of Holy Church, and the Advancement of his Crown, might by the Aſſiſtance of God, and the Wiſdom of the Apoſtolick See, be accompliſh'd and brought to good effect. Theſe [1] Commiſſioners were met at Bruges about the beginning of Auguſt by the Pope's Nuncios, viz. Bernard alias Benedict Biſhop of Pampelone, Rodulph Biſhop of Senigaglia, and Giles Sancho Provoſt of the Church of Valenza; who were likewiſe commiſſion'd to treat concerning the Liberties of the Church of England, and of the Prelates and other Eccleſiaſtical Perſons of the ſaid Realm: [2] But the Treaty about this Affair was continued at ſeveral times for near two Years; and at laſt it was concluded, that for the future the Pope ſhould deſiſt from making uſe of any Reſervations of Benefices, and that the King ſhould no more confer them by his Writ of Quare impedit. But as to the Elections of Biſhops, concerning which Ambaſſadors had been ſent to the Court of Rome the Year before, there was nothing mention'd in this Treaty; the Reaſon whereof was aſcribed to the politick dealing of ſome, who knew they could more eaſily attain to Eccleſiaſtical Dignities, which they aim'd at, by the ſavour of the Court of Rome, than by due regular Elections; that is, rather by Mony and Intereſt, than by any true Worth and Merit of their own.

[2] T. W. The Concluſion of this Treaty between the Pope and the King.

This Year alſo [3] William Wittleſey Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury departing this Life on the fifth of July, the Monks of Chriſt Church preſently after his Deceaſe elected for Arch-Biſhop Cardinal Eaſton, who tho an Engliſh-man by Birth, yet having lived all his time in the Pope's Court, and become a perfect Italian, their Choice was ſo highly diſpleaſing to the King, that He threaten'd to baniſh them out of the Kingdom for it. Whereupon the Pope to appeaſe Him, and make Him reconcil'd to the Monks, declared their Election void; and then by way of Proviſion beſtow'd the Arch-Biſhoprick on Simon Tibalds, alias de Sudbury, Biſhop of London, being a Perſon of great Wiſdom and Eloquence; yet theſe Endowments could not hinder his being murder'd by the Rabble under the Leading of Wat Tyler and Jack Straw, as you will find in the beginning of the next Reign.

So [4] ſoon as the Seaſon would permit this Year, the Campagne was begun on the French ſide (as they had done the laſt) with the Siege of St. Saviour le Vicount in Contantine, and that by the ſame Norman Lords that had before beſieged Becherel; ſo that when the Gariſon found themſelves hard put to it by their Engines, and that they were cloſely beſieged both by Sea and Land, fearing that they ſhould not be able long to hold out, they enter'd into a Treaty with the French, and in ſhort obtain'd a Truce to endure till ~~Eaſter~~ next enſuing, on condition that unleſs within that term the French ſhould be fought with, and the Siege raiſed, they ſhould then yield up the Fort, but with the Safety of their Lives and Goods: So the French Army lay ſtill near the Place, but committed nothing of Hoſtility all that time.

granted; and [6] constituting him his Lieutenant General in Bretagne, he join'd his Son Edmund Earl of Cambridg in Commiſſion with him. Then a powerful Fleet being alſo got ready, the Duke and the Earl his Brother-in-law, attended by the Earls of Warwick, Stafford, and divers Barons of note, having had publick Prayers made for their good Succeſs, went on Shipboard at Southampton in the beginning of the Spring, and there found three thouſand Archers and two thouſand Men at Arms ready to go along with him. With theſe Forces the Duke arrived ſafe at the Port of St. Matthew du Fine Poterne in Bretagne, where he landed, and forthwith began to aſſault the Caſtle, which ſtood without the Town, not very well fortified at that time either with Men or Ammunition; ſo that the Engliſh ſoon carried it by force, and put every Man of the Gariſon to the Sword: but thoſe within the Town being warn'd by this ſevere Example, preſently open'd the Gates, and received the Duke. From hence the Engliſh marched to St. Paul de Leon, which, tho it was ſtrongly fortified, was taken by Storm, and plunder'd, and the French Gariſon likewiſe put to the Sword; and from thence they paſſed on, taking Towns and Caſtles, till they came to St. Brieux de Vaulx, which was well furniſhed with all things neceſſary; for the Lords Cliſſon and Beaumanoir, the Viſcount of Rohan, and other Lords of Bretagne, had been there but a little before, and recruited the Place; yet the Duke reſolved to take it, either by Siege or Aſſault.

They land in Bretagne, and take ſeveral Towns and Caſtles.

The Viſcount of Rohan and the Lord de Cliſſon beſiege Sir John Devereux in the New Fort.

In [1] the mean while the Viſcount of Rohan and the Lord of Beaumanoir, who lay not far off, obſerving the Duke's Motions, heard that Sir John Devereux being near Quimperlay, made great Devaſtations, and had newly repair'd and fortified a ſmall Place, which he called New Fort, where he kept a Gariſon to the terror of the whole Country; ſo that the Inhabitants of the Town laſt mention'd durſt ſcarce ſtir out of their Gates for fear of being taken. Upon this the Noblemen laſt mention'd, ſent to the Lord de Cliſſon, who was then at Lambale, about five Leagues from St. Brieux, to deſire him to join his Forces with theirs, to take in that Place that gave them ſo much diſturbance, which he immediately put in execution; ſo that the New Fort being cloſely beſieged by them, was very near being taken; which the Duke of Bretagne hearing of, and not finding the Place he beſieged ſo eaſy to be gained, he immediatly marched away to the relief of the New Fort, which being juſt ready to be taken by a Mine, the Lord de Cliſſon upon the News of the Duke's approach preſently marched off to Quimperlay with all his Forces.

Till he is reliev'd by the D. of Bretagne.

He then beſieges thoſe Noblemen in Quimperlay.

The [2] Duke having thus reſcu'd Sir John Devereux, preſently marched forward, and laid Siege to the Place laſt mention'd, which was carried on with ſo much vigour and reſolution, that the Lord de Cliſſon and the reſt of the Noblemen with him, finding no Succour like to come from France, and not having reaſon to expect much Mercy from the Duke, if the Place was taken by Storm, fell to treat with him, and offer'd to ſurrender the Place, and themſelves, provided they might be put to a moderate Ranſom for their Liberties: but the Duke thinking it below him to capitulate with his own Subjects, refuſ'd the Offer, and would have them abſolutely ſubmit to his Mercy; but they not accepting of that, all they could obtain of him, was, a Truce for eight days, during which time, if not relieved, they were to ſurrender;

der; but before the time was expired, there happen'd an Affair that ſaved the Place, and all thoſe that were in it, and ſhews us how fatal a thing it is in War not to lay hold on the preſent opportunity; [1] for a few days after two Engliſh Knights were ſent thither from the Duke of Lancaſter, then at Bruges, enjoining the Duke of Bretagne, and all the Engliſh Commanders, in the King of England's Name, to forbear all further Acts of Hoſtility; foraſmuch as there was a Truce then concluded between the Kings of England and France, and all their Friends and Allies: authentick Copies of which Articles were brought into the Engliſh Camp by thoſe Knights abovemention'd.

But for the better underſtanding of this Tranſaction, we muſt look a little back to the beginning of this ~~Summer~~ Spring, [2] when the Kings of England and France (by the Mediation of the Pope's Legates, the Arch-Biſhop of Ravenna and the Biſhop of Carpentras) appointed certain Commiſſioners under their Great Seals, to treat of a final Peace, as had been agreed the laſt Year. Thoſe for King Edward were, John Duke of Lancaſter, William Mountagu Earl of Saliſbury, Simon Sudbury then Biſhop of London, the Lord John Cobham of Kent, with divers other Lords, Knights and Civilians. The [3] Commiſſioners on the French ſide were the Dukes of Anjou and Burgundy, the Earl of Salebruce, and the Biſhops of Amiens and Bayeux, with divers others needleſs to be here recited.

[4] Then in order to this Treaty, the Duke of Anjou came to St. Omers in great State, where he ſtaid ſome time, until the Arrival of the Duke of Lancaſter, and the reſt of the Commiſſioners, who came to Bruges for the ſame purpoſe. In the mean while, the Duke of Anjou ſent for his Couſin the Lord Guy of Blois to come to him, and aſſiſt him with his Advice; and the Conſtable of France and the Lord de Cliſſon were order'd to lie on the Borders between France and Flanders, with ſufficient Forces to obſerve the Motions of the Earl of that Province, of whom they were jealous leſt he ſhould do ſomething to the prejudice of the French Intereſt, and that might diſturb the Treaty; for he being a faſt Friend to the Duke of Bretagne his Couſin, who was like to be injur'd by it, would not come to Bruges, notwithſtanding all the Commiſſioners on either ſide could remonſtrate to him.

But it is time to return to the Treaty it ſelf, in which the French now proved as much too hard for the Engliſh, as they had been lately in War: for the Demands of both Princes being very high, and not like to be abated on either ſide, and the Duke of Bretagne's Concerns being alſo not eaſily accommodated, according to his own and the King his Father-in-law's Deſires, all that could be then done was, to patch up a temporary Truce for ſomewhat more than a Year, being to begin on the twenty ſeventh of June, and was to end on the firſt of July 1376. the Articles of which were to this effect, as follows.

Ibid.

There were beſides theſe certain Mutations, Declarations and Modifications made by way of Supplement in reference to this Truce, by the Pope's Nuncios of the ſame Date; as namely,

1. That Henry King of Caſtile (~~the Baſtard~~) and the Lands He held, ſhould be compriſed in the ſaid Truce.
2. That the Duke of Bretagne ſhould in like manner be compriſed in it.
3. That War ſhould ceaſe there, and the King of England and Duke ſhould remove their Forces out of the Dukedom without delay, during the Truce, all except two hundred men to guard the Towns and Places the Duke held there.
4. The two Kings were alſo to ſend Commiſſioners to Bruges by the fifteenth of September next coming, to treat of a perfect Peace. ✗

The Reſidue of the Articles are of leſs moment, and therefore here omitted. Theſe were confirmed by John King of Caſtile and Leon, Duke of Lancaſter, with Proteſtation, that the Title of King of France given to King Charles Adverſary to his Father, nor the Title of King of Caſtile given to Henry his Adverſary, might in no wiſe prejudice either of them, or their Titles: and for the Obſervation of theſe Articles, the Earl of Lancaſter was ſworn on the behalf of King Edward, and the Duke of Burgundy for the King of France. This Treaty bears Date at Bruges, and was ſeal'd by the Pope's Nuncio's, the two Dukes, and the reſt of the Commiſſioners, on the twenty ſeventh of June 1375.

✗ There was likewise another Additional Article agreed to, which is not mentioned ~~[illegible]~~ in any of the Instruments ~~[illegible]~~ yet published viz. ~~[illegible]~~ whereas ~~money~~, that the Castle of St. Saveur above mentioned ~~which~~ was to be delivered into the hands of the Popes Legates, upon the payment * of 40000 franks by the People of the King of France, to those of the King of England and the s.d Fortress should remain in the hands of the s.d Legates untill a Peace be concluded, and then to be delivered to those to whom it shall be ordained by the s.d [illegible] but if no peace were concluded during the s.d Truce then that the s.d Place should be freely delivered to the King of France or his Deputies upon the payment of 40000 franks more on the first of June ensueing, which if not payd the Fortress was then to be rendered to the King of England or his Deputies [illegible] see this Articles at large Rot. Concerning

Anno Dom. 1375.

Concerning which Treaty, I muſt here further ſubjoin, That notwithſtanding it now proved very diſadvantageous to the Engliſh Intereſt, and that King Edward was at great Expences to maintain his Ambaſſadors there, yet it was continued, tho not without ſome Interruptions, for near two Years together, and [1] the Truce was again prolonged for another Year; during all which time the French King prepar'd himſelf for War, by providing Men, Arms, and all other Neceſſaries for that purpoſe, but the like Preparations were carried on very remiſly during the ſame time in England: But We ſhall now quit the Civil Affairs, and return again to the Military.

The Truce was again prolonged for another Year.

When the Duke of Bretagne had received the Notice concerning this Truce, he was much diſpleas'd at the making of it, as he had reaſon, ſince it was to the ruin of his Affairs. [2] So that all he could then do, was, to go to the Caſtle of Auray to his Dutcheſs, and taking her along with him, he went from thence to Calais, and ſo paſſed over into England with his Lady, as you will find hereafter.

The Duke of Bretagne goes to the Caſtle of Auray, and thence to Calais.

Nor was this the only thing in which the French were too hard for the Engliſh in this Treaty; for tho by an Additional Article in it, it was provided, That during the ſaid Truce both Kings and their Allies ſhould hold and enjoy all Places which they had in their Poſſeſſion at the Concluſion of it, and that from this Clauſe the Engliſh ſuppoſed that St. Saviour le Vicount ſhould be ſecur'd to them during that time;* yet the French, who were always good in picking holes in Treaties, reſolved, [3] That the Firſt Agreement concerning the Delivery of that Place ſhould be obſerved, which was to be ſurrendered, unleſs reſcued by Forces from England, by ~~ſuch a time~~: therefore the French King ſent thither above Six thouſand Men, who coming before the Caſtle, and none appearing on behalf of the Gariſon, either to raiſe the Siege, or keep the Field, ſo ſoon as the time appointed was expired, they renew'd their Summons to ſurrender; and then the Engliſh Gariſon and Officers, being commanded by Thomas Cathrington their Governour, were by him forced to give up the Place againſt their Wills; and ſo marching out with their Baggage, were convey'd ſafe to Carentan, from whence they not long after ſail'd for England. But tho during this King's Reign Cathrington eſcaped being queſtioned for ſo meanly ſurrendring ſo Conſiderable a Place; yet in the beginning of the next he was accuſed of Treaſon for this Action, and thereupon challenged to a ſingle Combat by Sir John Anneſly, by whom he was vanquiſhed, as you will find hereafter. But to return to the preſent Affairs: Beſides this Breach of the Truce made by the French in taking St. Saviour le Vicount, after this manner, certain Ships of England, which had lately carried over into Aquitain the Lord Thomas Felton, Seneſchal of Aquitain, and Sir William Elman Governour of Bayonne, whom they had landed at Bourdeaux, being now return'd thence to Le Baye in Bretagne, were boarded by ſome Gallies, and taken on the Tenth of Auguſt, tho the late Truce extended unto the Spaniards alſo, as appears by the Articles: but of theſe Infractions we ſhall find Complaint made in Parliament the Year following, by the Owners of the ſaid Veſſels.

A Relation of the ſevere Impriſonment, Redemption and Death of John Earl of Pembroke.

I muſt not here omit [a] the untimely Death of John Haſtings Earl of Pembroke, who having been taken Priſoner at Sea two Years ſince by the Spaniards, as you have already heard, and by them kept in a very ſevere Reſtraint, was ſo weary of it, that not being able then preſently to raiſe his Ranſom, he choſe rather to put himſelf into the hands of an Enemy of another Nation, and therefore ſent to the Conſtable de Gueſclin to beg his Aſſiſtance, and deſire that he would lay down his Ranſom for him, and take his Perſon for his Security: whereupon the Conſtable generouſly reſigning all the Lands that had been given him in Caſtile, and acquitting that King of divers great Sums that were due to him for his Service, he had the Earl's Perſon delivered up to him, and was for his Ranſom to pay no leſs than Twenty ſix thouſand Florins; which Sum certain Merchants of Flanders engaged on his behalf to pay at Bruges, upon the news of his Safe-delivery at Calais: but he never reached that Place, but whether poiſoned by the Spaniards before he left it (as was ſuſpected) or not, preſently after the Bargain of his Ranſom was made, he fell deſperatly ſick; and the Conſtable, fearing his Recovery, made haſt to have him convey'd from Paris to Calais in a Horſe-litter by eaſy Journeys; but before he reached that Place, he † expired by the way on the Sixteenth of April this Year; and his Body being brought over into England, was buried firſt in the Church of the Friars-Preachers at Hereford, and [b] afterwards was tranſlated to the Grey-Friars near New-Gate, now called Chriſt-Church in London. But I muſt here further obſerve, that as the Monkiſh Writers of this, as well as former Ages, never fail'd to impute the ill Succeſs of thoſe they did not love, to the Divine Vengeance, ſo they make the Defeat of this Nobleman at Sea, and his being taken Priſoner, to be the effect of the Wrath of St. Ethelreda, Patroneſs of the Church of Ely, for taking part againſt her in a Cauſe depending betwixt her Abby and that of St. Edmunds-Bury; and therefore they ſuppoſe that it was upon the Day dedicated to this Saint that he received his Overthrow. But certainly * Walſingham is miſtaken, in aſſigning his Death to be on the ſame Feſtival; whereas it appears by the Record above-cited in the Margin, to have happened on the Day already mention'd. But our Author rather attributes this Earl's ill Succeſs to his having led an Adulterous Life, as alſo becauſe he had in Parliament attempted an Infringement of the Church's Liberties, and perſuaded the King to lay heavier Taxes upon the Clergy than on the Layety, for the Support of his Wars. But I ſhall not lay ~~all~~ theſe Crimes to this Great Man's Charge, for the Reaſon already given. the King issued out

A Parliament ſummon'd.

Sir J. Knivet L. Chancellor ſets forth the cauſes of their Meeting.

This Year ~~begins with the~~ || Writs of Summons, dated the Eight and twentieth of Dec ~~September~~, for a Parliament to meet on the Twelfth of February: afterwards, before it met, by Writs dated the Twentieth of January, the King thought fit to prorogue it to the Monday after the Feaſt of St. George, † but it ſat not till the next day; and then the Prelates, Dukes, Earls, Barons, and other Great Men, and Commons, Juſtices, Serjeants of the Law, and others, aſſembled in the Painted Chamber before the King, where Sir John Knivet then L. Chancellor declared the Cauſes of holding this Parliament; which were theſe, viz.

The Firſt and Principal was, To Adviſe about the Good Government, and Peace of the Realm of England.

The Second was, For the Defence and Safety of the Kingdom, as well by Sea as by Land.

The Third was to take Order for the Maintenance of the War with France, and elſewhere; and how, and in what manner it might be done for the beſt Profit, quickeſt Diſpatch, and greateſt Honour of the King and Kingdom.

And then he told them expreſly, That what the King always had done, was by their good Counſel and Aſſiſtance, for which His Majeſty entirely thanked them, and deſired they would diligently adviſe about theſe Matters; the Prelates and Lords by themſelves, and the Commons by themſelves; and give in their Good Anſwers as ſoon as they well could.

[1] The Commons upon this went to their accuſtomed Place, the Chapter-Houſe of the Abby of Weſtminſter, and the Prelates and Lords went by themſelves; and there were aſſigned in Parliament the Biſhops of London, Norwich, Carliſle, and St. Davids, with the Earls of Marche, Warwick, Stafford and Suffolk, the Lords Piercy, Sir Guy de Brian, Sir Henry L'eſcrop, and Sir Richard Stafford, to go to the Commons, and aſſiſt them in treating and conferring upon the things before declared: and then they agreed upon the Grant of a Subſidy, which begins as followeth.

[1] Ib. n. 8.

The Lords and Commons conſult apart. Certain Biſhops and Peers appointed to go to the Commons to aſſiſt them.

“The [2] Lords and Commons aſſembled in Parliament, having conſideration of the very Great Charges and Expences the King hath, and muſt be at, for the maintaining of his Wars, and his Noble Eſtate, granted Him the Subſidy of Wool, Leather, and Wool-fells, as it was granted Him in the Parliament holden at Weſtminſter, in the Forty ſeventh Year of his Reign, from the Feaſt of St. Michael next coming, when the Subſidy then granted ended, to the end of Three Years: And the Commons humbly pray the King to excuſe them, that they have given Him no other Subſidy or Aid for his Wars, for that they were brought ſo low, and ſo diſabled by the Peſtilence, the Murrain among their Beaſts, and Deſtruction of their Grain and other Fruits by bad Weather, that they could not do more at preſent; but promiſed if any extraordinary Caſe ſhould happen, they would Aid Him to the utmoſt of their Power, as they had done before, beyond all the Commons of the World to their Liege Lord.

[2] Ib. n. 9.

They at laſt agree to continue the Subſidy on Wool, &c.

After [3] this, the Commons conſidering the great Miſchiefs upon the Land, ſhew'd unto the King and Lords of Parliament, That it would be for his Honour and Profit, and alſo that of the whole Realm, which is grieved in divers manners by many Adverſities, as well as by the Wars of France, Spain, Ireland, Guienne, Bretagne, and otherwhere; ſo that the Officers about the King without other Aſſiſtance, were not ſufficient for ſo great Buſineſs; wherefore they pray that the King's Council may be inforced or augmented with ſome Lords, Prelates and others, to the number of Ten or Twelve, who ſhould be continually near the King, ſo as no Great Buſineſs might paſs without the Advice and Aſſent of Six, or Four of them at leaſt, as the Caſe required.

The Commons petition the K. that more Lords and Prelates ſhould be added to his Council.

quired. [3] The which Requeſt the King, underſtanding it was Honourable and very Profitable to Him and the whole Kingdom, readily granted; provided always that the Chancellor, Treaſurer, and Privy-Seal, and all other the King's Officers might execute their Offices without the Preſence of any the ſaid Counſellors; which the King was to aſſign from time to time of ſuch as He pleaſed, who were to be ſworn to keep this Ordinance, and to do Right to every one according to their Power, without receiving any Reward for ſo doing:

[4] Ib. n. 11.

[4] And, That none of the King's Officers ſhould receive any Gifts, Fees or Rewards, other than their Salaries, Liveries, and Travelling Charges.

[5] Ib. n. 15.

The Commons ſet forth the late Miſmanagement of the King's Treaſure.

[5] The Commons then made Proteſtation, That they now were and always have been, and will be ready to Aid the King with their Bodies and Goods, to the utmoſt of their Power; yet they ſaid, that if the King had always had about Him Loyal Counſellors and Good Officers, He had been now rich in Treaſure, ſo that He ſhould not have needed ſo much to have charged his Subjects with Subſidies, Taillages or other ways, conſidering the great Sums of Gold which were brought into the Kingdom for the Ranſom of the Kings of France and Scotland, and other Priſoners. They alſo ſaid, It further ſeem'd to them, that for the particular Profit and Advantage of ſome private Perſons about the King, and their Confederates, the Realm was much impoveriſhed, and many of the Merchants undone; wherefore they thought it very profitable to the King and his whole Kingdom, to have all theſe things duly amended, ſo ſoon as might be.

And deſire that He would do Juſtice on ſuch Offenders.

And farther the Commons promiſed the King, that if He would do Juſtice and ſpeedy Execution upon ſuch as ſhould be found culpable, and proceed with them as Law and Reaſon required, they would undertake He ſhould be ſo rich as to be able to maintain his Wars, and ſupport his other Affairs for a long time, without any great Charge to the Commons. And they ſaid moreover, That in doing this, He would do a thing meritorious and well-pleaſing to God, and much for the Encouragement of them who were willing to Aid Him according to their Power: and then propounded three eſpecial Points to be enquired into and amended.

[6] Ib. n. 16.

Three Points deſired to be amended, 1. concerning the removal of the Staple from Calais.

Firſt, [6] Whereas the Staple of Wool, and other Staple Merchandiſes and Bullion, was lately Ordained in Parliament to be at Calais, and no where elſe, for the great Profit of the King and Kingdom, the Advantage and Amendment of the Town, for the Concourſe of Merchants, and their continual Reſidence there; the ſaid Staple, Bullion and Trade is removed from thence, and like to be loſt by the Procurement and Counſel of the ſaid particular Perſons about the King, and their Confederates, for their own Profit, to the great Damage and Prejudice of the King and his Realm, and Deſtruction of the Town of Calais.

2. Lending the King Mony on exceſſive Intereſt.

Secondly, [7] Whereas the King had need of divers Sums of Mony for his Wars and otherwiſe, ſome Perſons by Conſent and Contrivance of the ſaid particular Perſons about Him, made Agreement for divers Sums to the uſe of the King upon Uſury, taking more from Him for Intereſt than they bargained for, to the Deceit and grievous Damage of the King.

Thirdly, [3] Whereas the King was Debtor to divers People upon Record in great Sums, ſeveral had by Aſſent and Contrivance of the ſaid Perſons bargained with his Creditors for the Tenth, Twentieth, or Hundredth Penny, and procured the King to pay the whole Debt, in Deceit of the King and his Creditors, for the particular profit of themſelves and Confederates.

[3] Ibid.

3. Compounding the King's Debts at an under Rate, and then charging him with the whole Sum.

Upon theſe, or ſome of theſe Articles, ſeveral were impeached by the Commons; firſt [4] Richard Lyon, Merchant of London, and Farmer of the King's Subſidy and Cuſtoms; he put himſelf upon the King's Grace, and ſubmitted his Body, Lands and Goods to the King's Pleaſure: * whereupon he was adjudged to be impriſoned during the King's Pleaſure, to loſe the Franchiſe of the City, never to bear Office under the King, nor approach his Council or Court. All his Goods and Chattels were ſeized into the King's hands, and Inquiry was made in all the Ports concerning his Extortions, ſince his being Farmer of the Cuſtoms.

[4] Ib. n. 17.

* Ib. n. 19.

The [5] Lord Latimer was accuſed by the Impeachment of the Commons, upon the ſame Heads and Articles with him, and as Confederate with Lyon, who tho he ſeem'd to make a good and ſatisfactory Defence, yet by the Prelates and Lords in full Parliament [6] he was adjudged to be impriſon'd, and make Fine and Ranſom at the Will of the King; and further upon the Petition of the Commons, the King granted that he ſhould never have Office under Him, nor be of his Privy Council. However he was bailed by [7] Four Biſhops (the Archbiſhop of York being one) Three Earls, the Prior of St. John of Jeruſalem, and Twenty ſix Barons; with Promiſe, that during the Parliament he ſhould appear before the King and Lords, to anſwer further to the Articles of which he was accuſed.

[7] Ib. n. 29.

[8] William Ellys of Great Yarmouth was alſo accuſed, by the Charge of the Commons, as Deputy Farmer, to Richard Lyon, of the Subſidy of Six Pence in the Pound on all Merchandiſes granted to the King, of many Extortions in collecting them, and other evil Practices; and notwithſtanding his Anſwer, which might ſeem ſatisfactory and ſufficient to ſome, yet he was awarded to Priſon, and ordered to make Fine and Ranſom at the * King's Will, and to pay his Proſecutors ſeveral Sums of Mony for Injuries ſaid to be done to them.

[8] Ib. n. 31.

Will. Ellys accuſed of Extortion in collecting the late Subſidy.

* That is, according to the Judgment given in the Court of King's Bench.

[9] It is alſo there ſaid, that it diſpleaſed the King, that Women ſhould perſue and ſollicit Buſineſs in his Courts at Weſtminſter; and therefore He (upon the ſaid Common's Requeſt) forbad all Women (eſpecially Alice Perers) for the future to do it, upon pain of forfeiting whatever the ſaid Alice was worth, and to be baniſhed the Realm.

[9] Ib. n. 35.

Women are forbidden to meddle with any Buſineſs, &c.

During the Seſſion of this Parliament, † Edward Prince of Wales, the King's Edeſt Son, died on the Eighth of June, being Trinity Sunday: whereupon the Commons humbly pray'd the King, that for the great Comfort of the whole Kingdom, He would order the Noble Child or Youth, Richard of Bourdeaux, Son and Heir of Edward late Prince of Wales, to come into the Parliament, that the Lords and Commons might ſee and honour Him, as the true Heir apparent of the Realm; which Requeſt was granted: and at the ſame time, the Biſhops, Lord Temporal, and Commons applied to the King to make him Prince of Wales, which was done within a ſhort time after.

[1] Ib. n. 57. The Commons petition about Juſtices of the Peace.

[1] The Commons farther petition'd, That Juſtices of the Peace might be named in every County by the Lords and Knights of the ſaid County in Parliament, and ſworn before the King's Council, and not to be removed without Conſent of Parliament; and that they might be allowed Wages. The King's Anſwer was, They ſhould be named by Him and his continual Council; and as to Wages, He would conſider of it.

[2] Ib. n. 143. The Mayor,&c. of London petition againſt Strangers ſelling Goods by Retail.

[2] The Mayor, Aldermen, and Commons of London, ſhew'd unto the King how they were impoveriſhed and brought to nothing, by reaſon their Franchiſes granted and confirm'd by Him and his Noble Progenitors, were reſtrain'd, and in a great meaſure taken from them; and aſſign their chief Grievance to be, that any Stranger might have a Houſe and dwell in the City, be a Broker and buy and ſell any ſorts of Merchandiſes by Retail, and a Stranger ſell to Strangers, that they might again ſell the ſame Goods to Others, to the great raiſing the Price of Merchandiſes, and making them dear: whereas in time paſt no Strange Merchant uſed any of theſe Practices againſt the Franchiſes of the City, by which the Merchants of the City were much impoveriſhed, the Navy or Shipping much impaired, the private Tranſactions of the Nation diſcovered by thoſe Strangers to his Enemies, by Spies and others lodging in their Houſes: and then pray, it would pleaſe the King and his good Council, in Charity, to order in that Parliament, that Merchant Strangers ſhould be reſtrain'd in theſe Practices; and that the Mayor, Aldermen and Commons of the ſaid City, might enjoy their Franchiſes, notwithſtanding any Statute or Ordinance made to the contrary.

[3] Ibid. The King conſents to it.

[3] The King's Anſwer was, That upon Condition the City might be under good Government, to the Honour of Him and Profit of the Kingdom, then from thence forward no Stranger ſhould have a Houſe to be a Broker in, nor to ſell any Goods by Retail within the City or Suburbs, notwithſtanding any Statute or Ordinance to the contrary; Saving to the German Merchants of the Hans-Towns, their Franchiſes, granted and confirm'd to them by the King and his Progenitors. Then according to the purport and effect of this Anſwer, the Mayor, Aldermen and Citizens of London obtain'd the King's Letters Patents, dated the Fourth of November next following, of which I ſhall ſpeak more in another Place.

[4] Id. n. 164. The Commons complain of great Riots.

[4] Then the Commons petitioned the King, That whereas great Riots were committed in ſeveral Parts of the Nation by numbers of Armed Men, that therefore the Sheriffs might raiſe the Poſſe Comitatus or Power of the County to ſuppreſs them; and that the Sheriffs and Juſtices of the Peace might inform the King's Council of ſuch Rebels as refuſed to go with them.

[5] The Anſwer was, The King by the Advice of his Great Council would order Remedy, if need were; but in the mean time, let the Statutes concerning that matter be put in due Execution. Then this Parliament ended July the Sixth, in the Fiftieth Year of his Reign.

Theſe were the moſt remarkable Tranſactions in this buſy Parliament; and I have put down the Petitions of the Commons, that the Reader may ſee the Principal Grievances of that Time, and compare them with thoſe that have happen'd during the preſent Age.

Anno Dom. 1376.

The great Aſcendant that Alice Peirce had over the King.

I muſt not here omit to take notice of ſome things relating to this Parliament, which (tho not in our Records) are mention'd by * Walſingham and other Writers of that time, and do ſufficiently diſcover how far the King was then declin'd from that command of his Paſſions, which He had ſo well exerciſed in his younger Years. For Alice Peirce above-mention'd (whom our Authors call an impudent young Woman) was now grown ſo intimate with the King, as not only to be preſent in his Bed-Chamber, and there intermeddle with publick Affairs, but alſo to appear and ſit in the Courts of Judicature, both Civil and Eccleſiaſtical, and publickly defend thoſe Cauſes ſhe had undertaken to promote: and therefore for the great Scandal and Reproach it caſt upon the King and his Government in Foreign Countries, the Knights of Shires had particularly petitioned for her Removal from the King's Perſon; tho it ſeems this Petition had no great effect, for not long after the Diſſolution of this Parliament ſhe was again reſtored to the King's Favour, and to that degree, as to be revenged upon her Enemies: for ſhe procured Sir Peter de la Mare, a [1] Conſiderable Knight of Herefordſhire both for Prudence and Eloquence (but not Speaker of this Parliament, as Walſingham by a Miſtake relates) to be committed cloſe Priſoner to Nottingham Caſtle, where he lay till the beginning of the next Reign; and that for no other reaſon, but becauſe he had ſpoke too freely againſt this Alice in the late Parliament. *^

Notwithſtanding the laſt Parliament's Petition againſt her, ſhe is reſtored to the King's Favour, and Sir Peter de la Mare, who ſpoke againſt her, is committed cloſe Priſoner.

^ And likewise William of Wickham Bp. of Winchester late Chancellor being [illegible] with the Duke of Lancaster was not only forbid coming to Westminster during this session of Parliament but was also accused before the King and Council of converting the Kings treasure wch had come into his hands to his own use, for which and other accusations, he had the [illegible] [illegible] required him to answer the [illegible] accusations. 5. Rot. Claus: 51 E3: m. p.2. m.1. vid: Rot. Cal: pa. 172.

I ſhall now add ſomething more than is mention'd in our Records concerning the Death and Burial of Edward the Black Prince, whoſe Diſtemper originally was a Dropſy, yet it ended in a Burning Feaver, which took him off on the Eighth Day of June, in the Forty ſixth Year of his Age, to the great Loſs and Regret of the whole Nation, who deſired nothing more than that He might ſurvive his Father, and ſhew He could Govern as well as Obey. I need not ſay any more of this Worthy Prince, ſince his Character is ſufficiently ſet forth by his Great and Noble Atchievements, which You have ſo often met withal in this Hiſtory, ſo long as He was able to Act in Perſon either in Civil or Military Affairs: He left no other Iſſue Legitimate but his Son the Lord Richard, who was then about Ten Years of Age. But He, beſides his Father's Example, wanted his Precepts and Government to form his Mind to all thoſe Vertues his Father was Maſter of.

The Black Prince died of a Feaver.

As for the manner of his † Funeral, the Body of this Famous Warrier being Embalmed, lay in State, to be kept till Michaelmas following, that ſo it might be interr'd with the Greater Solemnity, in the Preſence of the Peers and Biſhops of the Kingdom; and accordingly at that time He was carry'd in a Stately Hearſe, drawn with 12 Horſes thro the City of London, and ſo went on till they came to Canterbury. He was buried with great Solemnity in that Cathedral, and, as He Himſelf had order'd in his Will, near the Shrine of Thomas Becket. Over his Grave was ſhortly after erected ‖ a Stately Monument of Grey Marble, with his Portraicture lying thereon of Copper gilt, which is preſerved to this Day. And King Charles of France, tho He was his Enemy, yet as a Kinſman, perform'd his Obſequies in a moſt Noble manner in the [2] Chappel of his Palace at Paris, the greater part of his Prelates and Peers being preſent. As for King Edward, He lay'd the Loſs of his Son ſo much to Heart, that being worn out

The Pope removes his Seat to Rome.

As for Eccleſiaſtical Affairs I find nothing worth noting, only this Year Pope Gregory XI. [1] hearing of the great Confuſions and Diſorders in Italy, (when He found He could not make a Peace between the Kings of France and England) removed his Seat from Avignon to Rome, to which Conſiderations were joined the Pious Exhortations of two reputed She-Saints, Bridget of Sweden, and Catherine of Siena: So * He left Avignon toward the middle of September, and after great dangers at Sea by Storms, &c. arrived at Rome in January following, where He was receiv'd with all the Pomp and Joy imaginable; and here the Court of Rome continued, until a freſh Schiſm in the Romiſh Church cauſed it to return to its former Seat at Avignon for divers Years enſuing.

A Parliament summon'd.

King Edward, ~~many~~ divers Months before the Expiration of the late Truce, having had notice of a Deſign forming againſt Him by the King of France to invade England, and that he had made a freſh Alliance with Caſtile and Scotland for that purpoſe; to prevent this, and to make all neceſſary Preparations for a War, He had on the firſt of December laſt paſt [2] iſſued out Writs for a Parliament to meet on the Quindene of St. Hilary, or Seven and twentieth of January next coming at Weſtminſter; but the King being then indiſpoſed, it was held by Commiſſion to Richard Prince of Wales, who was about Ten Years of Age, the Biſhop of St. Davids being Chancellor. [3] Upon the Day of their Meeting, after a Speech in the nature of a Sermon, upon this Text, * Ye ſuffer Fools gladly, ſeeing that Ye your ſelves are wiſe; He thus apply'd it, That tho they were wiſe, yet He deſired thoſe to hear him, who were not ſo. Then he ſaid, That as a Meſſenger who bringeth Joyful News is welcome, ſo ought he to be now, ſince he brought them Joyful News of the King's happy Recovery from a dangerous Sickneſs (for now the King was ſomewhat better, tho He afterwards relapſed) Then after many Praiſes and Commendations given to the King, and the Happineſs He enjoy'd, not only in having ſo many Sons, but alſo in ſeeing his Children's Children, the Biſhop turning his Diſcourſe to the Lords, did let them know the King's Great Value for them, ſince at their Requeſt He had created the Lord Richard Prince of Wales.

And [4] then addreſſing himſelf both to the Lords and Commons he ſet forth, that the chief Cauſe of their Summons was for the defence of the Realm, for that the King having, at the requeſt of the Pope, agreed to a Treaty of Peace, there was a Truce made for a time, till a Peace might be concluded; but this Truce his Adverſary of France had broken, and was now preparing for War, and, by the aſſiſtance of Spain, Scotland, and other Enemies, to deſtroy the King, Kingdom and Engliſh Language: Therefore to obviate this Deſign, and prevent the Malice of his Enemies, and to maintain the Peace of the Na-

Nation at home and abroad by their Counſel and Advice, as it was his chief Intention, ſo was it alſo to know how the Expence of the preſent War ſhould be provided for. But ſince it was not fit for a Biſhop to ſay any thing againſt the Pope, Sir Robert de Aſheton, Chamberlain to the King, was appointed to propound, how further Proviſion might be made againſt his Uſurpations, as ſhould by a Bill be ſhewed in this Parliament.

At the next Meeting of all the Eſtates in Parliamenr, [2] the Commons in the King's Name were directed to go to their accuſtom'd Place, the Chapter-Houſe of the Abby of Weſtminſter, there to treat and adviſe how a fitting Reſiſtance might be made againſt the Enemies of the Nation, for the Safety of the King, Kingdom, Navy and themſelves; and how Mony might be moſt ſpeedily raiſed to the leaſt Grievance of the People. Then the Prelates and Lords, after they had done treating about theſe Matters, agreed, that the Biſhops of Lincoln, Chicheſter, Hereford and Salisbury, the Earls of Arundel, Warwick, Salisbury and Stafford, the Lords Piercy, Roos, Fitz-Walter and Biſſet, ſhould go and confer with the Commons for their better direction and information.

The [3] Reſult of theſe Conſultations was, that to maintain the King's Wars, and the great Charges He would be at for them, and the neceſſary Defence of the Kingdom, the Lords and Commons granted Him four Pence by way of Poll from every Perſon of the Kingdom, Male and Female, above fourteen Years of Age, except mere Beggars; and moſt humbly prayed their Liege Lord, that He would pleaſe to excuſe them that they could grant Him no greater Subſidy, being moſt willing to have done it; but that they were ſo impoveriſh'd of late by great Loſſes at Sea, and otherwiſe, that they were not able at preſent to do more.

And [4] the Commons prayed the King, that He would pleaſe to name two Earls and two Barons for his Treaſurers, as well of this Subſidy, as of that the Clergy was yet to grant, and alſo of the late Subſidy of Wool, Pells and Leather granted the laſt Parliament; and that they might be ſworn in their preſence, that what was received by them, ſhould wholy be expended upon the Wars, and not otherwiſe; and that the High Treaſurer of England ſhould receive nothing, or any ways meddle therein.

But afterwards, [5] when they had conſidered what Sum the Wages of ſuch four Treaſurers would amount unto by the Year, the Commons departed from this Requeſt, and prayed that the High Treaſurer might be Receiver to the uſe of the War in manner accuſtom'd.

The [6] Commons in this Parliament further beſought the King, that the Charter lately granted (November the fourteenth, as above) in the Great Council, to the Mayor, Aldermen, and Commons of the City of London, upon the Article that no foreign Merchant ought to ſell to another ſtrange Merchant any Goods or Merchandize, to ſell again, in manner as in the ſaid Patent is more fully contained, might be renewed and granted, as well to other Cities and Burghs, as to them, with a Charter, or Clauſe of Confirmation; which, ſince it is not long, and is that by which none but Freemen have at this day a Right to keep Shops, or ſell Commodities by retail within the Liberties of the City, I ſhall here give you at large, tranſcribed from Dr. Brady's Copy, which is taken from the Parliament-Roll it ſelf, and is as follows.

> “EDward King of England, &c. to whom theſe preſent Letters ſhall come, greeting. Our Beloved and Faithful the Mayor, Aldermen, and the reſt of the Citizens of the City of London, by their Petition exhibited before Us and our Great Council, containing amongſt other things, that becauſe Strangers do freely ſell all ſorts of Merchandize whatſoever within the Liberty of the ſaid City, to be ſold again as the Citizens do; whereas the ſaid Strangers, according to the Liberty of the ſaid City antiently obtain'd, ought not, nor could ſo do; whereby as well the ſaid Citizens are much impoveriſh'd, and Goods and Merchandize become much dearer, &c. For relief of the Citizens, and common Profit of our People, under a grievous Forfeiture to Us, We do command, that they ſhall be reſtrain'd. And being favourably enclin'd to the ſaid Petition, We do further Will and Grant, that no Stranger within the Liberty of the City aforeſaid, ſhall ſell any Merchandize to a Stranger, or any ways preſume to do it, that they may be ſold again, until by the Noble and Great Men of our Kingdom it ſhall be duly debated in our next Parliament, whether our preſent Grant may for the future redound to the Diſprofit or common Profit of our People: Saving always to the Lords of our own Kingdom, and all others, that they might buy ſuch Merchandize of all men in groſs for their own uſe; and ſaving alſo the German Hanſe-Merchants the Liberties granted and confirm'd to them by Us and our Progenitors. In witneſs whereof We have cauſed to be made theſe Letters Patents. Witneſs our Self at Weſtminſter the fourth of November, in the Year of our Reign of England the fiftieth, of France ſeven and thirtieth.

The Anſwer to the Petition above, with which this Patent was delivered and preſented by the Commons, was no more than that the King will be farther inform'd. Which ſhews, that for ſome Reaſons He did not think fit then further to confirm it.

At [1] the ſame time the Commons, with the Mayor, Aldermen and Commonalty of the City of London petition'd the King, that for divers Miſchiefs that often happen'd in the ſaid City, by reaſon the Coroner was not puniſhable by the Mayor, Aldermen, and other Officers; that they might chuſe a Coroner of themſelves, and remove him when they pleas'd, as it was practis'd in divers Cities and Towns of the Land, they anſwering to the King in manner as appertain'd to the ſaid Office. The King's Anſwer was, The King will not depart from his antient Rights.

The [2] Commons further petition'd the King, that for many Cauſes, as well known to his Privy Council as to them, it would be profitable to the Kingdom, that all Foreigners were commanded out of it, during the Wars, unleſs they were Merchants and Artificers, that were not Adherents to his Enemies, but ſuch as their ſtay was advantageous to the Realm: And for that He was their Liege Lord, and had the Power of doing Juſtice in Right of his Crown, in all things Temporal within his Kingdom; and that they owe no Obedience of any thing Temporal but to Him as their King and Liege Lord, that He would pleaſe to order and command, that none of his Lieges be Farmers or Servants to any Foreigners that have Eſtates or Benefices in England, unleſs to ſuch as inhabit there, or ſuch as were in his Liegeance, and had ſpecial leave to live out of the Kingdom; and that He would pleaſe to command his ſage Council to add more to this matter, as might be needful for the Amendment and Profit of his Kingdom. Yet they his ſaid Commons make Proteſtation before God, Himſelf, and all the Prelates and Clerks which were at that Parliament, that their Intent and Will was, that the true Eſtate of Holy Church ſhall not by them be blemiſhed in any Point, but otherwiſe preſerved and kept ſafe according to his Pleaſure. The Anſwer was, The King and the Great Men of the Land will adviſe and order what is beſt to be done in this Matter.

[2] Ib. n. 36. The Petition againſt all Pro*viſors from* Rome.

And [2] they further petition'd in this caſe, that all Proviſors of Benefices from Rome, with their Officers or Servants, may be put out of the King's Protection, if they ſue, proſecute, or any ways diſturb, or cauſe to be excommunicated the true Patrons. The Anſwer was, The Pope had promiſed redreſs, and if He makes it not, the Laws in this caſe ſhall be in force.

[3] Ib. n. 75. The Lord Latimer reſtor'd to his Eſtate.

And amongſt their Petitions in this Parliament, I cannot but obſerve, [3] that the Commons pray'd the King and Noble Lords of Parliament, that whereas in the laſt Parliament, by untrue Suggeſtions, and without due Proceſs, the Lord Latimer, one of the Peers of the Realm, and ſufficient to be of the King's Council, as well for his Wars as otherwiſe, was ouſted of all his Offices, and diſcharged from the King's Privy Council, that he may by Award of this preſent Parliament be reſtored to his former Eſtate and Degree, to the great Profit of the Kingdom. The Anſwer was, The King is willing at the Prayer of ſeveral Prelates and Lords of Parliament, and alſo of the Commons, that it ſhould be ſo.

[4] Ib. n. 87. The Commons further deſire that all Perſons impeached and condemn'd in the laſt Parliament might be reſtor'd.

[4] In the laſt day of the Parliament, when all the Petitions of the Commons had been read and anſwered, their Speaker Sir Thomas Hungerford, ſaid before the Prelates, Lords and Commons, on behalf of the Commons, that whereas many People, as well Men as Women, had been impeached in the laſt Parliament, without due Proceſs, and were judg'd in certain Paynes, and foreclosed of the common Liberty which every loyal Subject ought to enjoy; they therefore prayed that it would pleaſe his Majeſty to reſtore them to their former Eſtates, Dignities, and all other things, notwithſtanding thoſe Judgments. The King preſently demanded, if their Requeſt was made for all that were impeached? And he anſwered, their Requeſt was for all. It was then told them, they muſt declare diſtinctly in Writing, for whom, and why they thus petition'd: and preſently the ſame day ſeven Bills (i. e. Petitions) were deliver'd to the Clerk of the Parliament, whereof the two firſt being worth our noting, I ſhall give you the Subſtance of them.

They petition on behalf of Richard Lyons.

The one was directed to the King from the Commons "on the behalf of Richard Lyons Merchant, who had been the laſt Parliament "by a haſty Proceſs adjudg'd to the Tower of London during his "Majeſty's Pleaſure, that therefore it would now pleaſe Him, that "he ſhould be reſtored to his Liberty, as alſo to his Goods, Lands "and

Anno Dom. 1377.

" and Tenements; ſince according to Law no cauſe of Forfeiture " could be found againſt him. The other is directed to the King and his ſage Council in this preſent Parliament, on behalf of Alice Perrers, " ſetting forth, that ſhe had been by untrue Suggeſtion, and undue Pro- " ceſs in the laſt Parliament, foreclosed of the common Liberty which " every Liege Subject of the King, as well Men as Women, ought freely " to enjoy, unleſs they be convict of a Crime, for which they are to " forfeit it: that therefore it would pleaſe his Majeſty, for the love " of God and right Juſtice, to have conſideration, that the ſaid " Alice was never preſent in Parliament, nor duly admitted to anſwer " any thing for which ſhe was adjudged; and for this cauſe to reverſe " the Judgment, and cauſe her to be reſtored entirely to her former " Eſtate, the ſaid Judgment, or any Prohibition made againſt the ſaid " Alice in the ſame Parliament notwithſtanding.

And alſo of Alice Perrers.

Both theſe Petitions were granted by the King, being on the behalf of two Perſons he greatly favour'd, eſpecially the latter, who was then return'd to Court, and looked upon as his Miſtreſs, or rather Nurſe, if what Stow relates be true, that ſhe and her Daughter Iſabel lay in bed with the King every Night to keep him warm. And then the Parliament was diſſolved. But this likewiſe ſhews us, that even then one Parliament differ'd from another, and often quitted thoſe whom the former had condemned.

Who are thereupon both reſtor'd by the King.

We ſhall now ſay ſomewhat of the Affairs abroad. In the mean while, the King was inform'd, that the French were got to Sea, and had done much damage upon the Coaſt; wherefore not being yet ready to oppoſe them, He endeavour'd to make a Peace, or elſe to prolong the Truce: to which purpoſe, [1] on the twentieth of February He by a Commiſſion appointed the Biſhop of Hereford, the Lords Cobham and Montacute, with ſeveral other Commiſſioners, to treat with thoſe of the King of France, before the Pope's Legates at Bruges, but nothing was done in this Affair; and the Legates finding it impoſſible to make any final Agreement, upon the Terms demanded by both Parties, they propounded a Match between Richard Prince of Wales, and Mary the King of France his Daughter. This Propoſal begat another Meeting of other Commiſſioners (of whom Sir Geoffry Chaucer the Poet was one) at Monſtreuil, but without any other effect than continuing the Truce until the firſt of May next following. But before that time was expired, viz. [2] on the ~~fifteenth~~ of April, another Commiſſion was granted to the Biſhops of St. Davids and Hereford, the Earl of Saliſbury and others, ~~by which they were to treat at the Place laſt mention'd, with the French Commiſſioners, who~~ were the Lord de Coucy, and Monſieur Dormer Chancellor of France, with ſome others. Theſe were impower'd to end and compoſe all Differences, ~~Wars and Contentions~~ whatſoever, between the two Crowns; but by reaſon of certain freſh Jealouſies and Suſpicions the Commiſſioners had one of another, they never could agree to meet any more, and thus all things remain'd in the ſame ſtate of War and Confuſion during the reſt of this King's Reign. Tho [3] Mezeray (I cannot tell by what authority) relates, that King Edward, being worn out with Age and Sickneſs, and likely to leave his Succeſſor an Infant, was ſo deſirous of Peace, that He was willing to relinquiſh divers chief Articles of the Treaty of Bretigny, but what they were this Author would

But it is more probable what * Du Cheſne further relates (tho I know not from what Authority) that at this Treaty King Charles offer'd by his Commiſſioners to thoſe of England fourteen hundred Towns, and three thouſand Caſtles, by which are meant principal Houſes, or Seats belonging to Great Lords and Gentlemen, on condition they ſhould be held by Homage of the Crown of France; yet ſo that the Engliſh ſhould give back Calais, and whatever elſe they had conquer'd in Picardy.

I cannot here omit a matter, which, tho it be properly Eccleſiaſtical, yet it having ſo near a relation to, and influence over our Civil Affairs, I ſhall inſert here, being the moſt proper Place for it. John † Wickliff, Warden of Canterbury College in Oxford, and a Perſon very conſiderable for his Knowledg in Divinity (as having been for ſome time publick Reader or Profeſſor thereof) had now fallen under the Cenſure of the Pope, for certain Opinions and Doctrines he then publiſhed contrary to thoſe maintain'd by the Roman Church, a particular Account of which you will find at the end of this Reign. Wherefore [a] the Pope, upon the hearing of them read before Him, directed his Bulls to the Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury and Biſhop of London, commanding them to uſe their Authority for the Apprehenſion of the ſaid Wickliff, in order to examine and cenſure his Opinions; and being cited by the Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury to appear and anſwer in his Court at St. Paul's Church for the ſame, Wickliff appearing according to his Citation, [b] was accompany'd thither by the Duke of Lancaſter and the Lord Piercy (then Lord Marſhal) who out of ſpite to the Biſhops both came as his Patrons, and Favourers of his Opinions, to our Lady's Chappel in St. Paul's, attended by a great number of other People. But when William Courtney Biſhop of London ſaw the ſtir that the Marſhal and his Men made among the People, he ſaid unto the Lord Piercy, That if he had known before, how he would have plaid the Maſter in his Church, he would have hinder'd him from coming thither. At which words of the Biſhop the Duke being concern'd, anſwer'd him, that the Marſhal ſhould play the Maſter there, as he had begun, even tho he the Biſhop ſaid nay. Then as ſoon as they were come into the Chappel, the Duke and other Lords ſat themſelves down with the Arch-Biſhop and Biſhops, John Wickliff ſtanding before them, according to the uſual manner, ready to anſwer what ſhould be objected unto him. The Lord Marſhal firſt breaking ſilence, deſired Mr. Wickliff to ſit down, alledging, that he had many things to anſwer, and therefore had need of ſome repoſe. But the Biſhop of London ſaid, He ſhould not ſit down there; for neither was it according to Law nor Reaſon, that he who was cited there to appear to anſwer before his Ordinary, ſhould ſit down during the time of his Anſwer. Theſe Words created others, and thoſe ſtill begat more, the Biſhop ſtanding upon the Privileges of his Function, and the Earl Marſhal upon his Own and the King's Authority; ſo that many reflecting Words and Menaces paſs'd on both ſides, to the great offence of the Auditors.

Then [c] the Duke began the more to take the Marſhal's part, and warmly to reprove the Biſhop, who was not a jot behind hand with him; ſo that the Duke finding himſelf worſted by the Biſhop in Words, threaten'd, that he would ſhortly bring down the Pride of him and all the

all the Prelates in England; and told him farther, that he preſum'd too much on his Parentage, but that ſhould not be able to help him. To which the Biſhop reply'd, that he was only bold for the Truth, and that his Confidence was not in his Parents, but in the living God. Then the Duke whiſper'd to one that ſat next him, that he had rather drag the Biſhop out of the Church by the Hair of the Head, than take ſuch Language at his hands. However this was not utter'd ſo ſoftly, but that ſome of the Citizens overheard him, who being enraged, thereupon cry'd out, that they would never ſee their Biſhop ſo abuſed, but rather loſe their Lives than that he ſhould ſuffer ſuch an Indignity. Upon this Contention the Court was diſſolv'd before nine of the Clock, and the Duke with the Lord Piercy return'd to the Parliament then ſitting at Weſtminſter; and Wickliff was at the ſame time diſmiſs'd, tho not without a ſevere Prohibition from the Biſhops, never for the future to preach nor write any more in defence of thoſe Articles laid to his charge, and ſo the Buſineſs ended at that time.

The Court is diſſolv'd, and Wickliff diſmiſs'd.

But the next day ' the Mayor and Citizens aſſembl'd in Common Council to conſider of the matter, and alſo how far the Power of the Marſhal extended, not forgetting to take notice of the Affronts put upon their Biſhop the day before. But while the better ſort of them were engaged in ſober Debates, a great number of the common People being got together, heard that one of them was then in Priſon in the Lord Marſhal's Houſe, which ſtood within their Liberties; and they being ſecretly ſtir'd up by ſome conſiderable Beauteſeus, went immediately in great fury to the Houſe of the Lord Piercy, and there breaking open the Gates, they took out the Priſoner by force, and carry'd him away; and after they had done this, they ſearched for the Lord Piercy all over the Houſe, but not finding him as they expected, they ſpoil'd and cut to pieces his Beds, Hangings, and other Furniture, whilſt Piercy their Owner was with the Duke of Lancaſter at dinner, at the Houſe of a Merchant, call'd John of Ipres. But the Rabble not knowing any thing of that, and ſuppoſing they were both at the Duke's Palace call'd the Savoy, thither they poſted in all haſt, expecting to find them; which a Knight of the Duke's ſeeing, made haſt to the Place where his Lord din'd, and gave him notice of this Uproar: Whereupon the Duke roſe haſtily from the Table, and with the Lord Piercy took Boat, and went away to Kennington, a Mannor of the King's near Lambeth, where the Princeſs of Wales and her Son Prince Richard then lay, complaining of this Riot, and the Violence offer'd to them. In the mean time the Multitude coming to the Savoy, a Prieſt inquiſitive to know the Buſineſs, was anſwer'd, They came to take the Duke and the Lord Marſhal, and compel them to deliver Sir Peter de la Mare, unjuſtly detain'd in Priſon. The Prieſt imprudently reply'd, that Sir Peter was a Traitor to the King, and deſerv'd to be hang'd; at which words they all cry'd out, This is Piercy, this is the Traitor in diſguiſe, his Speech betrays him; and preſently they fell upon him, and wounded him to death.

ended for the good of the City. Whereupon they were ſomething pacified, and forbore to aſſault the Duke's Houſe, whoſe Perſon, if they could have found, they had no doubt made an end of, and the Lord Marſhal's too in their fury; but miſſing the Duke, they hung up his Arms revers'd, in token of Treaſon, in the principal Streets in the City.

The Princeſs Dowager ſends to the Citizens to make their Peace with the Duke.

Then the Princeſs Dowager ſent from Kennington three Knights of her Retinue to perſuade the Citizens to make their Peace with the Duke. To which they return'd this Anſwer, That for her ſake they would do whatſoever ſhe commanded; but yet enjoin'd thoſe Knights to deſire the Duke to permit the Biſhop of Wincheſter and Sir Peter de la Mare to come to their Anſwers, according to the Laws of England. The Mayor and his Brethren ſent ſome of the chief Citizens to the King, to excuſe themſelves for this Tumult, proteſting they were no ways privy thereto, but ſought all means to ſuppreſs the ſame, which they could not do. And the whole Commonalty being in a great Commotion, upon an Information that their Liberties ſhould be taken away from them by Parliament, the King thereupon told them, it never was in his thoughts to infringe their Liberties, but He rather deſired to enlarge them; and therefore willed them not to fear, but return to appeaſe the Citizens, and keep them in Peace and Order. They were well pleas'd with this Anſwer, and did as the King enjoin'd them; but yet they could not ſtop the Paſſage of divers Rhimes and Libels (thoſe ſecret Darts that wound unſeen) but that they were daily ſpread in the City to the Defamation of the Duke, and to make his Name odious to the People; for which he procured the Biſhops to excommunicate the Authors of all ſuch Rhimes and Libels; and thus the Buſineſs was compos'd for a time.

The Mayor and Aldermen excuſe themſelves of the late Riot, and offer the Duke ſatisfaction.

But [a] when the Parliament was diſſolv'd, the Duke's Diſpleaſure againſt the City ſtill continu'd, and began to ſhew it ſelf afreſh; ſo that the Mayor and Aldermen were brought before the King at Shene, and adjudg'd to ſubmit themſelves to the Duke, and crave pardon for their grievous Offences: but they proteſted as before, that they could not ſtay the rage of the Multitude, who committed thoſe Inſolencies; beſeeching the King not to puniſh ſuch as were innocent and ignorant of the Fact; promiſing the Duke they would endeavour by all means to bring out the Malefactors, and compel them to make ſatisfaction, to the Duke's honour; and more (ſaid they) we can not do.

They are turn'd out, and others put in.

Whereupon they were diſmiſs'd the Court, and ſhortly after from their Places, by the power of the Duke of Lancaſter. Sir Nicholas Brember was elected Mayor inſtead of Adam Staple, and other Aldermen appointed in the Places of thoſe who were put out.

The Duke of Lancaſter being made Regent of the Kingdom, falls out with the Bp of Wincheſter.

But to give the better light to what hath been already related concerning the Biſhop of Wincheſter's Diſgrace, and other Matters before mention'd, we are to underſtand that not long after the Death of Prince Edward, the King growing ſickly, and unfit for Buſineſs, appointed his Son the Duke of Lancaſter Regent of the Kingdom under Himſelf, who being of a rough and martial Temper, was not at all acceptable to the Clergy, nor to the common People of the City of London (as you may have already obſerv'd) and William of Wickham Biſhop of Wincheſter having highly diſoblig'd him by ſome Words or Actions (which ſince they are uncertain, I ſhall not mention) he cauſed the King to ſeize upon his Temporalties, ~~and to forbid him coming near the Court~~; x And beſides ſides this, the Duke not looking upon the Earl of Marche (then Lord Marſhal) as one in his Intereſt, he would have ſent him a little before the late Truce to command the Forces about Calais; but he declining the Imployment, was forced (as a Puniſhment for his diſobedience) to ſurrender his Marſhal's Rod, which the Duke preſently beſtow'd upon his Friend the Lord Piercy, who at the Coronation of King Richard the Second, you will find to be created the firſt Earl of Northumberland of that Name and Family.

Sir J. Menſter-worth executed for a Traitorr

I cannot here paſs by mentioning an Affair, tho of leſs moment, that happen'd this Year. [1] Sir John Menſterworth (whoſe Treaſons we have already ſet forth under A. D. 1370.) being ſurpriſed by certain Engliſhmen at Pampelona, a City of Navarre, he was by the Permiſſion of that King brought over into England, and try'd here before the Mayor, and other the King's Juſtices in the Guild-Hall at London, where theſe Crimes were proved home upon him, viz. "That being entruſted by his Sovereign Lord the King, and having received "conſiderable Sums of Mony wherewith to pay the King's Soldiers, "he had falſly and traitorouſly kept the Mony to his own uſe; alſo "that he had maliciouſly occaſioned a Diſſenſion and Diſcord in the "King's Army, and thereby gave the Enemy Advantage againſt "them: whereof being accuſed unto the King, and fearing the pu-"niſhment due unto him, therefore he like a falſe Traytor, had fled "into France unto the King's Enemies, and there was ſworn unto "the French King, and conſpired againſt his own Sovereign, under-"taking to direct the Spaniſh Navy, and bring them into England, to "the deſtruction of his Native Country. Of all which being convicted, he was on the twelfth of April executed at Tyburn, and his Head ſet upon London-Bridge.

Sir Hugh Calverly is ſent over to Calais with ſome Forces.

But to ſay ſomewhat of Foreign Affairs; [2] the late Truce having been expired in the beginning of May, Sir Hugh Calverly being made Governor of Calais, was ſent over thither with ſome Forces (for now all things began to threaten the bloody Conſequences of the next Campagne) wherefore Commiſſions were ſent to the Great Lords throughout all England, to array and muſter all able men from ſixteen to ſixty Years old, to be ready on occaſion to defend the Kingdom, and to withſtand any Invaſion that might happen, there being apprehenſions that the French would land in ſome Part or other: And not long after ſome of their Commanders came ſuddenly with conſiderable Forces, and laid Siege to a ſtrong Fort near Calais, called Outwick, which they began to batter moſt furiouſly with nine Pieces of Great Ordnance, and it ſo terrified William Weſton the Governor, that he preſently ſurrender'd the Place, on condition that he and his Men ſhould be ſafely convey'd to Calais, where Sir Hugh Calverly preſently ſeized him, and ſent him into England to anſwer the Fact; and when he arrived, he was ſent to the Tower, where he lay without any Proceedings againſt him until the beginning of the next Reign.

The French beſiege the Fort of Outwick, which is ſurrender'd.

The Duke of Bretagne comes to Calais.

The [3] Duke of Bretagne, who had been more than a Year with his Couſin the Earl of Flanders, ſeeing now the War break out again, took leave of the Earl, and went to Graveling, whither the Earl of Saliſbury and Sir Guiſcard d' Angle went to meet him, with a ſelect Body of Men at Arms and Archers, and ſo conducted him ſafe to Calais. The [4] next day, about fifty of the Duke's Retinue would paſs over to to Dover, but by the way were taken by ſome French Galleys, and ſome of the Paſſengers ſlain in ſight of the Town, which was not then able to relieve them; but Sir Hugh Calverly being reſolved to be revenged, marched out with a ſtrong Party of choice Troops, and made an Inroad into the French Pale, where he ſlew ſeveral men, retook the Caſtle of Outwick, and returned ſafe with great Booty of Cattle: And indeed you will find many notable Actions done by this valiant Warrior during the next Reign.

[1] Froiſ. ib. The Duke of Bretagne comes into England.

But to add ſomewhat further of the Duke of Bretagne, [1] when he with the Lords abovemention'd had ſtaid about a month at Calais, being now provided with a ſufficient Convoy, they all paſſed over into England about the middle of June, and then waited upon the King; but He was at that time very ill, and lived but a few days after, of whoſe Deceaſe we ſhall ſpeak further by and by.

[2] Id. ib. The E. of Bedford goes into Auſtria to proſecute [illegible] Right to that Dutchy.

In the mean time I ſhall give you ſome account of the King's other Son-in-law, [2] Ingelram Earl of Bedford, and Lord of Coucy, who, immediately after his Return into France from the Wars of Italy, where he had for ſome Years ſerved the Pope, was furniſhed by the King of France with ſufficient Forces to recover the Dutchy of Auſtria, which he laid claim to in Right of his Mother, Siſter to Peter late Duke thereof; but the Eſtates of that Country had beſtowed it upon another, againſt whom the Lord Coucy went the laſt Year, attended by many of the Nobility of France, but with very bad Succeſs; for the People of Auſtria, by the Command of his Competitor, ſo burnt and deſtroy'd the whole Country for above three days March (he himſelf retiring with his Forces to the Mountains) that the Lord Coucy and his Army ſuffer'd extremely for want of Victuals and Forage, and moſt of his Men and Horſes died in the Winter by Hunger, Cold and Sickneſs; upon which he was forced to put an end to this Expedition, and return into France with thoſe ſmall Forces he had left. But that he might not ſhew himſelf ungrateful to the French King his Benefactor, he reſolved wholly to quit the Engliſh Intereſt, and take part with that of France: Yet to palliate the matter the better, and to ſatisfy in ſome meaſure King Edward his Father-in-law, he ſent his Daughter Iſabella to Him into England, where ſhe continued for ſome time, and ſo far prevail'd upon the King her Father, that her Huſband (notwithſtanding what he had done) was permitted to enjoy his Honours and Eſtate in England: and indeed there was ſome reaſon for it; [3] for beſides that his Eſtate in France was much greater, he was born a Subject of that Kingdom, and not being an abſolute Prince, it was not to be expected that he ſhould quit his Allegiance to that Crown.

Where he loſes moſt of his Army by Famine or Sickneſs, and returns into France, and embraces the Intereſt of that Crown.

[5] T. W.

Nothing now remains, but that we conclude this Reign with the melancholy Relation of King Edward's Deceaſe, in the one and fiftieth Year of his Reign, and ſixty fifth of his Life; who tho no very old Man, yet was much broken by the Martial Toils of his Youth, but much more thro great Grief and Diſcontent ariſing from ſo many various Miſfortunes that follow'd one another: Yet [4] if Walſingham and other Hiſtorians may be credited, He too much indulged Himſelf in Venereal Pleaſures almoſt to the laſt; for Alice Perrers his Miſtreſs continuing with Him, had ſtill flatter'd him with hopes of Life, until He fell into the Diſeaſe call'd the Annuli or Shingles, which putting him him into a Fever, increas'd to that degree, that his Life was deſpair'd of, and then ſhe (like a right Jilt) packing up what ſhe could get, even to the Rings on his Fingers, left Him. Then his other Attendants, by her Example, ſeizing upon what they could find, ſhifted for themſelves; and even his Counſellors forſook him in his laſt Agony, when He moſt needed their Advice, leaving his Chamber in a manner empty, which a Prieſt or Chaplain of the Houſhold obſerving, came up, and approached the King's Bed-ſide, and finding Him yet breathing, call'd upon Him to remember his Saviour, and ask Mercy for his Sins; which none before him would do, but every one flatter'd him ſtill with hopes of Life (a Miſfortune too often fatal to Princes and Great Perſons.) This had made him negligent of thoſe pious Cogitations fit for a dying Man; but being now ſtir'd up by the Voice of this Prieſt, He ſhew'd all Signs of Contrition, and with his laſt Breath expreſs'd the Name of Jeſus. Thus died this mighty King, at his Mannor of Sheen (now Richmond) the twenty firſt day of June this preſent Year, to the great grief of his Subjects, who notwithſtanding his late Failings, would have been glad longer to have enjoy'd Him.

His Character as a Man.

But tho this Prince's Character is beſt to be learn'd by the Great Actions of his Life, yet it will not be amiſs to ſay ſomething of his Perſonage, natural Temper and Conditions. He was of Stature indifferently tall, yet ſtrong, and well proportion'd; of a graceful and noble Aſpect, ſo that in his old Age He commanded Reſpect and Veneration of all thoſe that ſaw Him. As to his Conditions, no man was more gentle where there was Submiſſion; where oppoſ'd, none more ſtern and inexorable. He was in common Converſation very humble and familiar to all thoſe that addreſs'd themſelves to Him, whether Subjects or Strangers, yet ſtill with great Gravity and Diſcretion: He was as a Father to the Orphans, and never fail'd to ſuccour thoſe that were in Miſery, or oppreſs'd; was magnificent in conferring Favours or Benefits on thoſe that had any ways ſerv'd or oblig'd Him; humble and modeſt in Proſperity, and in Adverſity not too much caſt down or dejected. He was curious and magnificent in his Publick Buildings, as that Noble Edifice of Windſor-Caſtle teſtifies. He was alſo Munificent, Pious and Charitable, as appears by his erecting and liberally endowing a [2] Noble College call'd King's Hall in Cambridg, now made a part of Trinity College; as alſo the Collegiate * Chappel of St. Stephen's at Weſtminſter. [3] This, with a ſmall, but handſom Colledg adjoining, He built and endow'd for a Dean and twelve ſecular Chanons, who with ſeveral Singing Men were daily to perform Divine Service in that Place, which then was the publick Chappel of that Palace.

His publick Acts of Charity.

His Actions as a King.

To conclude, tho He was a Prince that valued his Prerogative, yet none of his Predeceſſors paſſed more or better Statutes for the eaſe and benefit of his Subjects, nor more careful to ſee them well obſerv'd, or was more ſtrict in puniſhing his Judges for Oppreſſion, Bribery or Corruption, as you may find by ſeveral Examples thro his whole Reign. And as no King had more frequent and greater Taxes from his Subjects, ſo they were ſatisfied they were expended for the Honour and Defence of the Nation againſt their Enemies; and theſe Taxes were as willingly given, as they were worthily and diſcreetly lay'd out, till towards the latter End of his Reign, that He came to be too much govern'd by Women or Favourites. In ſhort, Walſingham tells us, That this King's Reputation was ſo great in thoſe days, that it reached even to remote and barbarous Nations, who eſteemed thoſe to be moſt happy that were his Subjects, at leaſt his Confederates; ſo that my Author further ſays, That God had never rais'd up a King in England that was ſo Valiant, Generous and Fortunate as Himſelf: and if He declin'd towards the latter end of his time from that heighth of Glory which He formerly attain'd, it was only that Heaven had a mind to humble Him, and ſhew Him the Vanity of that falſe Glory of Conquering Foreign Kingdoms, to obtain which Princes too often render themſelves extreamly burthenſom to their Subjects, and hated as well as fear'd by the Princes their Neighbours.

The Iſſue of Edward III. by Philippa of Haynalt.

Taxes in this King's Time.

[1] IN the Sixth Year He had granted him a Fiſteenth by the Counties, and a Tenth by the Cities and Burghs for one Year.

[2] In his Eighth Year He had the ſame, and a Tenth granted by the Clergy.

[3] In his Tenth Year He had the ſame Tax from Layty and Clergy.

[4] In the Eleventh Year He had a Three-year's Tenth given Him by the Clergy in Convocation, a Three-year's Tenth given Him by Citizens and Burgeſſes in Parliament, and by Others a Three-year's Fiſteenth, to maintain the War then begun with France, and to pay the Germans, Brabanters and other Confederates on the Borders of Germany, againſt the King of France.

[5] In the Thirteenth Year the Great Men gave Him the Tenth Sheaf of all manner of Grain of their Demeaſn Lands, except of their Bond Tenants, with the tenth Fleece and the tenth Lamb: this was in the firſt Parliament this Year held fifteen days after Michaelmas.

Then a [6] Parliament was ſummon'd to meet eight days after St. Hilary or twentieth of January, in which the Commons gave the King thirty thouſand Sacks of Wool.

[7] In his Fourteenth Year, the Prelates, Earls, Barons, for themſelves and their Tenants, the Knights of Counties for themſelves and the Commons of the Land, granted to the King the Ninth Sheaf, Fleece, and Lamb; but the Citizens and Burgeſſes gave the Ninth of all their Goods, according to the true Value, for two Years next coming, and thoſe that lived not in Cities and Burghs, nor lived upon Tillage or Shop Trades, paid the Fiſteenth part of all their Goods, according to the true Value.

Upon the King's writing to the Parliament for ſpeedy Supply, ſeeing the Ninths could not be levyed time enough for his Service, the Lords and Commons agreed to have twenty thouſand Sacks of Wool ſpeedily provided.

In the Fifteenth the Ninths were revoked, in reſpect of this Grant of twenty thouſand Sacks of Wool.

In the Eighteenth, the Clergy of the Province of Canterbury granted a Three-year's Tenth, and the Knights of Counties gave two Fiſteenths and two Tenths of Cities and Burghs; and afterwards the Commons granted another Fiſteenth. The Lords promiſed to go with the King in Perſon, and therefore gave nothing.

In the Twentieth Year, the Commons granted two Fiſteenths, to be levyed in two Years in Cities, Burghs and Antient Demeaſns, as alſo of the Commons of the Counties.

In the Two and twentieth Year, the Commons granted three Fiſteenths, to be levied in three Years, ſo as one Fiſteenth was to be levied in each Year, and no more.

In his Five and twentieth Year, the Great Men of the Realm and the Commonalty, by the Advice of ſome Great Men ſent to aſſiſt them, granted the King three Tenths, to be paid in three Years.

In the Seven and twentieth Year, the King made it his Requeſt, that the Prelates, Great Men and Commons, would grant Him the Subſidy of Wool-fells and Leather for ſome time; to which Prayer they unanimouſly conſented, and granted that Subſidy in manner as it had been received before that time for three Years.

Ib. 29 E. 3. n. 11.

In the Thirty ſixth Year, the Great Men and Commons granted unto the King, of every Sack of Wool tranſported twenty Shillings, of every three hundred Wool-fells twenty Shillings, and of every Laſt of Leather forty Shillings; beſides the Antient Cuſtom of half a Mark a Sack of all Deniſons, and ten Shillings for Strangers; half a Mark for every three hundred Wool-fells of Deniſons, and ten Shillings of Strangers; and one Mark for every Laſt of Leather of Deniſons, and twenty Shillings of Strangers for three years. Ib. 36 Ed. 3. n. 35.

In the Forty ſecond Year, the Prelates and Great Men having had full Deliberation with the Commons, granted the Subſidy of Wool, Wool-fells and Leather, for two Years; of every Sack of Wool, and every twelve-ſcore Wool-fells thirty ſix Shillings eight Pence; of every Laſt of Leather four Pounds, beſides the Antient Cuſtom as before. Ib. 42 E. 3. n. 9.

In his Forty third Year, the Lords and Commons granted to Him the Subſidy as above for three Years; of every Sack of Wool forty three Shillings and four Pence, which paſſed beyond Sea; of every twelve-ſcore Wool-fells as much, and of every Laſt of Leather four Pounds, beſides the Antient Cuſtom; of Strangers for every Sack of Wool four Marks, of every twelveſcore Wool-fells four Marks, and of every Laſt of Leather eight Marks, beſides the Antient Cuſtom. In the Forty fifth Year, the Great Men and Commons granted a Subſidy of Fifty thouſand Pounds, to be levied of every Pariſh of the Land two and twenty Shillings and three Pence, ſo as the Pariſhes of greater Value ſhould contribute ratably to thoſe of leſs Value. Ib. 45 E. 3. n. 5.

This two and twenty Shillings and three Pence of every Pariſh anſwered not the Sum of Fifty thouſand Pounds, and therefore not long after at Wincheſter, the Great Men and Commons granted five Pounds and ſixteen Pence out of every Pariſh, the two and twenty Shillings and three Pence being compriſed in it; ſo as the Pariſhes of greater Value ſhould contribute to thoſe of leſs. Ib. n. 10, 11.

In the Forty ſixth Year, the Lords and Commons granted for two Years the Subſidy of Wool, Leather and Wool-fells, as it was granted in the Forty third Year. Ib. 46 E. 3. n. 10.

And for that this Subſidy proved not ſufficient for the King's Expences, they granted a Fifteenth for one Year, to be levied as the laſt was. Ib. n. 11.

Beſides this, the Citizens and Burgeſſes in this Parliament, for the ſafe convoying of their Ships and Goods, granted two Shillings upon every Ton of Wine, and ſix Pence in the Pound of all Goods for a Year. Ib. n. 14, 15.

In the Forty ſeventh Year, the Lords and Commons granted a Fifteenth, as it had been in Antient manner levied, for two Years; they alſo gave Tonnage and Poundage for two Years, as it was given the laſt Year of all Merchandiſes exported and imported, except of Wool, Ib. 47 E. 3. n. 5.

Who ſhall let to farm the Temporalties of Biſhops to the King's Uſe. Ch. 5.

By the fourth Statute made this 14*th Year of* Edw. 3.

It is ordained, that the Realm and People of England ſhall not be ſubject nor obedient to the King or Kingdom of France.

In a Parliament at Weſtminſter held the 15*th* of this King, a Body of Laws was made; but becauſe there were in it ſeveral Articles, which, he ſaid, were expreſly contrary to the Laws and Cuſtoms of the Realm, and his Prerogatives Royal, He therefore, with the Advice and Aſſent of his great Council of Peers, took upon Him to revoke and repeal the ſaid Statutes, by a Proclamation iſſued forth under his Seal for that purpoſe. Dated the firſt of October, An. Dom. 1341. Regni ſui 15.

But even the Peers themſelves, not being ſatisfy'd with this high Strain of Prerogative, did within two Years after join with the Commons in a Bill for the more legal repealing the aforeſaid Statutes, which being paſt into an Act by the King's Aſſent, it ſtands enter'd on the Parliament-Roll of decimo ſeptimo Edwardi tertii, and remains a good Law to this day, tho it has never as yet been printed. But becauſe I have already given it at large in the Body of my Hiſtory, I have thought it enough here thus briefly to mention it, leaving the Reader to his Diſcretion to peruſe it as he pleaſes.

Ch. 7. This concerning Men of Arms, Hoblers and Archers that were in the King's Service out of England, how they ſhall be paid, being become obſolete, I therefore barely mention it.

Ch. 6. Temporal Juſtices ſhall not enquire of Proceſs awarded by Spiritual Judges.

Ch. 7. No Scire facias ſhall be awarded againſt a Clerk for Tythes.

The next that follows in the ſame 18*th* Year, is the Oath to be given to Juſtices, when they take their places; but it is not of Record, as my Lord Coke affirms, 4 Inſtit. 51. However this is the effect of it, viz. to ſerve the King faithfully in their reſpective Offices; to warn Him of any damage; to do Juſtice, to take no Reward; to give no Counſel where the King is a Party; to arreſt and impriſon all that go about to diſturb the Execution of the Common Law, or menace the People that they may not perſue the Law; not to maintain any Suit, nor deny Right, tho by command from the King, or Letters from any other Perſon; to procure the King's Profit; and if found in default, to be at the King's Will in Body, Lands and Goods, 3 Inſtit. 144.

Then there is ſet down the Oath of the Clerks of the Chancery, and of the Clerks of Courſe, which they take at this day. But the Abſtract would be too tedious, and therefore I refer to the Statute-Book for the form of it.

The Statute of Labourers made 23 Edw. 3. An. Dom. 1349.

This is obſolete, but deſerves to be renew'd. Ch. 6.

Another Statute of Labourers, made 25 Edw. 3. Anno Dom. 1350.

Appoints the ſeveral Wages of Servants and Labourers, and the particular Puniſhments of Perſons offending againſt the true meaning of this Statute, containing eight Chapters, but they are all repealed, or grown obſolete.

The

The Lord Chief Juſtice Hale's Account of the State and Progreſs of the Laws during this King's Reign.

KING Edward the Third ſucceeded his Father, his Reign was long, and under it our Law improv'd to its greateſt height; the Judges and Pleaders were very Learned in their Pleadings, tho ſomewhat more poliſh'd and regular than in the time of Edward the Firſt and Second: they had neither unneceſſary Length, nor yet any Obſcurity; they were plain and skilful, and the Rule of Law, eſpecially in relation to real Actions, and Titles of Inheritance, very learned and exact, exceeding thoſe of the time of Edward I. ſo that about the latter end of this King's Reign the Law ſeemed to be near its Meridian.

The Reports of this time run from the beginning of his Reign to the end, except ſome few Years, as between the 10*th* and 17*th*, and between the 30*th* and 33*d* of Edward 3*d*; yet thoſe very omitted Years are extant in antient Manuſcripts, which are in many hands. The Book of Aſſizes is a Collection of the Aſſizes or Trials that happen'd in this King's time, from the beginning of his Reign to the end, extracted out of the Year-Book and Reports of thoſe that attended the Aſſizes in the Country.

Yet the Juſtices Itinerant continued by intermitted Viciſſitudes till about the 4*th Edward* III. and ſome of them till 10*th Edward* III. their Juriſdiction extended to Pleas of the Crown, or Criminal Caſes, Civil Suits and Pleas of Liberty, and Quo Warranto; the Reports thereof are not printed, but are in many Hands in Manuſcript, of the Times of Ed. I. Ed. II. and Ed. III. full of excellent Learning, beſides ſome few broken Reports of thoſe Eyres, eſpecially in Cornwall, Nottingham, Northampton and Derby Shires, are collected by Fitz-Herbert. After the 10*th* of Ed. III. I do not find any Juſtices Errant ad Communia Placita, but only ad Placita Foreſtæ. Other things that concern'd thoſe Juſtices Itinerant were ſupplied and tranſacted in the Common Bench. The King's Bench and Exchequer were then for Placita de Libertatibus. There were alſo Juſtices of Aſſize, Niſi prius, Oyer and Terminer, and Goal-Delivery for Aſſizes and Pleas of the Crown. Thus much for the Reign of Ed. 3. and the Laws of that time.

Church Affairs in this King's Reign, relating chiefly to the great Difference concerning Papal Proviſions.

I Have from Dr. Brady's Compleat Hiſtory given you an Account of ſuch Eccleſiaſtical Affairs as could not be well inſerted into the precedent Reigns; particularly concerning that great Diſpute between the Pope and the King, about Proviſions or Nominations to Biſhopricks, and other Eccleſiaſtical Dignities; againſt which divers ſevere Statutes were made in this Reign, the Subſtance of which drawn from the Parliament-Rolls and printed Statutes, you will find in the enſuing Sheets; and therefore I have purpoſely omitted taking any notice of them among the Temporal Laws made under this King.

The old Controverſy was ſtill kept on foot inter Regnum & Sacerdotium (as they then term'd it) that is, between the Secular and Eccleſiaſtick Governments, or rather between the King and Pope, concerning the Regalia in Church Matters, and the Privileges of the Clergy.

See the Letter at large in Dr. B's Append. from Rot. Rom. 4 Ed. 3. n. 2.

The King, in the fourth Year of his Reign, wrote to Pope John XXII. concerning the Treaſurerſhip of York, which He had given by Proviſion to a Cardinal, againſt the Rights of his Crown and Prerogative, and to the ineſtimable Damage of the Kingdom; and therein beſeeches Him, that He would revoke his ſaid Proviſion, and direct the Cardinal not to contend againſt William de Maza his Clerk (then in poſſeſſion of it by his Preſentation) in ſuch a Novelty and Uſurpation; it being his Right, and always had been that of his Progenitors, in the Vacancy of the Arch-Biſhoprick, to preſent to that Dignity; and to ſtrengthen that Right, he vouches a Precedent in the Court of King's Bench in the time of his Grandfather Edward I.

Ibid.

He likewiſe at the ſame time wrote to Robert de Wodehouſe, Arch-Deacon of Richmond, wherein He acquainted him, that He had notice, that he and ſome others were contriving by divers Proceſſes, to put the Cardinal into actual Poſſeſſion of the ſaid Treaſurerſhip of York, to the great prejudice of his Crown; and therefore ſtrictly prohibited him from doing any thing to the impairing of his Right; and in caſe any thing already had been done by himſelf or others, thro his means or procurement, that he ſhould without delay revoke it; and ſo behave himſelf in this matter, that He might not have cauſe to chaſtiſe him as a Violator of the Rights of his Royal Dignity; and much after the ſame manner the King directed his Writs to theſe underwritten, viz.

Rot. Rom. n. 10. m. 3. printed in the Dr's Append. n. 98.

In the tenth Year of his Reign the King wrote to Pope Benedict X. that his Progenitors had long ſince ſounded and endowed the Church of England, and freely collated to the Cathedral Churches by their Royal Right; that afterwards upon the Petition of the Clergy, and for reverence to the Pope, and at his requeſt, the King had granted to the Chapters of Cathedral Churches the Power of chuſing a Biſhop, when the See became void, ſaving to Him and his Succeſſors the Prerogative, that whenever the Church did ſo become void, the Chapter ſhould acquaint Him with it, and make their requeſt to Him for his Licence to chuſe a Biſhop, and when he was ſo choſen, then to preſent him to the King for his Aſſent, before they proceeded further in the Buſineſs of his Election; and then after he had been confirm'd, he was to requeſt of the King the Temporalties belonging to the Biſhoprick, and do Him Fealty for the ſame: and whatever was done againſt this Form was to be void. That the Biſhoprick of Norwich being vacant, He had given the Prior and Chapter leave to chuſe, and they having ſo done, had preſented their Elect to Him for his approbation; but He having a deſire to be fully ſatisfied concerning ſomething he had heard of him, before He gave his Conſent to their ſaid Election, by the Advice of his Wiſe Men He gave him a ſhort Day to receive his Anſwer: But he ſcornfully rejected this way of proceeding, and proſecuted the Buſineſs of his Election in the Court of Rome, to the King's reproach, and in contempt of his Right, the Suppreſſion of his Royal Prerogative, and manifeſt Danger of Diſinheritance. Wherefore He beſought his Holineſs's favour to take the Premiſes into due conſideration, and deny the Biſhop-Elect any Audience for the confirmation of his Election, until he had obtain'd his Royal Aſſent, according to the Form aforeſaid, which He was ready to grant without more ado, if there ſhould be no reaſonble cauſe to oblige Him to the contrary: Concluding, that if He ſhould not have taken notice of this Supplication of the Elect of Norwich to the Pope, yet his Subjects would not ſuffer Him to paſs by ſuch an Encroachment.

Rot. Rom. 16 Ed. 3. n. 2.

After this the King apprehending that the Pope's Chaplains and Auditors of his Sacred Palace (to whom He uſually therein refer'd the hearing of ſuch Cauſes) tho otherwiſe good Lawyers, might yet be ignorant of the Laws and Cuſtoms of England, wrote to them likewiſe, and gave them notice, that all Cauſes about the Jus Patronatus, or Right of Patronage of Benefices whatſoever, were always pleaded, determin'd, and ended in his Court, before his Juſtices, and ought not to be diſcuſs'd any where elſe. That if any Man marry'd a Woman that was Patroneſs of any Church or Eccleſiaſtical Benefice, and had Iſſue by her, and ſhe dy'd before him; upon any Vacancy he was to preſent during his Life, and his Clerk was to be inſtituted by thoſe unto whom it belonged: and further, that if any Tenants in Capite died, poſſeſs'd of Lands, to which the Patronage of any Benefices were annexed, then if there happen'd any Vacancys after the Death of the Tenant, while the Lands were in the King's hands, it was his Right to preſent them; and therefore deſired, that if any of theſe matters came before them, they might be duly conſidered, and nothing done therein, to the prejudice of his Crown, nor of the Laws of his Kingdom.

Vid. Stat. at large 14 Ed. 3.

And that theſe Preſentments, as alſo thoſe made in the Vacancies of Arch-Biſhopricks, Biſhopricks, Pleas of a Plenarty, or the Church's being full, was no more an Exception or Plea againſt the King, than if they had been made in right of his Crown, until by a Statute for the Clergy, enacted upon the Petition of the Arch-Biſhops, Biſhops, and Clergy, in the fourteenth Year of his Reign, Chap. 2. He granted it ſhould be a bar to Him and his Heirs for the future; for before that, the King had his Remedy againſt the Incumbent, if he had not been duly preſented: for at that time Inſtitution, tho upon a wrong Preſentation, made a Plenarty againſt a common Perſon; but to make it good againſt the King, Induction, or actual Poſſeſſion of the Church was alſo required: yet before this Statute neither could be pleaded againſt Him.

Rot. Parl. 17 Ed. 3. n. 59.

In the ſeventeenth Year of his Reign, there was great Complaint made in Parliament, of Strangers holding ſo many Benefices in England; that the Alms were not beſtow'd, as they were wont; that much of the Treaſure of the Land was carry'd beyond Sea, for the maintenance of the King's Enemies; the Secrets of the Nation diſcover'd, and by this means the able and loyal Clerks of the Nation were leſs advanced: that of late there were many Cardinals made, to two of whom the Pope had granted by his Bulls Benefices in this Land to the value of ſix thouſand Marks; that the Commons underſtood, that one of the Cardinals, to wit the Cardinal of Perigort, was the fierceſt Enemy, and the moſt averſe to the King's Deſigns of any in the Court of Rome; that in a little time by ſuch Grants the Nation would be filled with Strangers, and no Clerk of this Kingdom, tho the Son of never ſo great a Lord, nor any other, would find a Benefice worth having, to which he could be advanced; and this to the great damage of the King and whole Community, by reaſon of ſuch Reſervations and Proviſions. Of which things the Commons pray Remedy, for that they could not, nor would any longer endure it, becauſe all the Foundations and Advowſons of Arch-Biſhopricks, Biſhopricks, Abbys, Priories, Churches Parochial, and the whole Spiritual Revenue of this Land, were of the Foundations of our former Kings, Earls, Barons, and Commons: and therefore that it would pleaſe the King to write to the Pope, under his Great Seal, and the Peers and Great Men of the Land under their Seals, that He would ceaſe from putting theſe Burdens on the Nation, and revoke what He had done: And if any of the Peers or Great Men would not ſeal ſuch a Letter, the Commons ſhould not hold him for a Well-wiſher to the King's Profit, or their own; and in caſe the Pope ſhould not comply with what was deſired, they pray'd the King to encourage and maintain ſuch as ſhould, and would endeavour to remove this Burden, and put ſuch out of his Protection as would not comply. They alſo pray Him to command all the Peers and Great Men of the Land to ſtay at this Parliament quietly, until theſe things ſhould be perfected and ſealed as above: and for the great damage that might happen in the mean time, that He would pleaſe to grant his Prohibitions to the Miniſters and Proctors of the Great Biſhops, not to intermeddle in this matter, until the Pope had wrote back his Pleaſure.

The Anſwer to this was, that the King well underſtood the miſchief, Ibid and was pleaſed that the Great Men and Commons ſhould order Remedy and Amendment, and He would agree to it; and alſo He conſented that Letters ſhould be wrote to the Pope about this matter, as well by Himſelf, as by the Great Men, and likewiſe by the Commons.

And then the Earls, Barons, and other Nobles, and the whole Ib. n. 10. Commonalty of the Realm, further pray'd the King, that for the avoiding and ſetting aſide the Damages, Grievances, and Oppreſſions of the People, and Holy Church of England, as well of Benefices as of Firſt-fruits; and by Impoſitions of Tenths, and other Burdens, in Diſheriſon both of the King and his Crown, and of the ſaid Earls, Barons, and other Nobles, that He would pleaſe to command that certain Petitions of the Earls, Barons and Commons of the Realm, offered in the time of his Grandfather, at his Parliament holden at Carliſle in the five and thirtieth Year of his Reign, and alſo the Agreement and Judgment made upon them in that Parliament, ſhould be again inquired into and conſider'd. So this their Prayer being granted, ſearch was made in the Rolls and Remembrances of the ſaid Parliament; and the ſaid Statute being found accordingly, the ſaid Statute of Proviſors is here recited at large, but ſince it is already ſet down among the Eccleſiaſtical Affairs of that King's Reign, I refer the Reader to it. After Recital, that ſerves as a Preamble to the preſent Statute, it follows to this effect:

Wherefore the King (viz. Edward the Third) in this preſent Parliament, Ibid. at the Suit of the Commonalty, and upon their Suggeſtions by their Petition before Him and his Council, of the many Damages and Grievances that have divers times happen'd by ſuch Proviſions and Reſervations, as well of Benefices as Firſt-fruits, and other things, as alſo by Impoſitions of Tenths and other Burdens lately impos'd by the Pope, to the Slander, Diſhonour and Depreſſion of the whole Church of England, and diſinheriting of our Lord the King and his Crown, and the Nobles of the Kingdom, and in Offence and Deſtruction of the Laws and Rights thereof, and Subverſion of the State of the whole Realm, againſt the Will of God, and the good Deſign of the Founders of thoſe Benefices, and againſt the Proviſion, Ordinance, Accord, Decree and Conſideration aforeſaid, made by his ſaid Grandfather: They (viz. all the Eſtates above-mention'd) humbly pray the King, that He would pleaſe to have regard to the Church of England, and the diſinheriting of Himſelf, the Earls, Barons, Nobles and Commonalty, and ordain Remedy. Wherefore He by Aſſent of all the Parties aforeſaid, hath Provided, Ordained, Decreed, &c. that as well within the Franchiſes of the Cinque-Ports, as elſewhere upon the Sea-Coaſts, and thro all the Counties of the Kingdom, open Proclamation ſhould be made, that no Perſon, of what Eſtate or Condition ſoever he was, whether Stranger or Denizen, ſhould from hence-forward bring, or cauſe to be brought into England, upon grievous forfeiture to the King, any Letters, Bulls, Proceſs, Reſervations, Inſtruments, or other things prejudicial to Him or his People, or to deliver them to any Arch-Biſhops, Biſhops, Abbots, Priors, Earls, Barons, or others within the Realm, and that none by virtue of ſuch Proviſions or Reſervations, ſhould receive any Benefices of Holy Church; and likewiſe that no Perſon, upon the Forfeiture aforeſaid, ſhould receive or take ſuch Letters, Bulls, Proceſs, or Inſtruments touching ſuch Proviſions and Reſervations, nor by reaſon thereof make Inſtitution or Induction into, or any other manner of Execution of them; and that none do, or ſuffer to be done, any other thing that might prove prejudicial to the King or his People, or which may damage the Rights of his Crown, or the Proviſions, Ordinances, Accords, Decrees, &c. aboveſaid.

And alſo it was further there agreed and enacted, that diligent ſearch ſhould be made in all Places needful, for all and every ſuch Perſons coming into the Kingdom; and that thoſe who ſhould be ſeiz'd by ſuch Search, or Enqueſt to be taken, or by other Information, bringing in any ſuch Letters, Bulls, Proceſs, Reſervations, Inſtruments, or other things prejudicial to the King or his People, and all thoſe who by virtue of them ſhould receive any Benefices, and place themſelves in, or be received into them; and alſo thoſe that by Authority of ſuch Letters, Bulls, Proceſs, Reſervations or Inſtruments, ſhould make any Appeals, Citations or Proceſs againſt the Patrons of ſuch Benefices, or thoſe they had preſented, or any others, or ſhould proſecute, or cauſe to be proſecuted in any Court whatever, whereby they had done, or procured to be done, any thing in prejudice of the King, or the Earls, Barons, Nobles, and Commonalty or of the Proviſions, Ordinances, Decrees, &c. and againſt the Proclamation and Inhibition aforeſaid, ſhould be taken and arreſted by their Bodies; and the Letters, Bulls, Proceſs, and Inſtruments, granted upon ſuch Proviſions and Reſervations, ſhould be taken from them, wherever they were to be found, and ſent before the King's Council, with their Bodies that brought them into England, or any other his Majeſty's Dominions therein mention'd, with all thoſe that proſecuted any Execution upon them, ſhould be arreſted in order to receive what the Court ſhould award thereupon; and further, that Writs to this purpoſe be ſent thro the whole Realm.

Rot Parl. 18 Ed. 3. n. 33.

Ib. n. 36.

In perſuance to which Statute, a Proclamation and Writs were iſſued forth, but without any great effect; for in the Parliament of the next Year, which began on the Octaves after Holy Trinity, the Commons again pray'd the King, that the Proviſions, Ordinances and Accord made in the Parliament of the ſeventeenth Year of his Reign, concerning the Proviſions and Reſervations of the Court of Rome, might be confirm'd and made a perpetual Statute. It was then alſo ordered, that the King ſhould preſent to the Prebends, Dignities, Churches and Chappels, of ſuch as lived in his Enemies Countries, or elſe to ſeize them into his own Hands, and employ the Profits thereof in defence of the Land and Holy Church, except ſo much as ſhould maintain the Houſes, and provide for Divine Service; and that any one who ſhould bring in any thing prejudicial to this Order from beyond Sea, ſhould be taken and carried back again.

Ib. n. 37. Clauſ. 18 E. 3. part 1. m. 20. printed in Dr. B's Append. n. 99.

And further it appears, that when all theſe Writs and Proclamations proved of little effect, the King by another Proclamation this Year, directed to the Sheriffs of London, in which all theſe Proviſions, Ordinances and Agreements were recited, it is further added, that ſince ſome Proviſors (i. e. ſuch as had received Benefices, &c. by the Pope's Proviſions) as well Strangers as Denizens, their Proctors and Meſſengers, not conſidering the ſaid Proviſions, Ordinances, Proclamation and Inhibitions, nor the Puniſhments contain'd in them, had brought Letters, Bulls and Inſtruments into the Kingdom, prejudicial to the King and his People, and had deliver'd them to Arch-Biſhops, Biſhops, Abbots, Priors, and others, as well Denizens as Strangers, to be executed, contrary to the ſaid Proclamation and Inhibition; and the Arch-Biſhops, Biſhops, and others receiving them, had by virtue thereof admitted and inducted very many ſuch Proviſors, and their Proctors or Subſtitutes, into Benefices, which they now poſſeſt, to the diſinheriting and intolerable prejudice of the King, his Crown and People, and againſt the Form of the Proviſions, Statutes, Proclamation and Inhibition aforeſaid. And ſince the Sheriffs of London had attempted ſomewhat againſt that Proclamation and Inhibition, and had hitherto neglected to obey his Command therein, at which He is much concern'd, the King proceeds again to enforce the former Inhibition, according to the Points of the late Agreement, Proviſion and Statute (including all thoſe that had admitted or inducted any into Benefices according to the Pope's Bulls and Reſervations) under the greateſt Forfeiture that could be made; and concludes, that they ſhould ſo behave themſelves in the Execution of this preſent Proclamation and Command, that He might not have cauſe to proſecute them, as Favourers of His and the Kingdom's Enemies. Witneſs the King at Weſtminſter, the thirtieth of January, in the eighteenth Year of his Reign of England, and of France the fifth.

By the King and the whole Council.

Ibid.

In the ſame manner all the Sheriffs of England received the like Precepts, to put in execution the ſaid Proclamation in their ſeveral Counties and Shires, as did alſo Bartholomew de Burgherſh Conſtable of Dover Caſtle, and Warden of the Cinque-Ports.

As to the ſeizing of the Houſes and Monaſteries belonging to Alien Monks and Friers, we find theſe following Records.

Rot. Parl. 20 Ed. 3. n. 30.

Then in a Parliament holden the Eighth of September in the twentieth Year of his Reign, by Leonel his Son, Guardian of England, the Commons petition, that the Alien-Monks might be made to go out of England before Michaelmas next coming; and that thoſe who ſtaid beyond that Feaſt might be outlaw'd, and the Abbies and Priories which they poſſeſs'd might be ſeized into the King's hands, and Engliſh men placed in them, according to the diſcretion of the Ordinary of the Place: for that the young Engliſh Scholars (who then did neglect their Studies) and thoſe who ſhould be the Teachers of their Faith, would undertake it, if they had any hopes to be encouraged; and that the good Priories were in the hands of Strangers, who carried the Revenues beyond Sea; ſo that for this reaſon their Faith was like to come to nothing: That the ſtrange Monks were only Laymen, and the King their Patron.

Ibid. The Anſwer to this was, that theſe Religious Aliens were ſpiritual Perſons, and held their Houſes by Inſtitution, which thing could not be try'd in Parliament: and as to their Lands and Benefices, they were in the King's hands, and He received the Profits of them; but as to ouſting of them, it could not be done without conſulting the King.

Ib. n. 30. It was alſo pray'd, that as for Strangers, Enemies in England, who ſhould remain there after Michaelmaſs, and ſhould be outlaw'd, Command might be given to ſeize their Poſſeſſions and Goods to the King's uſe, and He to cauſe Engliſh-men to inſtruct the Pariſhioners, and ſupport the Chanteries; for thoſe that were advanced in England were Taylors, Shoomakers and Chamberlains to Cardinals: ſo that the Pariſhioners being not inform'd by them, their Faith decreas'd daily.

Ibid. The Anſwer was near the ſame with the other, that they were Spiritual Perſons, and the King had taken the Profits as aboveſaid; and as to ouſting them of their Benefices, it could not be done without the King's Aſſent.

Yet notwithſtanding all theſe Proceedings in Parliament againſt the Pope's Bulls, his Proviſions and Reſervations, and the Proclamations and Inhibitions thereupon, the ſame evil Courſes, thro the connivance of the Biſhops and ſome of the Clergy (who made their advantage by them) were ſtill continu'd; for in the five and twentieth Year of his Reign, the Commons in a long Petition to the King and Peers of the Land, pray them to take notice of the great Miſchief and Deſtruction of late coming upon the Kingdom by the Pope's Reſervations, by Brocage, and purchaſing his Proviſions; and many of the former Grievances were again complain'd of, which turned to a greater ruin of the Nation than the whole War: and thereupon they requeſt that the King would pleaſe with his Council to ordain Remedy in that Parliament, for that the longer theſe things ſhould be ſuffer'd, there would be the greater difficulty in reforming them. And it was then agreed, that the Anſwer to this Petition ſhould be made a Statute; for which ſee the Statutes at large in Pulton's Collection of this Year. And in a ſecond Parliament of the ſame Year, the Commons pray that this Statute concerning Proviſions and Reſervations might be publiſhed, and put in execution, againſt ſuch as acted to the contrary.

Ibid.

Ib. part 2. n. 49.

The Anſwer was, that the Statute ſhould be recited before the Council, and if need were, it ſhould be better worded and amended, ſo as the Eſtate of the King and Kingdom might in all things be ſafe and preſerved. But indeed the true reaſon why theſe Statutes had ſo little effect, was, becauſe the Biſhops and Eccleſiaſticks being either afraid of, or willing to comply with the Pope, durſt not, or would not ſee theſe Laws put in execution.

Vid. Statute at large, 27 Ed. 3. c. 1. In the ſeven and twentieth Year of the King, upon the grievous Complaint of the Great Men and Commons, that divers of the King's People had been drawn out of the Kingdom, to anſwer things, the cogniſance whereof belong'd to the King's Court only, and that the Judgments given in the ſame Court were impeached in another Court, in prejudice and diſheriſon of the King and his Crown, and of the People of the Realm, and in deſtruction of the Common Law, it was accorded and aſſented to by the King Great Men and Commons, that if any of the King's Ligeance, who ſhould practiſe ſuch things, and upon warning given him to appear before Him and his Council, or before his Juſtices at the time appointed, to undergo the Law, ſhould not appear, he ſhould be put out of the Royal Protection, and his Lands, Goods and Chattels forfeited to the King, his Body to be impriſoned, and ranſomed at the King's will. During this Conteſt between Him and the Pope, or indeed the Secular and Eccleſiaſtick Power, the King was very kind to the Clergy in confirming their old, and granting them many new Liberties and Privileges, as appears by the Statutes at large in the 14th, 18th, and 25th Years of his Reign.

From this time all things were pretty quiet, and nothing conſiderable complain'd of in Parliament againſt the Pope and his Proviſions, until the forty ſeventh Year of his Reign; and then indeed the Commons again deſired Remedy againſt them, for that by reaſon thereof He received the firſt Fruits of Eccleſiaſtical Dignities, and by that means the Treaſure of the Realm was convey'd away, which they could not bear.

Rot. Parl. 47 Ed. 3. n. 30.

The Anſwer was, the King had Ambaſſadors at the Court of Rome concerning theſe matters, before whoſe return He could not give them any further ſatisfaction.

Ibid.

In the fiftieth Year of his Reign the Knights, Citizens and Burgeſſes who came to this Parliament for the Commonalty of the Realm, did pray the King and his Council, and ſupplicate on behalf of the ſaid Commonalty, that He would pleaſe to have good conſideration to the things underwritten and Faults following, and ordain convenient Remedy, which would be the moſt pleaſing to God, and acceptable to Holy Church, and moſt profitable to Him and his Kingdom that ever was done, it being their holy Faith and firm Hope, that thoſe who pleaſed God and Holy Church ſhould be accepted in whatever they did. The Heads of which excellent Petition and Declaration are as follow.

Rot. Parl. 50 Ed. 3. n. 94. printed in Dr. B's Append.

Firſt, that He would pleaſe to conſider how his Noble Progenitors, Kings of England, and other Great-men of the ſame Land, built Churches, and in proceſs of time, by great Devotion, endowed them with Riches, Rents, Lands, and great Poſſeſſions, Franchiſes and Temporalties, which, with what the King Himſelf had given, amounted to more than the third part of his Kingdom; and think how all theſe things were given upon ſuch Devotion and Intent, that the Profits riſing from them ſhould be ſpent where they were given, to the Honour of God, and Maintenance of the Places belonging to them, in Hoſpitality and Alms, and divers Works of Charity, in the Service of God and Holy Church, in Chaplains, Clerks and poor People, that prayed night and day for their Holy Father the Pope; for Holy Church, for the King and Kingdom, for Peace, for their Founders, Patrons and Benefactors, for their Souls, and thoſe of all Chriſtians; and alſo conſider how the King and other Great Men, by their eminent Devotion and Gifts to Holy Church, were in peaceable poſſeſſion to beſtow the Churches and Benefices, as Holy King Edward gave the Biſhoprick of Worceſter to St. Wulſtan; and afterward by Devotion of our Kings, it was granted, and by the Court of Rome confirm'd, that the Cathedral Churches ſhould have free

Ibid.

free Election of their Prelates, ſo that the Biſhopricks by true Election, and other Benefices of Holy Church, were given charitably (not out of Covetouſneſs, or by Simony) to the moſt Worthy of the Clergy, Men of ſtricteſt Lives, and holieſt Converſation, that could be found, being ſuch as would reſide upon their Benefices, preach, viſit and confeſs their Pariſhioners, and ſpend the Goods of Holy Church, to the Honour of God, and in Works of Charity, according to the Devotion and Intent of the Donors: and ſo long as theſe good Cuſtoms were continued, the Kingdom was proſperous, the People good and loyal, there was Peace and Quiet, and ſufficient of Treaſure, Grain, Cattel, and other Riches; but ſince theſe good Cuſtoms had been perverted, Covetouſneſs and Simony increaſed, the Kingdom had been full of Adverſities, as Wars, Peſtilence, Famine, Murrain amongſt Cattel, and other Grievances, whereby it was ſo much impoveriſhed and deſtroy'd, that there were not the third part of the People, or other things in it, for the Cauſes aboveſaid; and then follows, Ibid. Alſo it is to be conſider'd, that no Man in the World, who loved God, Holy Church, the King and Kingdom of England, but had great reaſon to think ſorrowfully of theſe things, and mourn that the Court of Rome, which was wont to be the Fountain, Root and Source of Sanctity, and Deſtruction of Covetouſneſs, Simony, and other Sins, had ſo craftily, by ſlow degrees, in proceſs of time gained the Collations of Biſhopricks, Dignities, Prebendaries, and other Benefices of Holy Church in England, of which the Pope always received the Tax or Firſt Fruits, and by his Bulls made ſeveral Tranſlations, that He might get the more; by which means, and by other Payments and Charges, the Biſhops became ſo very much in debt to the Court of Rome, that they ſold the Timber of their Biſhopricks, had Aid of their poor Tenants and Clergy; and indeed all Methods were taken to deſtroy the Church and Realm of England.

Ibid. Alſo it ought to be conſider'd, that there are many, who when they have purchaſed one Benefice of the Court of Rome, and paid the Tax, or Firſt-Fruits of it, the Brokers of Benefices reſiding in the Wicked City of Avignon, let them to farm, and ſent the Rents to their Brokers, to purchaſe more and greater Benefices: ſo that any ſorry Wretch, or miſerable Perſon, not worth or good for any thing, by ſuch Simony or Brokage, ſhould be prefer'd to Churches and Prebendaries, to the value of one thouſand Marks; whereas a * Doctor of Decrees, and a † Maſter in Divinity, muſt be ſatisfied with a ſmall Benefice of twenty Marks: So that Clerks loſt all their hopes of being advanced as ſuch, and for the ſame cauſe People forbore to put their Children to School; ſo as the Clergy, which is the Support of the Church, failed, and our Holy Faith declined, and in a little time would come to nothing.

Alſo it ought to be conſider'd, how that Strangers, Enemies to the Land, and others beyond Sea, had the Benefices, Riches and Rents of Holy Church in England, which never ſaw or would ſee their Pariſhioners; whereby the Service of God and Holy Church, and all Works of Charity become neglected, the Pariſhioners like to ſuffer in Body and Soul, their only care being to get the Profits of their Benefices out of the Kingdom: and by this way Holy Church is more deſtroy'd by ſuch wicked Chriſtians, than by Turks and Saracens.

Alſo it is to be conſider'd that the Law of Holy Church is ſuch, that the Benefices of Holy Church ought to be given freely out of pure Charity, without Price or Prayer, without the gift of Gold, Silver, or any thing elſe; and that Law and Reaſon will, that what is given by Devotion to Holy Church, ought to be ſpent to the Honour of God, according to the Devotion and Intent of the Donor, and not out of the Realm upon their Enemies.

Alſo it is to be conſidered, that God committed his Sheep to the Pope to paſture, and not to ſheer them; and that Lay-Patrons followed theſe Examples, and ſold their Churches, as God was ſold to the Jews, who put Him to Death.

Wherefore they deſired the King, that He would pleaſe to remember, this was the fiftieth Year of his Reign, which was called the Year of Jubilee, the Year of Grace and Joy; and it would be the greateſt Grace and Joy that ever happen'd to this Kingdom, and the moſt pleaſing to God and Holy Church, and all thoſe that love them, if the things aboveſaid were laid to heart, and agreeable Remedy provided for them. And then they propounded, that the King and Great-men ſhould write to the Pope, as had been before ordained in Parliament.

Ibid.

The King's Anſwer was, that He had ordain'd ſufficient Remedy before by Statutes and otherwiſe; that He was then applying to, and preſſing the Pope concerning this matter, and was fully reſolv'd to do it from time to time, until He had performed their deſires, as well concerning the things compriſed in this large Bill above-mentioned, as that which was to follow, which was very near the ſame.

Rot. Parl. 50 Ed. 3. n. 45. 104.

The Title of this Bill is, according to the Margin of the Parliament-Roll, Bille encontre le Pape & les Cardinaux, the Bill againſt the Pope and Cardinals; and the other which follows this on the Roll, and was almoſt the ſame, had this Title, Bills et Articles encontre le Pape & le Clergie. To both which the King anſwer'd as above.

It is likewiſe worth notice, that tho the ſecond Bill was near the ſame with the former, yet becauſe the Commons acquainted the King that there were ſeveral Spies reſiding in London, who had their Emiſſaries and Informers throughout all Parts of the Kingdom, that gave them notice when any Dignities or great Benefices fell vacant, that ſo they might ſend to the Cardinals, and other Perſons who were at the Court of Rome, to purchaſe them of the Pope.

Now ſeeing that in theſe Complaints there hath ſo often been made mention of the Papal Proviſions and Reſervations; for the better underſtanding thereof, here follows the form of one of them tranſlated into Engliſh.

This Reſervation was publiſhed at the Arches of London on the thirtieth of March, and on the next day of the ſame month at Rocheſter before the Monks: but they having choſen their Prior Hamon Heth Biſhop the day before the date of this Reſervation and Proviſion, after three Years trouble in waiting at Avignon and elſewhere at great Expences, the Pope confirm'd him in the Biſhoprick. Ib. f. 624.

In the fiftieth and fifty firſt Years of this King, John Wickliff Doctor in Divinity, by Preaching and Reading at Oxford, publiſhed many Opinions contrary to thoſe of the Church and Religion then here profeſs'd. Pope Gregory XI. hearing of it, ſent Wickliff's Opinions incloſed in his Letter or Bull, directed to the Arch-Bp of Canterbury and Bp of London, requiring them, to examine Him and his Opinions, and take his Confeſſion concerning them: and his Holineſs wrote another Letter to them, that if they found his Opinions to be ſuch as He had incloſed to them, they ſhould then forthwith keep Him in Bonds and ſafe Cuſtody, until they ſhould receive further Commands from Him. He wrote likewiſe a third Bull or Letter, to uſe all Dilligence to preſerve the King, Queen, their Children and Great Men of England from theſe Errors and Hereſies, and keep them ſteady in the Faith; and to require them ſtrictly to ſhew them favour, and give effectual Aſſiſtance, &c. All theſe Bulls or Letters are of the ſame Date at Rome, being the two and twentieth of May, and the ſeventh Year of his Pontificate A. D. 1377.

Knyghton, col. 2647.

Upon theſe Bulls, John Wickliff was cited to appear before the Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, and ſeveral other Doctors in the Church of the Friers-Preachers in London, whither he came, and thus explain'd himſelf concerning the Sacrament of the Altar, in theſe old Engliſh Words.

Ibid.

I knowlecke that the Sacrament of the Autere is very Goddus Body in fourme of Brede; but it is in another maner Goddus Body then it is in Hevene; for in Hevene it is ſene foote, in the fourme and figure of Fleſhe and Blode; but in the Sacrament Goddus Body is be myracle of God in fourme of Brede, and is he nouther of ſene foote, ne in Mannes figure, but as a Man leves for to thenke the kynde of an ymage, whether it be of Oke or of Aſhe, and ſettys his thouzt in him of whom it is the ymage; ſo myche more ſchuld a man leve to thenk on the kynde of Brede, but thenke upon Chriſt; for his Body is the ſame Brede that is the Sacrament of the Autere, and withalle clemes alle Devotion, and all Charitie that God wolde gif him, Worſchippe he Chriſt, and then He receyves God Goſtly, more medefully than the Prieſt that ſyngus the Maſſe in leſſe Charitie: For the Bodely etynge ne profytes nouth to Soule, but in as mykul as the Soul is fedde with Charitie, this Sentence is provyde be Chriſt that may nouzt lye; for, as the Goſpel ſays, Chriſt that night, that He was betrayed of Judas Scariot, He tok Brede in his Honds, and Bleſſide it, brak it, and gave it to his Diſciplus to ete; for He ſays, and may not lye, This is my Body.

What ſatisfaction this Explication gave to the Arch-Biſhop, and thoſe before whom he was convented, this Author ſays not; but Walſingham relates it was feigned and vain, and that the Arch-Biſhop and all others, the Duke of Lancaſter, and Lord Henry Piercy being preſent, commanded Silence to Dr. Wickliff, forbidding him for the future to meddle with, or treat upon that matter, or ſuffer others to diſcourſe or ſpeak upon it; and that he and his Followers were ſilent for ſome time.

Yet he was neither impriſon'd nor cenſured during his Life. His Opinions are variouſly and differently worded and ſtated, as well thoſe that were reputed and cenſured for Hereſies, as thoſe accounted but Errors, and ſo involv'd in the Terms of Scholaſtick Divinity then uſed, that they are now ſcarce intelligible. They are to be found in Spelman's ſecond Volume of the Councils, Henry de Knyghton, and in Wood's Antiquities of Oxford; but the plaineſt and cleareſt that were then eſteemed Hereſies, are in Walſingham's Hypodigma Neuſtriæ, which are here tranſlated.

1. That the Euchariſt in the Altar, after Conſecration, is not the true Body of Chriſt, but its Figure.
2. That the Church of Rome is not the Head of all Churches more than any other Church, nor was there any greater Power given to Peter than to any other Apoſtle.
3. That the Pope of Rome had no greater Power in the Keys of the Church, than any other Prieſt.
4. That the Temporal Lords (that were Patrons) might lawfully and meritoriouſly take away the Temporals from a Delinquent Church.
5. And that if a Temporal Lord knew a Church to be Delinquent, he was bound, under the pain of Damnation, to take the Temporals from it.
6. That the Goſpel was a ſufficient Rule for the Life of a Chriſtian, and that all other Rules of Saints, under the Obſervation whereof divers Religious live, add no more Perfection to the Goſpel, than Whiteneſs to the Wall.
7. That neither the Pope, nor any other Prelate of the Church, ought to have Priſons to puniſh Delinquents; but every Delinquent might freely go whither He would, and do what He would.

Theſe are his Opinions, which Walſingham recites under this Reign; tho doubtleſs he taught and preach'd up divers others in the Univerſity of Oxford, where he had many Followers, and thoſe of the Learned men, as likewiſe in other Places, which were cenſured in the next Reign.

I ſhall ſay no more of theſe Doctrines now, but leave them to the Reader to conſider, how far they afterwards prov'd the Groundwork and Principles of the Reformation began in the Reign of Henry VIII. and carried on under thoſe of King Edward VI. and Queen Elizabeth. And indeed (except the fourth and fifth concerning taking away the Temporals from a Delinquent Church) they are almoſt the ſame with thoſe of the Reformed Religion at this day profeſs'd in England, as well as other Countries.

VOL. III. BOOK XII.

Containing the Reign of King Richard II.

Anno Dom. 1377.

WHEN King Edward the Third Deceaſed, (as you have already heard) He immediately was ſucceeded by his Grandſon the Prince of Wales, by the Name of King Richard the Second, then in the Eleventh Year of his Age, not only (as it is ſaid in my Author) by Hereditary Right, but by the general Wiſhes and Conſents of the People, who had an extreme kindneſs and value for Him, in reſpect of Prince Edward his Father, whoſe Memory was, for his great Vertues, moſt dear to the Nation; and it was upon the Old Stock of Merit, that He for a long time maintained himſelf in the People's Affections, though he acted not as became the Royal Lineage from which he was deſcended; for whether, through the too great Indulgence of an over-fond Mother, or his own Natural wilful Temper, which was too much complied with by thoſe who had the care of his Education, is hard to be determined; but he fell into that Miſfortune of many young Princes of great Hopes, who coming to the ſupreme Command, before they know what it is to Obey, will obſerve no other Rules beſides their own obſtinate Humours; ſo that as his Government was much diſturbed by popular Inſurrections, and rendered unſucceſsful, by the jarring Councils and ill Management of his Governors, during his Minority; ſo, when he came to take the Reins of the Government into his own Hands, and was grown of full Age, he acted as if he had been ſtill a Minor, being govern'd more by his own

King Edward is ſucceeded by Prince Richard, not only by an Hereditary Right, but the general Conſent of the People, whoſe Affection to his Father continued to him for a great while, notwithſtanding his exorbitant Actions.

Paſſions, than by Law, Reaſon, or ſound Advice, as you will find in the whole Courſe of this Reign; however, at preſent, no Prince could ever aſcend the Throne with greater Hopes, nor be received with a more general Satisfaction.

[2] T. W. The Citizens of London apply themſelves to the young Prince and his Mother, deſiring their Protection and Mediation, with the Duke of Lancaſter.

[2] But I cannot omit taking notice of a Paſſage, which indeed properly belonged to the laſt Reign, yet becauſe it had ſo near a Relation to this, I thought fit to inſert it here; and that is, That on the very day of King Edward's Death, (however before he expired) there were ſome of the chief Citizens ſent by the City of London to the young Prince then at Kennington with his Mother, who by John Philpot, (their Mouth) acquainted him, that ſince his Grand-father was now departing, having the manifeſt Signs of Death upon him, they beſeeched his Highneſs's Favour to, and Protection of the Citizens and City of London (which was his Chamber) being unſpeakably diſturbed, that he was ſo far from them; for they were not only ready to venture their Eſtates, but alſo, if need were, to lay down their Lives for him; and therefore they beſought him, that he would come and reſide there; and further pray'd him, to vouchſafe to put an end to all Diſcords and Differences, between the Citizens and the Duke of Lancaſter.

[3.] Id. ib. The Ld. Latimer, with others, are ſent to the City to aſſure them of the King's Favour; and that they ſhould ſubmit all Differences between the Duke & them to the King.

In return to the ſaid Meſſage, [3.] on the Morrow after the Deceaſe of the late King, the Lord Latimer, Sir Nicholas Bond, Sir Simon Burley, and Sir Richard Adderbury, Knights, were ſent to the City of London, to aſſure them on the King's Behalf of his Kindneſs to their City, and ſpeedy Return to it, and Reſidence there, according to their Requeſt; and they did further let them know, that the King himſelf had, in Anſwer to their late Addreſs, already ſpoke for them to the Duke of Lancaſter, who had ſubmitted all Differences between himſelf and the Citizens, to the King's Pleaſure; and he therefore hoped, that if they would agree to do ſo likewiſe, a firm Reconciliation might ſoon be made up between them and the Duke his Uncle; but it ſeems, the Citizens were more terrified than pleaſed with this Meſſage, and would not ſubmit to it, knowing the King to be but little more than a Child, and not able to Patronize or Defend them, if he would; ſo that their Cauſe was like to be heard and diſcuſſed, before, as well as Sentence given, by their greateſt and moſt powerful Adverſaries, if they ſhould ſubmit to his Propoſal: But at laſt, after a long Debate, they came to this Iſſue; That if the Perſons who brought the Meſſage would oblige themſelves to the Citizens, that their Submiſſion ſhould not prove prejudicial, or bring any Damage to them or their City, they would then as willingly acquieſce in his Majeſty's Determination, as the Duke himſelf.

Which they at laſt accept of on condition.

[4.] Id. ib. The Meſſengers give the King and his Uncle an Account of their Negotiation with the City.

[4.] This Security being thus given, and accepted of by both Parties, the Meſſengers return'd to the King, whom they found at Sheen, with the Princeſs his Mother, and the Duke of Lancaſter, and the reſt of his Uncles, together with ſome Biſhops, who attended the Corps of the Deceaſed King; and there the Lord Latimer, and the reſt of them that were ſent, gave an Account of what had been tranſacted with the Citizens, and adviſed the King to endeavour a ſpeedy and juſt Reconciliation between them and the Duke, ſince they found them willing to ſubmit to his Majeſty's Pleaſure, in whatever ſhould appear juſt and reaſonable for them to d

[5.] This being Perform'd, and the King mounted on a ſtately Courſer, and attended by the Duke of Lancaſter (then Lord High-Steward of the Kingdom) and the Lord Piercy Earl-Marſhal, with many other Lords and Knights, He took his way towards London, Sir Simon Burley carrying the Sword before him, and Sir Nicholas Bonde walking on Foot, led his Horſe by the Bridle, being followed by many Perſons of Quality, and Young Noblemen of the King's own Age, each Troop having Trumpets ſounding before them: When they came to Cheapſide, they were magnificently received, a ſtately Pageant in the ſhape of a Caſtle being erected in the midddle of the Street, which ran with Wine all the while they paſſed by, part of which was ſerved to the King and Nobility in Golden Cups, by four Beautiful Damſels about the King's Age, who alſo ſtrewed Gilt Leaves and Flowers on his Head as he paſſed by; all the Noblemen, and eſpecially the Duke of Lancaſter, endeavouring all they could, by an extraordinary Affability, to gain the Good Will of the Common People; who receiving the King with great Joy and loud Acclamations, waited on him to his Palace at Weſtminſter, where he took up his Reſidence.

[5.] Id. ib. The K. makes his Entry into London with great State.

[1.] Then on Thurſday the Sixteenth of June, the Ceremony of his Coronation was performed in the Abbey-Church adjoyning, with great Pomp and Magnificence; the Particulars of which I paſs over, only ſhall take notice of ſome Paſſages not before obſerved, or elſe altered ſince the Coronation of King Richard I. The Oath the Young King took before the Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, and all the Biſhops and Lords there preſent, was ſomewhat larger than that already mentioned by our Hiſtorians, and conſiſted of theſe Articles: First, ~~That he would~~ permit the Church to enjoy ~~all her Liberties~~; ~~That he would reverence her Miniſters, and maintain the true Faith~~; ~~That he would reſtrain Violence, and all Oppreſſions~~, in all ſorts of Men; ~~That he would cauſe good Laws to be every where obſerved, eſpecially thoſe of St.~~ Edward, ~~King and Confeſſor~~; ~~and would alſo cauſe all evil Laws or Cuſtoms to be Abrogated~~; Laſtly, ~~That he would be no Reſpecter of Perſons, but would~~ give ~~Right~~ Judgment between ~~Man and Man, and would~~ chiefly obſerve Mercy in [illegible] Decrees or ~~Judgments, as God ſhould ſhew Mercy to him~~: This deſerves our Obſervation, becauſe this Form of the Coronation-Oath, with ſome ſmall Alterations, has been Adminiſtred to all ſucceeding Kings and Queens, ever ſince that Time.

Theſe things being performed, [2.] the Arch-Biſhop led the King (the Lord-Marſhal walking before him) to all the four ſides of the Scaffold, and ſhewing the King to the People, declared the Purport of the Oath he had now taken, and asked them, ~~If they would be ſubject to this Prince, as their lawful Ruler, and be obedient to his Commands~~? This Ceremony, tho' not mention'd before in any of our Hiſtorians, yet was no Innovation, but ſeems a Remainder of that Old Engliſh Cuſtom of Electing the King, as any One that will compare the manner of the Election and Coronation of King Edward the Confeſſor, and William I. with this Action, may obſerve; and which hath been obſerved in ~~all~~ Coronations ſince that time.

[3.] Id. ib. The King returns to his Palace to dinner, with the manner of it.

[3.] Then, after the King and Arch-Biſhop had Communicated of the Holy Euchariſt, and that Maſs was finiſhed, the King return'd back to his Palace, in the ſame Order as he came, the Wardens of the Cinque-Ports (according to their Office) carrying a Canopy of blue Velvet over him, ſupported by Staves of Silver; being come into the Great Hall, the Dinner was ſerved up with mighty Magnificence. It would be tedious to relate the ſeveral Services performed by divers Noblemen, Knights and Gentlemen, according to their ſeveral Tenures; only it was found to be the Right of the Lord-Mayor of London, being aſſiſted by ſome ſelect Citizens, to ſerve the King as Chief Cup-Bearer, and to have a Cup of Gold with a Gold Ear for his Fee; and it was at this Coronation, that I obſerve Sir John Dimmock was firſt admitted to ſerve as Champion to defend the King's Right to the Crown with his own Body, againſt any that ſhould deny the ſame; but how long before, this Cuſtom of a Champion had been in uſe, I do not find. Then the King created his Uncle, the Lord Thomas of Woodſtock, Earl of Buckingham, with a Penſion of a Thouſand Marks; John ~~Thomas~~ Mowbray Earl of Nottingham; and the Lord Guiſchard D'Ango~~leſme~~, the King's Governor, was made Earl of Huntington, with the like Penſion; and Henry Lord Percy, ~~Lord~~ Earl Marſhal, Earl of Northumberland.

(4) The next Day after the Coronation, there was a ſolemn Proceſſion of the Arch Biſhop, Biſhops, and Abbots, with the Temporal Lords there preſent, attended by a great number of People, to pray for the King, and Peace of the Kingdom: Before this Proceſſion the Biſhop of Rocheſter preached, and made an excellent Diſcourſe, exhorting the Auditory, that all Civil Diſſentions that had riſen of late between the People and their Superiors might now ceaſe: He alſo admoniſhed the Lords not to be ſo ſevere and hard to the ordinary People, or Commons; and then he likewiſe exhorted them all chearfully in general, to contribute to the Aid of the King and Kingdom, whenever there was Occaſion; and as for thoſe that were appointed to be about the King's Perſon, that they ſhould avoid all vicious Courſes, and practice purity of Life and Vertue; for if by their Connivance, or bad Example, the King declin'd from the Right Way, both He and the People would be in danger of Ruin; and it had been very happy for both, if this Biſhop's Advice had been followed as it ought. But, to come to things of another Nature.

The Kingdom being engaged in a War with France, at the Death of the late King, the French taking advantage of the unſettled Condition of the Realm, (5) within a Week after his Deceaſe, landed at Rye with a conſiderable Fleet, and burnt that Town; whereupon, immediately after the Coronation, the Earls of Cambridge and Buckingham were ſent to Dover, and the Earl of Salisbury and Southampton, with conſiderable Forces, to defend thoſe Parts; but it ſeems there was no Fleet then ready to take the Seas, for on the (1) Twenty-firſt of Auguſt following, the French, with a great many Galleys, landed in the Iſle of Wight, and burnt divers Towns there, and indeed took it all, except the Caſtle of Caresbrook; which being gallantly defended by

The King's Uncle, with other Noblemen and Bps. appointed Governors of the King and Kingdom.

But though the Kingdom ſeem'd to be govern'd by a Council of Noblemen and Biſhops, (3) yet the Duke of Lancaſter had for a time the greateſt Share in publick Affairs; yet whether it was becauſe he fear'd the Envy and Hatred of the Clergy and common People, who were already much incenſed againſt him, or that he thought his Advice not ſufficiently follow'd; ſo that if any thing ſhould happen amiſs, it might be laid to his Charge: He took leave of the Court for a time, and retired to the Caſtle of Kenelſworth, where he kept a Court like a great Prince; however, before his Departure, there were placed neareſt about the King (by the Duke's Conſent and Appointment) William Courtney, Biſhop of London, (who was ſhortly after made Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury) and Edmund Mortimer, Earl of Marche, becauſe they were Perſons of whom all Men had a good Opinion for their Worth and Vertue; but the Lord Latimer and Biſhop of Saliſbury, who were alſo named among them, being Men of a quite different Character, the People murmur'd at it; the Earl of Northumberland alſo reſigned his Office of Lord-Marſhal, and was ſucceeded by Sir John D'Arundel, Brother to the Earl of that Name.

A Parliament ſummoned 15 days after Michaelmas.

The Cauſes of the Summons declared by the A. B. and Sir R. l'Eſcrope, who deſire their Advice.

Yet it ſeems the Duke's Receſs from publick Buſineſs was not very long; for a Parliament being ſummoned about the middle of Auguſt, to meet Fifteen Days after Michaelmas, we find, * by the Writ of Summons, the Duke appeared at it; when the Eſtates of the Kingdom were aſſembled accordingly, the † Cauſe of Summons was declared by the Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury; and further rehearſed by Sir Richard L'Eſcrope, which was to this effect; That the Commons would adviſe the King, by what moſt fitteſt Means His, and the Kingdom's Enemies might be reſiſted, and how the Expence of each Reſiſtance was to be born, with the greateſt Eaſe to the Subject, and Profit and Honour to the Kingdom.

The Commons prayed, that certain Lords might be joyned with them.
* Ib. N. 13.
The Names of the Peers named to be ſent unto 'em.

Then * the Commons pray'd the King, that for the Difficulty of their Charge, (that is, the Declaration of Summons) and for the weakneſs of their Abilities, it would pleaſe his Majeſty to let certain Prelates and Lords be joined with them, for their Aid and Aſſiſtance, to commune and treat with them in theſe weighty Affairs, for the more haſty and good diſpatch of the Buſineſs wherewith they were charged, * viz. the King of Caſtile and Duke of Lancaſter, the Biſhops of London, Ely, Rocheſter, and Carliſle, the Earls of March, Arundel, Warwick, and Angos, the Lord Nevil, Henry and Sir Richard L'Eſcrope, and Sir Richard de Stafford, which was accordingly granted by the King in Parliament.

‖ Ibm.
The Duke of Lancaſter excuſed himſelf from going to the Commons becauſe he had been defamed by them.

Then ‖ the Duke of Lancaſter immediately ſtood up, and falling upon his Knees before the King, humbly pray'd him to hear him a little in a weighty Cauſe, that concern'd himſelf; and then ſaid, Though the Commons had choſen him for one of the Lords to commune with them of the ſaid Matters, yet he deſired his Majeſty would pleaſe to excuſe him, for that the Commons had ſpoken ill of him, and ſo ill, that he had committed maniſeſt Treaſon, if their Report was true; which GOD forbid, being always careful not to do any ſuch thing, as the Truth was notably known; and further added, That none of his Anceſtors, either of one ſide or other, was ever a Traytor, but True and Loyal; and it was a very marvellous thing how he ſhould deviate from the Line, for that he had more to loſe than any other in the Kingdom; and further he ſaid, That if any Man, of what Eſtate or Condition ſoever he was, ſhould be ſo hardy, as to lay Treaſon, or other Diſloyalty, to his Charge, or any thing done by him, prejudicial to the Kingdom, he was ready to defend himſelf by his Body, or otherwiſe by Award of the King and Lords, as if he were the pooreſt Knight Bachelor of the Realm.

‖ Ib. N. 14.
Whereupon, the Prelates, Lords and Commons acquitted him from all blame and Defamation.

‖ Whereupon the Prelates, and all the Lords, ſtood up, and with one Voice excuſed and prayed him to leave off ſuch Diſcourſe, for they thought no Man living would ſay any ſuch thing: The Commons alſo ſaid in their own Defence, it was apparent and notorious; that they thought him free from all Blame and Defamation, inaſmuch as they had choſen him to be their principal Aider, Comforter and Counſellor in this Parliament; praying with one Voice to have them excuſed from all ſuch Reports.

The Duke deſires that the Inventer and Spreaders of ſuch falſe Reports be puniſhed.

Then the Duke ſaid, The Words had been long, though falſely, thrown about the Kingdom; and he wondered how any Man could, or would begin, or continue ſuch Slanders for the Diſgrace and Danger that might thence enſue; becauſe the firſt Inventer of ſuch Speeches, by which Debate might be moved, between the King and Lords of the Land, was a manifeſt Traytor; ſince ſuch Debates might turn to the Deſtruction of the Kingdom: And therefore prayed, that a good Ordinance, and a juſt and ſpeedy Puniſhment might be provided in that Parliament, againſt ſuch Spreaders and Inventers of evil Reports, for the avoiding ſuch Miſchiefs for the time to come; but as for the time paſt, all ſhould be forgiven as to his own Perſon.

* And becauſe the King was then young, and of tender Age, therefore, for the Amendment of ſeveral Miſchiefs, and the Preſervation of the Realm, which was at that time in greater Danger than ever before, the Commons prayed the King and Lords of Parliament, for three things eſpecally;

* Ib. N. 17, 18. The Commons pray the King and Lords for 3 things of great Moment.

Firſt, That they would, in that Parliament, appoint and name Eight Perſons of divers Eſtates, to be the continual Counſellors of the King, for the Buſineſs of the Kingdom, together with the King's Officers; and that they might be ſuch Perſons as beſt knew, and moſt diligently would and could take Pains in the amendment of the impending Miſchiefs, and for the good Government and Preſervation of the Realm; and that the Commons might know the Names of thoſe Counſellors, which alſo might be the Layers out and Directors of what Money was to be given towards the Wars.

|| Secondly, That they would pleaſe to name and appoint in that Parliament, ſuch as ſhould be about the King's Perſon, Men of vertuous and honeſt Converſation, that might educate him accordingly; and that the Charge of the King's Houſe might be born with the Revenue of the Crown, ſo that what was granted for the Wars might only be imployed that way.

|| Thirdly, That the Common Law, and other Statutes and Ordinances of the Land, might be Obſerved, Ratified and Confirmed, and the People Governed by them; and they might not be defeated by the Conceitedneſs or Singularity of any about the King, &c. ſaving in all things the Regalities and Dignity of the King, to which the Commons would not that any prejudice ſhould be done any way by their Demands.

|| Ib. N. 20.

The || Anſwer to theſe Petitions was, That the Prelates and Lords would adviſe together, commanding the Commons, in the mean while, to return to their Place, and treat of their other Charges given to them between that time and Thurſday next, and then they ſhould have an Anſwer to their Requeſts.

|| Ibm.

The || firſt Requeſt of the Commons being recited before the King and Lords, was by them granted; yet ſo as the Chancellor, Treaſurer, and Keeper of the Privy-Seal, Juſtices of one Bench and the other, and all other Officers of the Realm, might execute their Offices, without the preſence of thoſe Counſellors, who by Advice of the Lords were then appointed, || being Nine in Number; viz. the Biſhops of London, Carliſle, and Salisbury, rhe Earls of March and Stafford, Sir Richard de Stafford, and Sir Henry L'Eſcrope, Banerets; Sir John D'Everouſe, and Sir Hugh Segrave, Bachelors. Which || Nine Prelates, Earls and others, thus choſen in Council for this Year, were ſworn before the King himſelf, to do what they were choſen for, in the preſence of divers Lords in Parliament.

|| Ibm.

The Lords do not think the ſecond Requeſt fit to be granted.

ſwered, That it ſeemed to them for many Cauſes too heavy and hard a Requeſt to place any Perſon about the King, that ſhould not be acceptable to him; or to remove any Officer, or Servant, if it were not by his expreſs Will, and for ſome notable fault to be proved againſt ſuch Officers and Servants; wherefore, the Lords would not willingly meddle with theſe Matters.

[1] Ibm.

To [1] the other part of this Requeſt, the Lords anſwered, that they would take good Deliberation, and ſpeak with the great Officers of the King's Houſhold about it, and if by their Advice it could be done, ſaving the State and Honour of the King, what they deſired ſhould be performed.

[2] Ibm.

As [2] for the third Petition it ſeemed reaſonable to all the Lords, that it ſhould be granted.

[3] Ib. N. 27. The Lords and Commons grant the K. a Tax for the defence of the Kingdom.

Then [3] the Lords and Commons perceiving the imminent Danger the Nation was in, by reaſon of the great Wars, both by Sea and Land, for the defence of the Kingdom, and reſiſtance of its great Enemies, granted the King two Fifteenths without Cities and Burghs, and two Tenths within Cities and Burghs for two Years; praying the King, that as well the Money of the ſaid Tenths and Fifteenths, as the Tenths granted by the Clergy, and Money for the Subſidy of Wool, might be in the keeping of eſpecial Treaſurers by his own Appointment, which were William Walworth and John Philpot, Merchants of London, who were to give an Accompt of their Receipts and Disburſements, in manner as the King and his Council ſhould order.

[4] Ibm. 41. 42. Alice accuſed in Parliament for proſecuting Buſineſs at Court, and in what Particulars.

In this Parliament [4] Alice Perrers was brought before the Lords, where Sir Richard L'Eſcrope, Steward of the King's Houſhold, by the Command of the Prelates and Lords, recited, in the Preſence of the ſaid Alice, an Ordinance made in the Parliament holden at Weſtminſter, in the Fiftieth Year of the late King Edward the Third, That no Woman, eſpecially Alice Perrers, ſhould proſecute any Buſineſs in the King's Court, by way of Maintenance, upon pain of Forfeiture and Baniſhment out of the Kingdom; and the ſaid Seneſchal or Steward, further informed the Lords, that ſhe had incurred the penalty of it in two Points: Firſt, That Sir Nicholas Dagworth, being ordered by the King's Council to go into Ireland, upon ſeveral Matters of great Moment to the King and Realm, ſhe had perſuaded the King that the ſaid Nicholas (to the great prejudice of both) ſhould be Countermanded: Secondly, That Richard Lyons, having, for certain Miſpriſions, for which he was Convicted in the late Parliament, ſubmitted himſelf to the King's Grace, as to his Body, Lands and Goods, the ſaid Alice had procured the King, with the Aſſent of his Council, to pardon the ſaid Richard Three Hundred Pounds which he had owed to the Exchequer, and had further granted him a Thouſand Marks as a Gift; which things being contrary to the ſaid Ordinance, the Steward demanded of the ſaid Alice, how ſhe could clear her ſelf of thoſe Articles? Then the ſaid Alice anſwered, that ſhe was not Culpable or Guilty of them, which ſhe was ready to aver and prove by the Witneſs and Teſtimony of John D'Ipre (at that time Steward of the King's Houſe) William Sheet Comptroller, Sir Allen Buxhall, Nicholas Carren, Keeper of the Privy Seal, and others of the Court of the late King, who were preſent at the time of the ſuppoſed Forfeiture.

She denies the Accuſation, and offers Witneſſes to clear her.

Anno Dom. 1377.

But the Depoſitions of theſe Witneſſes being ſomewhat long, I ſhall only give you a ſhort Abridgement of them, which was to this effect,

[1] Ibm. 43. The Depoſition of the Witneſſes on her behalf.

[1] That upon Wedneſday, the Day aſſigned for the Examination of the Witneſſes, they were examined and ſworn before the Duke of Lancaſter, the Earl of Cambridge, and other Lords; and it appeared, by the Teſtimony of Sir Roger Beaumont, Chamberlain to the late King, that he being asked to deliver a Bill, containing the Revocation of Nicholas Dagworth, and importuned by the ſaid Alice ſo to do; yet he had refuſed to do it, becauſe it was contrary to a late Order of Council: But the late King asking what they talked about, and being informed of the Contents of the Bill, he thereupon voluntarily declared, That the Petition was reaſonable; and when Sir Roger reply'd, that his Council had ordained to the contrary, the King anſwered, He was Sovereign Judge, and it ſeemed to Him that the former Order was reaſonable, and Commanded him to call back the ſaid Nicholas, which was done accordingly: Then the Duke of Lancaſter himſelf depoſed much to the ſame purpoſe, concerning the recalling of Sir Nicholas Dagworth, that the King had declared, It was not reaſonable one Enemy ſhould judge another, and therefore he thought fit to Countermand his Voyage, though he (the Duke) had ſatisfied the King, it was done by his Conſent in Council, who not long after came from Alice Perrer's Chamber, to the Duke and told him, he muſt not ſuffer Dagworth to go to Ireland; but the Duke would not then comply, by reaſon it was otherwiſe Ordained by King and Council, though afterwards, at the King's expreſs Command, Dagworth was Countermanded. But as to the Article of Richard Lyons, he ſaid in his Conſcience he believed Alice Perrers was the chief Promotreſs of that Buſineſs; but he was not then preſent himſelf.

[2] Ibm. She is proved Guilty of procuring Richard Lyons pardon.

[2] Nicholas Carren being Sworn, depos'd, That coming to the King at Sheen, he there found Richard Lyons; and they two being commanded to come to the King's Bed-ſide, he there ſaw Dame Alice ſitting at his Bed's-head; where was ſhewed, That the King would pardon the ſaid Richard Three Hundred Pounds, due to him upon Accompt in the Exchequer, and alſo give him a Thouſand Marks of his Treaſure, and reſtore him what was given him to his Sons, the Earl of Cambridge, and Lord Thomas of Woodſtock; and commanded him, the ſaid Nicholas, to let his Sons know ſo much; and that the King revoked theſe Grants of his meer Grace. After him Sir Alein Buxhall Swore much to the ſame purpoſe, as that Alice Perrers then further deſired the King, to acquaint the ſaid Earls of his Pardon to Lyons; which at her Inſtance, the King commanded Buxhall to do; and preſently after, there were Twelve other Perſons called in, who were moſt of them Witneſſes, who in the Nature of a Jury or Inqueſt being Sworn, and charged to ſpeak the Truth, Whether the ſaid Alice were culpable, or not, of what ſhe was charged with; they ſound her Guilty, according to the Intent of the Statute made in the Fiſtieth Year of Edward III. then conſidering the Damages and Villanies by her done, ſhe was ſentenced by Parliament to be Baniſhed, and her Lands, Chattels, Tenements in Preſent and Reverſion, to be forfeited, and ſeized into the King's Hands; and it was further ordained by the King, and Lords in that preſent Parliament, That all her Land in Feoffees's Hands, and purchaſed in Truſt, ſhould be alſo Forfeited; but that it was the Intention of the King and Lords, That this Law, particularly made for the prevention of

She being found Guilty by an Inqueſt or Jury of 12 Men, is Condemned by the Lords to Baniſhment; and that all her Eſtate ſhould be Confiſcated.

ſuch odious things, ſhould not be made uſe of, nor drawn into Example, againſt any other Perſon, or in any other Caſe.

I have nothing more to obſerve concerning this Lady, but that not long after, ſhe Married Sir William of Windſor, a Perſon of Note, and notwithſtanding this Act or Ordinance laſt mentioned, they both in the next Parliament [1] Petitioned for a Revocation of it, for divers Errors therein recited; and they thereupon obtained a Reverſal of the ſame; which lets us ſee how different and uncertain the Cenſures of Parliaments were in thoſe Times, as well as our own.

[1] Rot. Parl. 2. Rich. 2. N. 36.

She not long after marries Sir William Windſor, and they obtain a Reverſal of the late Judgment in the next Parliament.

I ſhall now give you ſome other remarkable Petitions of the Commons, with the King's Anſwers to them. [2] The Commons pray'd, that becauſe the late King Edward was guided by evil Counſellors, as had been authentickly proved, that they might be removed from all the King's Councils; and that other fit Perſons might be put in their Places; and further, that no Officers of the King's Court, great or ſmall, do keep up Quarrels or Suits in the Country by Maintenance, nor meddle with any thing, but what belongs to their Office.

[2] Ib. N. 49. The Commons pray, that all evil Counſellors be put from the King, with another Requeſt againſt Maintenance.

As [3] to the firſt Requeſt, the King granted it; and as to the Second, touching Maintenance, he further inforced it, by ſtreightly forbidding any Counſellor, Officer, or other Servant, or others belonging to Him, in the Kingdom, to uphold any Quarrel or Suit by Maintenance, under pain of loſing their Offices and Services, and to be Impriſoned, and Ranſomed at the King's Pleaſure.

[3] Ibm. Both which are granted.

The [4] Commons alſo pray'd, That during the King's Minority, the Chancellor, High-Treaſurer, Chief Juſtices of one Bench and the other, the Chief Baron of the Exchequer, the Steward and Treaſurer of the Houſhold, the Chief Chamberlain and Clark of the Privy-Seal, the Wardens of the Foreſts on this ſide Trent and beyond, might be made by Parliament; and if it ſhould happen, that any of theſe Miniſters or Officers ſhould be laid aſide, between one Parliament and another, that then another be put in his Place, by the King's Council, until the next Parliament ſhould meet.

[4] Ib. N. 50. The Commons deſire, that the Chancellor, and chief Juſtices and chief Baron, with other great Officers of the Kingdom, ſhould be made by Parliament.

This [5] Petition was likewiſe granted in part, that while the King was under Age, the Counſellors, Chancellor, Steward of the Houſhold, and Chamberlain, ſhould be all choſen by the Lords in Parliament, Saving always the Eſtate and Heritage of the Earl of Oxford, to the Office of Chamberlain; and as to the other Officers above-named, the King ſhould make them by the Aſſent of his Council.

[5] Ibm. Which is granted during the K's Minority.

Their [6] next Petition was againſt the ſetting free of Villains, belonging as well to Clergy-men as Lay-Lords, many having lately withdrawn themſelves, by Procurement of certain Adviſers, Maintainers, and Abettors in the Country, who received Money of them, by colour of Exemplifications, purchaſed in the King's Court out of Domeſday Book, of the Mannors and Towns where they dwelt, by means of which they had diſcharged themſelves of all manner of Service; and therefore to prevent this, they humbly pray due Remedy.

[6] Ib. N. 88. The Commons Petition againſt the ſetting free Villains.

To [7] which the Anſwer was, That as to the Exemplifications, Grants, and what elſe had been done in Chancery, it was declared in Parliament, that they could not, nor ought to be of any Value, or take Place, as to the Freedom of the Bodies of ſuch Villains, nor change the Condition of their Tenure and Cuſtom antiently due, nor do any prejudice to their Lords concerning them; who if they would, might

Anno Dom. 1377.

Then [1] the Citizens of London deſired, that upon the King's ſpecial Grace, and for the Enlargement of the Franchiſes of their City, if any Article in the Charter granted by Him or his Progenitors, to the ſaid Citizens, ſhould prove difficult or doubtful, and might be taken in divers Senſes, that then the Senſe they claim'd to have it in, ought to be allowed.

[1] Ibm. The Londoners deſire an Enlargement of their Franchiſe, &c.

To [2] this the Anſwer was, That the Interpretation of the King's Charters belonged to Him; and if any Doubt aroſe thereupon, the King, by Advice of his Council, would make ſuch Interpretation, as ſhould be according to Reaſon and good Faith; and ſo this Parliament ended. ⁎

[2] Ibm. The King's Anſwer.

⁎ I find nothing else to have been transacted worth our notice in England, but that the Bp. of Winchester, who in the end of the late King's Reign had been accused of great crimes and misdemeanors (as in particular for converting several great sums of ye State Kings money to his own private use) being now reconciled to the Duke of Lancaster by his advice and consent as also of all the rest of the Privy Council, obtained the King's pardon under the great Seal bearing date July 31 of all treasons and other crimes whatsoever. After which he continued in favour all the time of his [illegible] some years after he was again made L. Chancellor, as you will find hereafter. Rot: Claus 1. R. 2. m. p. 7. 1 [illegible] [illegible] vid: 2d. vol. p. 163 in 168.

As [3] to Foreign Affairs, they were manag'd with various Fortune; for the Scots breaking in upon that part of Scotland which was under the Engliſh Dominion, burnt the Town of Roxburgh; but the Earl of Northumberland, in Revenge, entred Scotland with Ten Thouſand Men, and for Three Days together ravaged and ſpoiled the Land of the Earl of Marche, becauſe he was the cauſe of the burning the Town laſt mentioned: But ſome time after, the Scots took the Caſtle of Berwick by Surprize; upon which ill News, the Earls of Northumberland and Nottingham, with the Lords Nevil, Lacy, and Stafford, beſides other Men of Quality, preſently marched down thither, with a ſufficient Army of Three Thouſand Horſe, and Seven Thouſand Archers; who entering the Town, beſieged the Caſtle, and at laſt took it by Aſſault, and kill'd all the Scots they found in it, except Alexander Ramſey their Governor. As ſoon as the Engliſh had thus recover'd the Caſtle, they marched farther into Scotland, in hopes to meet with, and fight the Scots; who watching for ſome Advantage, kept out of ſight: Then the Engliſh Generals, ſending out Sir Thomas Muſgrave, a Knight of Cumberland, with Three Hundred Lances, and Three Hundred Archers, as far as Melros, to make Diſcovery; they, for want of good Intelligence, fell into part of the Scotiſh Army under Earl Douglas, conſiſting of about Three Thouſand Men, who ſoon putting the Engliſh to the Rout, took Sir Thomas Muſgrave, and Sixſcore others, Priſoners, the reſt being either killed, or ſaved themſelves by Flight.

[3] T. W. ad hunc An. The Scots burn Roxburg.

And ſurprize the Caſtle of Berwick, which is retaken by the Earls of Northumberland and Nottingham.

A Party of Engliſh under Sir Tho. Muſgrave is routed, and himſelf taken Priſoner.

But in France Matters went much worſe; [4] for not long after, the French having beſieged the Town of Ardres near Calais, had it betray'd to them by the Captain of the Caſtle, called the Lord De Gurny, a German; for which Crime he was ſeized by Sir Hugh Calverly, Governor of Calais, by whom he was ſent into England, and committed cloſe Priſoner: Nor were Affairs much better in Aquitain, where Sir Thomas de Hilton, the King's Lieutenant, tho' a Perſon of great Valour, yet falling too raſhly, with a few Men, upon a much greater number of French, he was by them routed, and taken Priſoner, with divers other Gentlemen, near the Town of Reole.

[4] Id. ib. The French take Ardres, near Calais, it being betray'd by the Governor, for which he is ſent Priſoner into England.

Sir Tho. Hilton taken Priſoner in Aquitain.

And to put the reſt of the Affairs of France together, about the end of this Year, [5] Sir Hugh Calverly, Governor of Calais, marched thence before Day; and coming early in the Morning to Bologne, burnt and plundered moſt part of the lower Town, and then returned back with a good Booty of Cattle, and other Goods. Alſo Sir Rob. de Galle, Governor of the Caſtle of Merck, not far from Calais, being gone into England, certain Picards that were there in Gariſon, took that Opportunity, by the Negligence of the Engliſh Soldiers, to deliver that Place to the French; but Sir Hugh Calverly hearing of it, made ſuch quick Diſpatch, that marching thither with a Body of Men, he retook the Caſtle the ſame Day, and hang'd up thoſe Picards that had betray'd it.

[1.] Id. ib. The Engliſh Fleet goes out to take a Navy of Spaniſh Ships, but is diſperſed by a Storm.

But the Engliſh had not ſo good Succeſs at Sea; [1] for the young Earl of Buckingham, the Duke of Bretagne, the Lord Latimer, the Lord Fitzwalter, and Sir Robert Knolls, with divers other Noblemen, going on Board the Fleet, which was now got ready, with a great number of Mariners, reſolved to go againſt a great Navy of Spaniſh Ships, that then lay in the Haven of Sluice, which they did, but with bad Fortune; for a great Storm taking them in their Paſſage, the Fleet was diſperſed, and driven into divers parts of England, having ſuffer'd great Damage in their Maſts, Sails, and other Tackle; which, when they had refitted, they went out again a ſecond time, againſt the Spaniards; and though they then met with ſome bad Weather, yet was not their ill Succeſs ſo much owing to that, as to the Cowardice and Treachery of the Captains and Seamen of great part of the Engliſh Fleet; for when their Admiral, the Earl of Kent, was about to fall again upon that of the Spaniards, that Squadron which was Commanded by the Lord Fitz-Walter, did not only refuſe to bear up to the Earl's Aſſiſtance; but when their Commander reproved them for their Stubbornneſs, they were like to have flung him over Board, had he not got off in a Barge; and coming up to the Earl, they fell upon the Spaniards, and took Eight of their Veſſels; and might have taken more, had they not been baſely deſerted by the reſt; ſo that they were forced to return again into Harbour preſently after Chriſtmaſs: Yet another part of the Fleet that ſtay'd behind to refit, had much better Succeſs in the beginning of the Year enſuing, when the Sea-Affairs were however carried on with various Fortune.

And going out again, met with a worſe Diſappointment through the Cowardice of part of the Seamen.

[2] T. W. ad hunc An. Sir Tho. Piercy, with a few Veſſels, takes a Fleet of Spaniards and Flemmings.

For [2] about the beginning of this preſent Year, Sir Thomas Piercy having repair'd the Damage that had been done to his Ships by the late Storms, ſet out again with only one great Ship, two Barks, and ſome other ſmaller Veſſels; and meeting Fifty Ships laden with French Goods, whereof ſome were Spaniards and others Flemings, (having warned the latter to ſeparate from the former, and it being by them refuſed) he ſet upon them all together; inſomuch, that they being terrified with his Valour, and ſuppoſing he had more Ships behind, made but ſmall Reſiſtance; ſo that he took Two and Twenty of them, all the reſt ſaving themſelves by Flight; ſo that this Nobleman, with his ſmall Squadron, return'd home with that Succeſs as exceeded all Expectation.

[3.] Id. ib. The Duke of Lancaſter offers to put out a Fleet with the publick Moneys; but before it can ſet out, one Mercer, with certain other French and Spaniſh Ships, takes ſeveral Engliſh in the Harbour of Scarburgh.

Not [3] long after this, the Duke of Lancaſter, beginning now to concern himſelf in publick Affairs, deſired to have the Management of great part of the Money that had been granted by the laſt Parliament, promiſing therewith to ſet out a powerful Fleet, to make good the late Loſs and ill Succeſs; and to this end, he ſent and hired Nine great Ships from Bayonne, which in their paſſage to England took Fourteen French Veſſels, laden with Wine and other Merchandize; but before this Fleet could be got ready, one Mercer, a Scotiſh Man, came, with certain French and Spaniſh Veſſels under his Command, into the Harbour of Scarburgh, and there took ſeveral Ships, and carried them away. This he did in Revenge of his Father's Impriſonment, who being a noted Pirate, and having been ſome time before taken at Sea, and delivered to the Earl of Northumberland, was by his Order then kept Priſoner in the Caſtle of that Place; but John Philpot, Alderman of London, a Perſon remarkable for his Courage, as well as Riches, being grieved at this ill Management, complain'd to the King's Council of the Damage he had lately received, and deſired ſpeedy Redreſs; but not being able to obtain any more than fair Promiſes of them, he grew impatient at theſe Delays, and without any more ado, ſet out a competent Fleet at his own Charge; and going with them in Perſon, not long after met Fifteen Spaniſh Veſſels richly laden, which were part of Mercer's Fleet, and making them Prize, was very well paid for the Money he had laid out of Pocket; but not long after, being called in Queſtion by the Lords of the King's Council, for preſuming to ſet out Men of War without their Advice or Command, he made ſo good a Defence to the Earl of Stafford, and others that laid it to his Charge, that he was diſmiſſed without any farther trouble.

Alderman Philpot ſets out a Fleet at his own Charge, and takes 15 Spaniſh Veſſels richly laden. For which being queſtion'd before the Lords of the Council, he makes a good Defence, and is acquitted.

Some time [1] after, the Earls of Salisbury and Arundel, having got part of the Fleet that was ready to ſet out, ſailed over towards Normandy, to aſſiſt the King of Navarre, who was then fallen out with the French King, his Brother in Law; but part of the Fleet met with ill Succeſs in their Paſſage thither; for Sir Philip and Sir Peter Courtney, two Brothers, then Commanding a Squadron of the Engliſh Navy, fell unwarily into the midſt of a ſtrong Fleet of Spaniards; and being by them over-power'd, Sir Peter, after the loſs of a great many Men, was forced to ſave himſelf by Flight, being alſo grievouſly Wounded; but Sir Philip was taken Priſoner, with thoſe Knights that accompanied him, a great many other Gentlemen of the Weſt Country being either Kill'd or Drowned, to the great Loſs and Prejudice of the Nation; nevertheleſs, the Earls above-mentioned, with the reſt of the Fleet, arrived ſafe in the Haven of Cherburgh, which, together with the Town and Caſtle adjoining, was delivered to them by way of Mortgage, by the King of Navarre; and it afterwards proved very prejudicial to the French, in that part of Normandy.

Sir Philip and Sir Peter Courtney, with the Squadron under their Command, are taken by the Spaniards, and many Men are loſt.

Then preſently after Midſummer, the Engliſh Fleet being ready to ſet Sail under the Comand of the Duke of Lancaſter, who was accompanied with the Earls of Warwick, Stafford, and ſome others of the Engliſh Nobility, they ſteered for the Coaſt of Bretagne, and arriving before St. Malo's, laid cloſe Siege to it by Sea and Land; but the Town being naturally ſtrong, was ſo well defended, that the Duke was forced to raiſe the Siege, and return home, without doing any thing of Moment.

Not long after this, there happen'd an Accident, which, tho' of no publick Concern, yet caus'd a great Diſturbance, and highly increaſed the Hatred of the People, againſt that Duke: [2] The Buſineſs was thus; a Spaniſh Nobleman, called the Earl of Denia, having been taken Priſoner in the late War in Spain, by Rob. Haullie and John Shakel, two Eſquires of Note, he found ſo much Favour, that upon leaving his Eldeſt Son as a Pledge for his Ranſom, he had his Liberty, on Condition he ſhould raiſe the Money for his Ranſom, ſo ſoon as he came home; which he neglecting to do, his Son remained here a Priſoner till his Father's Death, who had taken no care at all to Redeem him: But the Duke of Lancaſter, being now deſirous to have this young Earl in his own Hands, in order to the Deſign he had upon Spain, procured the King to ſend to theſe Gentlemen, to deliver their Priſoner to the Duke, which they looking upon as a very hard and unjuſt Proceeding, refuſed, and ſlipped him out of the way, and were thereupon committed cloſe Priſoners to the Tower for their Contempt; but not long after, finding Means to eſcape from thence, they took Sanctuary in the Abbey of Weſtminſter: The Duke of Lancaſter highly offended at this, ſent Sir Alein Buxhall, the Conſtable of the Tower, and Sir R. Ferrars, with Fifty Armed Men, to take theſe two Gentlemen out of the Sanctuary by Force; and coming upon them whilſt they were at Maſs, ſeized Shakel, and carried him away Priſoner to the Tower; but as for Hall, he made ſo vigorous a Defence with a ſhort Fawchion he had about him, that they could not take him; at laſt, in traverſing his Ground about the Choir, to avoid the Aſſaults of thoſe that came upon him, they got that Advantage, that one of them broke his Scull even to the Brains, whilſt another ran him thro' with a Sword: And at the ſame time Murthered a Servant of his, that took his part; as alſo a Monk, that interceded to ſave his Life. This Action was highly reſented by the Clergy, inſomuch that the Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, and Five other Biſhops of his Province, openly declared all thoſe Excommunicated that had any Hand in theſe Murthers, and particularly Sir Alein Buxhall, and Sir Ralph Ferrars, their Leaders; as alſo all that aided, counſelled, or adviſed the doing of it; only the King, with his Mother, and the Duke of Lancaſter, were excepted by Name; yet for all this, the Duke's Power was ſo great, that I do not find any Temporal Puniſhment inflicted on the Actors of this horrid Murther, which ſhews us with how great Partiality Juſtice was Adminiſtred, during this King's Minority: But we ſhall now proceed to Matters of more publick Concern.

One of the Gentlemen that kept the Earl is taken out of the Sanctuary, and impriſoned, for refuſing to deliver him.

Divers being killed in the taking of him, the A. B. of Canterbury excommunicates all thoſe that had a hand in it.

A [1] Parliament was ſummoned to meet on the Twentieth of October at Glouceſter, (which Place is ſuppoſed to have been pitched upon, out of Hatred to the City of London) but tho' they met there at the Day appointed, yet they did not proceed to Buſineſs till the Day following; [2] when being met in the great Hall of the Abbey there, the Biſhop of St. Davids, then Lord Chancellor, declared the Cauſe of Summons; wherein he took Notice of what had been done by the Scots at Roxburgh; and that ſince, notwithſtanding the late Truce, they had made a freſh Alliance with the French againſt England.

Next [3] Day Sir Richard L'Eſcrope, Steward of the Houſhold, enlarged upon the Cauſes of calling the Parliament; [4] and making excuſe for his own Inability, told the Prelates, Lords and Commons, (as the Chancellor had ſaid before) that the Nation was incompaſſed with Enemies, who daily increaſed: That the Ports of Cherburgh and Breſt, which of a long time had not been in the Hands of the Engliſh, beſides Calais, Bourdeaux, and Bayonne, with the Countries adjacent, were very chargeable to maintain; ſince Calais, with its Marches or Limits about it, ſtood the King in Twenty-four Thouſand Pounds every Year, and Breſt Twelve Thouſand Marks, and the other Three Places according to the ſame Rate.

[1.] Ib.N. 16. The Speaker of the Houſe of Commons makes Proteſtation before the King and Lords, and the effect of it.

Then [1.] Sir James Pickering being admitted Speaker of the Houſe of Commons, came with them before the King, Prelates and Lords in Parliament, and made Proteſtation, as well for the whole Commons of England, as for himſelf. Firſt, If he ſhould utter any thing to the Prejudice, Damage, Slander, or Diſgrace of the King, or his Crown, or in leſſening the Honour or Eſtate of the Great Lords, it might not be taken notice of by the King, and that the Lords would paſs it by, for that the Commons highly deſired to maintain the Honour and Eſtate of the King, and the Rights of the Crown, as alſo to preſerve the Reverence due to the Lords in all Points: Then as for his own Perſon, he made his Requeſt, that if by Indiſcretion he ſpake any thing unwarily by Common Aſſent of his Companions, it might be amended by them, before their departure, or afterwards.

[2.] *Ib.N.*17. He returns thanks to the King for his gracious Conceſſions to the Church and State.

He [2.] then Rehearſed in ſhort, the Articles given them in Charge; and firſt, as to the Liberties and Franchizes granted to Holy Church, and for the King's Promiſe of entirely preſerving the Good Laws and Cuſtoms of his Kingdom, and Puniſhing ſuch as ſhould any ways Act againſt them; the Commons humbly thanked Him with their whole Hearts, kneeling upon the ground, and praying God they might be put in due Execution.

[3.] Ib.N. 18. The Commons excuſe giving any further Aid at this time, and why.

That [3.] as to the Aid the King Demanded of his Commons for the Defence and Safety of his Kingdom, and for the Safeguard of his Lordſhips, Lands, Towns and Forts Beyond-Sea, and toward his Wars. The Commons ſaid, that in the laſt Parliament, in his firſt Year, the ſame things were ſhewn unto them in behalf of the King, at which time they Anſwer'd, it was apparent the King had not ſo great need for an Aid, ſeeing He had in his hands the Priories Alien, the Subſidies of Wooll, the Revenues of the Crown, the Lands of the Prince his Father, and many other Great Lordſhips, by the Non-age of the Heirs of them; and that therefore they ſtill conceive there muſt be great plenty of Money in the Treaſury.

[4.] The Anſwer of the King's Council in Parliament, who ſtill inſiſt upon a Supply.

To [4.] this the King's Council in Parliament then Anſwer'd, That the late Charge of the Coronation had been very great, and that the Money upon thoſe Funds they mentioned came in very ſlowly, nor could they be Collected ſoon enough for an Expedition that Year; and it was then further propoſ'd, That if the Commons would Furniſh the King with a great Sum of Money to make ſuch an Expedition as might be for the Deſtruction of his Enemies, they (the Council) hoped He might have Money ſufficient hereafter from time to time to Maintain the War, and Defend the Kingdom.

[5.] The Commons ſtill perſiſt in Excuſing themſelves.

To [5.] this the Commons Replied, That in hopes of that Promiſe to be diſcharged of all Tallages for a long time, they had Granted a greater Sum than had ever been given to any King to be Levied in ſo ſhort a time; and that all things Conſider'd, it ſeem'd to the Commons, that there muſt needs be a great Sum in the Treaſury, beſides what had been Expended in the laſt Voyage; ſo that the King had no need to Charge the Commons, who were in a lower Condition than ever, by reaſon of that Payment, and alſo by the Murrain amongſt their Cattle, and their Enemy's Burnings and Depredations upon the Sea-Coaſts; that their Corn and Cattle were at ſo low a Rate, that no Money could be raiſed at preſent; whereupon they prayed the King to Excuſe them, as not being able to bear any further Charge for pure Poverty

[1.] Ib.N. 19. Sir Richard le Scrope Replies to the Commons on the King's behalf, and denies their Allegation to be true

To [1.] all which, Sir Richard le Scrope Reply'd, by making Proteſtation that he knew of no ſuch Promiſe made by the King in the laſt Parliament; and ſaving the Honour and Reverence due to the King, and Lords, what the Commons ſaid was not true; and as to the Subſidy laſt Granted, that a great part of it was ſtill in the Treaſury; to wit, of the two Fifteenths, and two Tenths: But as to the Wooll that had been given in that Parliament, he vouched the Teſtimony of William Walworth, and John Philpot, who by their Conſent were appointed Receivers of the ſame, that every Penny thereof was Expended upon the War, and that none of it came to the High Treaſurer of England, or any other, to the Uſe of the King: That the Revenues of the Crown, conſidering the Annuities and other Charges upon them, Granted by his Father, and Grandfather, were ſo ſmall, that without the Cuſtoms of Wooll, and Lands of the Priors Aliens, the Honour and Eſtate of the King could not be maintained; and therefore they were to know, that according to Reaſon they ought to relinquiſh their Complaint, if they pleaſed.

[2.] Ib.N. 20. The Commons deſire an Account how the Money given has been laid out.

Whereupon [2.] the Commons, after a ſhort deliberation, made it their Requeſt to the King, that He would pleaſe to ſhew them how, and in what manner the great Sums given for the War had been Expended; and alſo that He would pleaſe to let them know the Names of ſuch as ſhould be the Great Officers of the Kingdom, and who were to be his Counſellors, and Governors of his Perſon, (being yet of tender Age) for the next Year, as it had been before Ordained in Parliament.

[3.] Ib.N. 21. The King with a Proteſtation conſents that the Commons ſhould ſee the Accounts.

To [3.] which it was Anſwered on the behalf of the King, by the ſaid Sir Richard, that tho' there never was any Account yet given of Subſidies, or any other Grants made in Parliament, or out of Parliament, to the Commons, or any other, but to the King and his Officers, yet that the King Willed and Commanded of his own Motion, to pleaſe the Commons, (not that it was of Right for him ſo to do) or that He was oblig'd to do it, only by reaſon of their Requeſt now made, that William Walworth then preſent, with ſome of his Council Aſſigned thereunto by Him, ſhould in Writing clearly ſhew them the Receipts and Expences, ſo as it ſhould not be drawn into an Example for the Future.

As to the Officers, the King had cauſed them to be Choſen by the Advice of the Lords; and as to his Counſellors, they ſhould be ſuch as pleaſed Him, whoſe Names He would ſhortly give them in Writing.

[4.] Ibm. The King ſtill preſſes the Lords and Commons to provide for the Defence of the Kingdom.

Then [4.] the King not only Commanded them, but all the Lords there preſent deſired, that having due Conſideration of the great and apparent Dangers on all ſides, they would Provide for the Defence of the Kingdom; which not only concern'd the King, but all and every one of them, and therefore to conſider how the War might be Maintain'd, and that they would give as ſpeedy an Anſwer as they could, that the Parliament might have an end, and good effect, for the eaſe of the King, the Lords, and themſelves, as alſo for the Profit of the Kingdom, and Diſcharge of the poor Commons, that every day paid their Expences during the Parliament. This was one of their Principal Charges given the firſt Day: Another was, That if any Fault was found in any part of the Kingdom, or Government, in the Laws, or or any other manner, that they would bring in their Petitions concerning it, and they ſhould have due Remedy.

[1.] Then the Commons deſired to have a time limited to bring in their Common Bills, or Petitions, and that it might be prolonged to the Feaſt of All-Souls, or ſecond of November next coming.

[1.] Ib. The Commons deſire a longer time for it.

[2.] Alſo the Commons prayed the King to have a Copy of the Enrolment of the Subſidy of Fifteenths, and Tenths, as they had been Enrolled upon the Roll of Parliament for them to Adviſe upon; and this was granted at the King's Pleaſure, and not upon their Requeſt.

[2.] *Ib.N.*22.

[3.] They Pray'd likewiſe that five or ſix Prelates and Lords might come to the Commons, to Treat with them about their Charge, but the Lords Anſwer'd, they neither ought, nor would do it in that manner, which had never been ſeen but in the three laſt Parliaments; but the Cuſtom was for the Lords to chooſe a ſmall number of Six, or Ten, and the Commons as many of themſelves, to Treat together without noiſe, and then Report what they had done to their Companions, of one part, and the other; and according to this Method the Lords would Act, and no otherwiſe. To this the Commons aſſented, to proceed as had antiently been uſed.

[3.] *Ib.N.*23. The Commons deſire 6 Biſhops, and 6 Lords might come to their Houſe to treat about their Charge, which is refuſed, unleſs the Commons would alſo chooſe a Committee of as many.

After [4.] the Commons had ſeen and Examin'd the Enrolment, Receipts, and Expences, they were well ſatisfied with them, as being Honourable for the King and Kingdom; and only ſaid that Forty Six Thouſand Pounds, which was expended in keeping ſeveral Countries, Places and Fortreſſes, as the Marches of Callais, Breſt, and Cherburgh, Gaſcoigny, and Ireland, was not to be Charged upon them, nor as it ſeem'd to them, were they bound to bear any Foreign Charge.

[4.] *Ib.N.*24. The Commons are very well ſatisfied with the laying out of the Mony; only except againſt the Charges of Foreign Gariſons.

To [5.] which it was Anſwer'd by the King's Council, that Gaſcoigny and the Forts beyond Sea were Barbicans, and as it were Out-works and Defences to England, and if they were well Guarded, and the Sea well kept, the Kingdom would be quiet, otherwiſe it could not be ſo.

[5.] Ib.N. 25. The Reply to this Objection.

The [6.] Commons then propounded this Charge to be defrayed by the Goods and Eſtate of King Edward the Third, which the King Poſſeſſed, and was much Enriched by it. Whereto it was Anſwer'd, that thoſe Goods were juſtly appraiſ'd, and deliver'd to thoſe his Grandfather was Indebted to, except ſome Neceſſaries reſerv'd for his own Houſe, for which He had paid in part, and was to pay in whole for the ſatisfaction of his Creditors; and therefore the King Commanded, and the Prelates and Lords prayed them (as they had done before) to Adviſe about their Charge, and give good and effectual Anſwers thereunto, with as much haſt as might be, for the common profit of the Kingdom, and eaſe of the Lords, and themſelves.

[6.] Ibm. The Commons further propoſed this Charge to be defrayed by the Perſonal Eſtate of the late King, which is ſhew'd cannot be done.

At [7] length, notwithſtanding all theſe Excuſes, the Prelates, Lords and Commons, perceiving the great Perils wherewith the Land was encompaſſed, and the great and extraordinary Expences the King was to be at for the Safety and Defence thereof, agreed and granted the King the former Subſidy of Wooll, Leather, and Woollfells, for Three Years, viz. of Wooll Forty Three Shillings and Four Pence the Sack, of Woollfells as much; that is, for every Two Hundred and Forty of each (accounting Sixſcore to the Hundred) as alſo for Leather Four Pound, Six Shillings and Eight Pence on every Laſt, which ſhould be Exported by Denizens, and Strangers, beſides the antient

Cuſtom; and as an Additional Grant, they gave Thirteen Shillings and Four Pence more for every Sack of Wooll, as much for every Two Hundred and Forty Woollfells, and for every Laſt of Leather, Twenty Six Shillings and Eight Pence. Alſo they gave Sixpence in the Pound for every Pound Value of Merchandize, as well of Denizens as Strangers, both Imported, and Exported, for one Year, and then the Parliament was Diſſolved.

But to ſay ſomething further of Foreign Affairs, the [1.] Engliſh at the beginning of this Year, had ſome Petty Succeſſes in France; Sir Robert Knolls, Governor of the Caſtle of Breſt, took above Fourſcore French Priſoners, who had made an Inroad to Plunder the Adjacent Country. And moreover preſently after Chriſtmaſs, Sir Hugh Calverly, who never loved to be Idle, marched privately out of Calais with a Select Band of Brave Soldiers to the Town of Stapal, where he heard there was to be a Great Fair, and falling upon certain Merchants of Bologne, Paris, Amiens, and other Places; he not only took a great many of them Priſoners, who were made to pay large Ranſoms, but alſo took away a good quantity of Rich Commodities; and as for thoſe he could not carry away, he threatned to burn, unleſs the Owners would agree to Redeem them at a certain Price; which being diſpatched, he Burnt the Town, and return'd to Calais with a Rich Booty of Priſoners, and Commodities, which ſerv'd the Town a great while after.

[2.] Id. ib. Thoſe of Rye and Winchelſey joyning their Ships, Land in Normandy, and Plunder Port St. Pierre, and other Places.

About [2.] the ſame time, the Men of Rye and Winchelſey joyning their Ships together, were reſolv'd to be Reveng'd on the French for the Damage they had done them the laſt Year; and Landing by Night upon the Coaſt of Normandy, they Aſſaulted a Town called Port St. Pierre, which they took and Plunder'd, not ſparing the very Churches, killing many of the Towns-Men, and carrying away ſome of the Richeſt of them Priſoners. And in ſhort, they amply re-paid the French for all the Miſchief they had done them; and then Marching forward to another ſmall Town, called Wilet, not far off, they did the like there, and then return'd home with good Succeſs, and a very Rich Booty.

I cannot here omit, that about the time that Cherburgh was deliver'd to the Engliſh, [3.] Sir Hugh Calverly perform'd another Action worth our Notice; for Marching from his Government at Calais with ſome Forces, and making an Incurſion toward St. Omers, he carried away a great multitude of Cattle, with which he return'd to Calais without any Reſiſtance; and ſome time after this he was too hard for the French Governor of Ardres, who having obtain'd a great quantity of Cannon, and other Ammunition from the French King his Maſter, was afraid leſt they ſhould be Surpriſed by the Governor of Calais in their paſſage. To prevent which, he ſent to him, deſiring his ſafe Conduct to Treat with him about divers Matters of Moment; and the Mounſieur reſolv'd to take that very Day to bring his Ammunition to Ardres. But Sir Hugh being aware of his Deſign, ſent out certain Forces very early that Morning, which ſeiz'd upon the Cannon and Ammunition by the way, and brought them ſafe to Calais. But the Captain of Ardres hearing of this Exploit, whilſt he was on the way, finding himſelf out-witted, return'd back with great ſhame, and diſcontent.

In [1] Scotland the Military Actions met with various Succeſs; for the Men of Northumberland, truſting too much in their own Strength, made an Excurſion into the Weſt-marches of Scotland; but the Scots having notice of their coming, met them with an equal, if not greater Force; and engaging with them, kill'd the major part of them; which ſo diſpirited the Engliſh, that the Scots did what they pleaſed in thoſe Parts: Wherefore the Earl of March was ſent to renew the Truce with them, tho' it did not laſt long; for on Thurſday before the Feaſt of St. Andrew, the Scots in the Night ſurprized Berwick-Caſtle, and killed Sir Robert Boynton the Governor, yet ſuffer'd his Wife and Children, with their Relations, to depart, upon condition to pay Two Thouſand Marks within Three Weeks, or deliver themſelves Priſoners; but the Earl of Northumberland gathered a ſufficient Force, and in Nine Days time retook it by Storm, putting to the Sword all the Scots he found in it, except one that diſcover'd the Contrivance, and the Scots Deſigns: And thus, by the Valour of the Earl, and the Lord Piercy his Eldeſt Son, this Important Place was recovered with much more Honour and Difficulty than it was ſurprized.

The defeat of the Engliſh in the Marches of Scotland.

The Scots ſurprize the Caſtle of Berwick which is retaken by the Earl of Northumberland.

I ſhall conclude this Year with an Account of ſome Eccleſiaſtical Affairs of great Moment. [2] Pope Gregory, the Eleventh Deceaſing at Rome, on the Seven and Twentieth Day of March, the Cardinals thereupon went into the Conclave to chuſe a new Pope; where being threaten'd by the People of Rome, that if they did not elect a Roman, they would look upon the Election as Null; they therefore, to comply with their Humour for the preſent, choſe an old decrepid Cardinal, near an Hundred Years of Age, for Pope; at which, the People were ſo pleaſed, that putting him upon a White Mule, they carried him about the Town in Proceſſion, which ſo fatigued the poor Old Gentleman, that he died within Two Days after, which broke all the Meaſures of the Cardinals; for being again threatned by the Citizens that they did not chuſe an Italian, they thereupon Elected the Arch-Biſhop of Bari, a Neapolitan, who coming to Rome, was Crowned by the Name of Urban the Sixth; but when he would have made ſome Reformation in the Family of the Cardinals, and retrenched their Pomp, Avarice, and Luxury, many of them Rebelling againſt him, He fled into the Kingdom of Naples; and being there received by the Queen of that Country, they publickly declared they had choſen the preſent Pope for fear of Death, and therefore it was void; whereupon proceeding to a new Election, they choſe the Cardinal of Civennes, Son to the Earl of that Name, a Kinſman to the King of France, in hopes that He would aſſiſt him, and own his Title; whereupon, this Cardinal taking upon Him the Name of Clement the Seventh, fixed his See at Avignon; upon which, Pope Urban making Twenty new Cardinals in the Places of thoſe that had deſerted Him, Excommunicated the Anti-Pope, and all his Adherents; which begot ſuch a Schiſm in the Romiſh Church, as never had been before, it laſting above Fifty Years; during which time there were no leſs than two Popes at once, the one at Rome, the other at Avignon; the former of which was own'd by the Emperor, the Kings of England, Portugal, and Hungary; and the latter by the Kings of France, Scotland, Caſtile, and Naples.

I have nothing more to add concerning this Affair, [1] but that during the Seſſions of the laſt Parliament, Pope Urban ſent his Nuncio's to the King and Lords, ſetting forth the Injury and Inſolence of the Apoſtate Cardinals, who had endeavour'd to depoſe Him, and ſet up another, to the Subverſion of the Romiſh Church; and about the ſame time there came other Meſſengers from the Pope and Cardinals of the contrary Party, juſtifying what they had done, deſiring the King's Aſſiſtance; but upon a mature Diſcuſſion of both their Rights, the Sentence of the Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury prevail'd; whereupon, Urban's Title was allowed, and Clement's rejected: But of this Affair you will hear more hereafter.

In the mean time, whilſt theſe two Popes wrote againſt and Excommunicated each other, John Wickliff, and his Party, did not only paſs without Cenſure, but alſo daily increaſed.

Since England now affords us nothing worth our noting, I ſhall, tho' contrary to our uſual Method, begin with the Affairs of France; [2] where Sir Robert Rouſe, Governor of Cherburgh, having lately taken Sir Oliver de Gueſclin, Brother to the Renowned Mareſchal de Gueſclin, Priſoner, and done many other notable Exploits againſt the French; and being now called home, Sir Robert Herleſton was ſent to ſupply his Place, who not long after his Arrival there, ſlew a great many of the French in a Fight, or rather Skirmiſh; and about the ſame time, Sir Hugh Calverly, who had behaved himſelf ſo gallantly in his Government at Calais, was alſo recalled, and he and Sir Thomas Piercy being made Admirals at Sea, went out with a Fleet, and took many Veſſels richly laden from the French and Spaniards; and returning not long after from the Coaſt of Bretagne, they brought hither the good News, that the Britains were now highly exaſperated againſt the French King's Government; for He had juſt before commanded them to ſurrender up all their ſtrong Towns and Caſtles into his Hands, and ſuch as refuſed, He order'd ſhould be put to Death.

[3] Ib. id. King Charles of France forces the Noblemen of Bretagn to ſurrender to him all their Caſtles, and ſtrong Places.

Walſingham [3] further tells us, That in the latter end of the laſt Year, King Charles aſſembled a Parliament at Paris, where, upon pain of Death, He forced the Noblemen of Bretagne that were there, to yield up to him the fortified Towns and Caſtles they held, whenever He ſhould demand them; but inſtead of this, at their return home, they Mann'd and Victualled their Caſtles and Places of Strength; to reduce which, the King ſent Mareſchal de Gueſclin with a good Army, which forced the Britans to retire out of the Country.

[4] Ib. id. Sir H. Calverly and Sir Tho. Piercy, ſail to the Coaſt of Bretagne, and take 7 or 8 Ships; but ſoon diſcharged by a Britiſh Knight.

About [4] this time, likewiſe, Sir Hugh Calverly, and Sir Thomas Piercy, being ſtill joyned in Commiſſion to keep the Seas, ſail'd with a great Force of Armed Men to the Coaſt of Bretagne, where they took ſeven Ships of Burthen, and one Man of War, and afterwards ſet on ſhore there a Party of Men, to plunder the Country; but they were all taken Priſoners by Sir Geoffry Cormel, a Britiſh Knight, that lay there in Ambuſh; tho' he commanded his Men not to kill any of them, but upon a ſafe Conduct from Sir Hugh Calverly, to deliver them all to him without any Ranſom; and further informed him, that if he would Land there, it would much pleaſe the Lords, and Inhabitants of that Country, who were ready to deliver up to him their ſtrong Towns and Caſtles, if he would remain there, for the Guard of the Country; but he excuſed himſelf, ſaying, he had other Matters to perſue, and could not at that time ſatisfy his Deſires.

Then

Anno Dom. 1379.

Then [1] the Duke of Bretagne, who had been forced out of his own Country by his own Subjects, by the Aſſiſtance of the King of France, in the Time of Edward the Third (as you have already heard) and being now in England, made a ſtrict League Offenſive and Defenſive, with King Richard; by which no Peace was to be made with France, but by mutual Conſent, the Original of which remaining in the Old Chapter-houſe at Weſtminſter, dated March the Firſt, in the Year of Grace, 1379, at Weſtminſter; I therefore refer you to it, as alſo to Mr. Rymer's Hiſtory of Leagues, ~~now ſhortly coming out~~. vol. vii. p. 216. 237

[1] Id. ib. The Duke of Bretagn being expelled, his Country enters into a new League offenſive and defenſive with K. Richard.

and in order ~~for~~ this the Duke had some time before delivered up y town of Brest to be kept in a Garrison by [illegible] during [illegible] war with France. vid. RS. vol. p. 190. 191

Some time before this, on [2] the ſixteenth of February, Writs were iſſued forth, for a Parliament to meet fifteen Days after Eaſter, at Weſtminſter, in which the Lords and Commons, conſidering the great Neceſſities of the Kingdom, the Malice of its Enemies, of France and elſewhere, firſt agreed, That the Mark laid upon every Sack of Wool, and the Six-pence in the Pound for all Merchandize, which was given in the laſt Parliament at Gloceſter, ſhould be remitted; [3] and inſtead thereof, granted the old Subſidy on Wool (as it had been before that Parliament) for one Year from the Feaſt of St. Michael; and likewiſe a certain Poll-Tax to be paid by divers Perſons of the Kingdom, as are therein ordered and named, which being very long, I refer you to the Act it ſelf, printed from the Original Record, N. 102. in Dr. Brady's Appendix; which deſerves your Notice, becauſe it contains all the ſeveral Degrees and Ranks of Laymen that were then in England, and how much each of them was to pay for his Poll; wherein, tho' the Dukes of Lancaſter and Bretagne (that paid the higheſt to it) were rated but at Ten Pounds a piece, as Dukes, yet as Barons they paid Ten Marks a piece more; and this Tax is of a mixt Nature, for they were therein rated not only according to their Heads, but Eſtates, Trades, or other ways of getting their Livings; and that which was moſt ſevere was, That every Married Man for himſelf and his Wife, not having any Eſtates in Land, and being above the Age of Sixteen, except very Beggars, ſhould pay a Groat: And every Man and Woman Unmarried, that had ſuch Eſtates, were to pay as much, beſides what they paid in another Capacity, for their Quality and Eſtates together; which Tax went very hard upon the meaner Sort, by the too ſevere exacting of it.

[2] Rot.Clauſ. 2. Rich. 2. M. 13. Dorſ. A Parliament ſummoned.

[3] Rot. Parl. 2. *Rich. N.*13. They remit the former Subſidy on Wool, and grant a leſs; together with a great Poll-Tax on all Perſons, with an account what all ſorts and degrees then paid.

But beſides what was now laid upon the Layety, [4] Walſingham tells us, That the Clergy alſo Taxed themſelves very high, every Arch-Biſhop and Mitred Abbot as much as a Baron, viz. Six Marks a piece; and further, the Abbots were to pay Forty Pence for every Monk in their Monaſtery; all which together muſt needs amount to a vaſt Sum of Money, tho' how it was diſpos'd of, is hard to tell; for we cannot find the Warlike Preparations either by Sea or Land, to have been at all proportionable to ſo great a Tax.

[4] Ad hunc An. The Clergy alſo agree to grant this Poll.

This year the King by Letters Patents, dated June 12, constituted John, King of Castile [illegible] i.e. the Duke of Lancaster his Lieutenant in Aquitain and all other parts of France with full power over all persons whatsoever. Pat. Franc. 2. R. 2. m. 16. RS. vol. p. 218. 219. but I do not find he went over this summer [illegible]

Little of Moment happen'd this Year in England, and therefore for want of other Matter, we ſhall relate ſomewhat of a more private Concern, ſince it gives us a ſingular Example of Honour and Fidelity. [5] You have already heard, that when Robert Hanlle was murthered in the Church of Weſtminſter, his Companion John Shakel was again committed to the Tower, for not delivering the young Earl of Denia; yet however he could not be induced to bring forth his Hoſtage, notwithſtanding all the Extremities uſed upon him. But at laſt, on condition dition that the King would give him Five Hundred Marks in Money, and alſo pay him a Penſion of One Hundred Marks more during Life, he was content to diſcover his ſaid Hoſtage, and deliver him into the King's Hands; which when done, the Diſcovery of the Priſoner ſtruck all Men with great Admiration, for tho' the Young Earl might have been treated according to his Quality, had he diſcovered himſelf, yet he would not, but appear'd to the World in no other Habit than that of a meer Servant or Valet to his Keeper, under which unſuſpected Diſguiſe, he had lain long conceal'd in the Tower, ever ſince the Diſpute about him. This is ſuch a Noble Example of Spaniſh Honour, that it cannot be paſſed by, without Injury to his Vertue.

[1] Id. ib. The Bretans call home their Duke, who is Convoy'd by Sir Hugh Calverly and Sir Thomas Piercy.

But to ſpeak of ſome foreign Affairs of greater Moment, not long after this, [1] the Britans called home their Duke, who was Convoy'd by Sir Thomas Piercy, and Sir Hugh Calverly, and landed at a Port near St. Malo's, on the Fourth Day of Auguſt, where, and in all other Places, he was welcom'd with high Congratulations, as well by the Lords and Gentlemen, as common People of that Dutchy.

[2] Id. ib. A great Mortality in the North of England.

This [2] Summer there happen'd a great Mortality in the North Parts of the Kingdom, whereby the Country became almoſt deſolate: The Scots taking this Advantage, invaded the Borders, harraſſed, robbed, and plundered the ſame, killing many of the People that were left alive, and driving away vaſt Numbers of Cattel, ſcarce leaving any thing behind them, not ſo much as a Hog, which they never drove away before.

[3] Id. ib. The K. ſends a powerful Fleet and Army to aſſiſt the Duke of Bretagne, but is diſperſed by a Storm, and divers Ships loſt, and Sir John Arundel drowned.

About [3] the Feaſt of St. Nicholas, or Sixth of December, this Year, the King ſent a powerful Fleet, and an Army, to aſſiſt the Duke of Bretagne, againſt the King of France, (who ſtill detain'd ſeveral of his Towns and Caſtles) this was to have paſſed into that Dukedom, under the Conduct of Sir John Arundel, Sir Hugh Calverly, Sir Thomas Piercy, and many other Knights and Eſquires, all Veterane Soldiers; but ſo ſoon as they were out at Sea, there aroſe an horrible Storm, which ſcatter'd the Fleet, and drove them they knew not whither; Sir John Arundel's Ship was loſt, and himſelf drowned, as likewiſe Twenty-five more, and above a Thouſand Men; Sir Thomas Piercy, Sir Hugh Calverly, and Sir William Elinham, with others of Note, hardly eſcaping. This ill Succeſs is aſcribed, by my Author, to the Violence and Debauchery of Sir John Arundel and his Men, in Committing Sacriledge, and Raviſhing ſeveral Nuns, not long before this fatal Accident.

[4] Id. ib. Several ſmall Succeſſes gained by the Engliſh in France.

I ſhall here alſo take Notice of ſome Actions perform'd Abroad, tho' of leſs Moment than thoſe already related, ſince they make for the Honour of the Nation, and I ſhall do it as briefly as I can: Sir John Herlſton, Governor of Cherburgh, being block'd up by the French, and very much ſtreightned for want of Proviſions, encouraged his Men boldly to ſally out to fetch ſome in, and making an Incurſion into the French Territories, there took a great Magazine of Victuals that were laid up in a Church, and in an adjoining Mill; but being in his return, met with Sir William de Bourd and his Forces, whom the French King had appointed to lie in Mountbergh, to watch the Motions of the Engliſh; Sir John and his Men being over-matched, he was knockt down to the Ground, and lay for Dead, and had been taken, had he not been opportunely reſcu'd by Sir Geoffery Worſely, who, with a ſtrong

Anno Dom. 1379.

Body of Foot, was appointed to come to their Aſſiſtance, if there were Occaſion; but upon his Arrival, the French were utterly Routed, and Sir William de Bourd himſelf taken Priſoner, with the loſs of about Two Hundred Men, who either underwent the like Fortune, or elſe were ſlain out right.

But, to allay this good Succeſs, [1] not long after, as ſeveral Engliſh ſmall Veſſels lay in a Port in Bretagne, certain French Galleys having Notice of it, came thither to ſet thoſe Ships on Fire; and ſending in one Galley to do the Execution, the reſt being four more lay out of ſight; now when Sir John Clark, Governor of a Caſtle that lay near the Haven, ſaw what was about to be done, he, and all the Engliſh in the Town, preſently ran and put themſelves aboard the Veſſels, to ſave them from being burnt; upon which, the French Galley retreating as if it had been for fear, drew the Engliſh out of the Harbour to perſue her; but by ſo doing, they fell in, and were incloſed among the reſt of the Galleys that lay without, with all which, the Engliſh Ships were forced to engage; yet Sir John Clark and his Men behaving themſelves very gallantly, moſt part of his Veſſels had time enough to run on Shore; but when Sir John himſelf thought to have done the ſame, he was Boarded, and cut over the Thigh with a Battle-Axe, and being there taken, he Dyed preſently of his Wound, an Engliſh Veſſel being at the ſame time ſunk, together with the Enemies that had Boarded her.

[1] Id. ib. Several ſmall Engliſh Veſſels lying in a Port in Bretagn, are like to be fired by four French Galleys; but being endeavour'd to be ſaved by Sir John Clark, he is wounded, taken Priſoner, and dies on the ſpot.

Nor can I omit another gallant Action, [2] related by my Author to have been perform'd by Sir Hugh Calverly, upon his conveying the Duke of Bretagne into his Country (as hath been above related) and that is, that when he, with Sir Thomas Piercy, had juſt entered the Haven of St. Malo's, there arrived ſeveral French and Spaniſh Privateers, which falling upon many Ships of Burthen, that by reaſon of the narrowneſs of the Paſſage, lay ſtill without, and could not enter the Port, they had been all taken by the Enemy, if Sir Hugh, to prevent this Loſs and Diſgrace, had not again expos'd his Perſon, and commanded the Maſter of his Ship (tho' againſt his Will) to go out, and make what Sail he could againſt thoſe Pirates; and coming up with them, his Men charged ſo furiouſly with their Arrows, that he put them to Flight, and perſued them, until in the mean while all the Ships of Burthen had got ſafe into the Harbour, and then he return'd thither again. This was perform'd not only in the ſight of the Engliſh and Bretans that were on the Shore, But alſo of the Mareſchal de Gueſclin himſelf, and the French Gariſon, which from the Walls of St. Malo's beheld what was done; his Enemies, as well as Friends, highly applauding his Valour, and the Honour of the Action.

Sir H. Calverly reſcues divers Engliſh Ships from the Fr. Privateers, with great hazard of his Perſon.

But as this Noble Gentleman behaved himſelf bravely Abroad, ſo [3] certain Engliſh Merchants acted as baſely at Home; for a Rich Merchant of Genoua coming lately into England, offer'd the King, that if he might have leave to build a Caſtle at Southampton, for the defence of the Harbour, and the ſecuring of thoſe Commodities he ſhould there lay up, he would make that Place the moſt famous Port in Europe for all foreign Merchants, who would there Import all the Rich Commodities of the Eaſt, and Export thoſe of England in Exchange: But certain Merchants of London being afraid that this Project would turn much to their Detriment, cauſed him to be murthered one Night, as he return'd home, before the Door of his own Lodging; which wicked Action not only tended to the Damage of the Nation, but alſo rendred the Engliſh odious all over Europe, when they ſaw the Laws of Nations and Commerce ſo highly violated in this Kingdom.

[3] Id. ib. Certain Engliſh Merchants privately murthered a Genoueze, for offering the King to fortify Southampton and make it a free Port for foreign Merchants.

[1.] Id. ib. The Earl of Flanders is driven out of his Country, and why.

As to Foreign Affairs, [1.] the Earl of Flanders having this Year impos'd certain High and Extraordinary Taxes upon his Subjects, they Rebell'd, and drove him out of the Country; nor could he be again Reſtor'd, until he had taken off thoſe Taxes, and remov'd thoſe Counſellors that adviſ'd him to lay them.

[2.] Id. ib. The Archbiſhop of Caſſels is ſent hither as the Pope's Nuntio, and declaring the French King Excommunicated, excites K. Richard to Invade France

As for Eccleſiaſtical Matters, I find little Conſiderable, [2.] only that the Arch Biſhop of Caſſels being ſent hither, as Nuncio from Pope Urban, with an extraordinary Power, ſo ſoon as he came to London, declared the King of France to be Excommunicated by the Pope, and then uſed the accuſtomed Artifice of exciting the King to Invade France, as being the fitteſt Opportunity for that Purpoſe. But about that time, the French King, [illegible] be even with his Holineſs, iſſued out a Proclamation, that none under Pain of Death, and Confiſcation of Goods, ſhould dare to yield Obedience to the pretended Pope Urban.

[3.] Id ib. The Earl of Salisbury returns from Calais, and another Governor ſucceeds him.

Rot. Parl. 3. Rich. 2. N. 12. [5.] The Commons Petition, that ſince the King was of years of diſcretion, his ſtanding Council might be diſcharged.

Preſently [3.] after Chriſtmaſs the Earl of Salisbury, who had been for a Year laſt paſt Governor of Calais, return'd home, Sir John Denros an old Soldier ſucceeding in that Place. And about the ſame time, Sir John Herlſton being diſcharged from his Command at Cherburgh, and Sir William de Windſor, a Valiant Knight, was made Governor in his ſtead. But to ſpeak of Matters of a more Publick Concern. On the twentieth of October laſt paſt, the King had ſent forth [4.] Writs for a Parliament to Meet on Monday next after St. Hillary, or the fourteenth of January, [5.] wherein the Commons by their Speaker, pray'd that the Prelates and other Lords of the King's ſtanding Council might be diſcharged, and none ſuch for the future to be retained, ſeeing the King was of good Diſcretion, and Stature, in reſpect of his Age, which agreed with the Age of his Grandfather at the time of his Coronation, who then had no other Counſellors, but the five Principal Officers of his Realm; praying further that thoſe five Officers, viz. the Chancellor, Treaſurer, Guardian of the Privy-Seal, Chief Chamberlain, and Steward of the Houſhold, might not be Renewed, or Changed until the next Parliament.

[6.] Ib. N. 13, 14. They likewiſe Petition for a Commiſſion to examine into the State of the King's Houſhold, and Expences; a Commiſſion is thereupon granted to divers Lords for that purpoſe.

They [6.] likewiſe pray'd a Commiſſion might be iſſued out to certain Commiſſioners to Survey and Examine in all Courts and Places the State of the King's Houſhold, the Expences and Receipts in all the Offices, &c. This was granted, and a Commiſſion made to the Earls of Arundel, Warwick and Stafford, the Lords Latimer, Brian, and Montacute, with John Haſtings, John Gildesborough, and Edward Dalyngruge Knights, and William Walworth, and John Philpot, Citizens of London, and Thomas Graa Citizen of York, with others, to Execute and Report the ſame.

[7.] Ib. N. 16. The Lords and Commons grant the King one Fifteenth and an half without Cities and Boroughs, and one Tenth and a half within them.

Then [7.] the Lords and Commons perceiving that the King and Kingdom were ſurrounded with Enemies, who with great Force endeavour'd all they could, as well by Land as Sea, to deſtroy them both, and farther to extinguiſh the Engliſh Language; Therefore for the Defence and Safety of the Kingdom, and for the good Succeſs of the Expedition order'd into Bretagne, and deſtruction of the ſaid Enemies, they Granted freely to the King one Fifteenth and an half, without the Cities and Burghs, and one Tenth and an half within thoſe Places, with this Prayer, That this Subſidy, and what was remaining of that given the laſt Parliament, might only be applied to the Expedition into Bretagne, and no where elſe.

And [1] Conſidering alſo that the Subſidy of Woolls, Leather, and Woolſells, was to end at Michaelmas next coming, and that from thence the King was not able to endure the great Charges He was to be at to maintain the War in the Marſhes of Calais, Breſt, Cherburgh in Gaſcoigne, Ireland, and the Marſhes of Scotland, they Granted Him the ſame Subſidies, from the time they were to end, until Michaelmas come Twelvemonth, and withal praying the King that there might not be another Parliament called to Charge the poor Commons until a Year after that time. [2.] To which I muſt alſo add another Remarkable Tranſaction, omitted by Dr. Brady in his Account of this Parliament, That when the King and both Houſes reſolved to enlarge the Powers of the Juſtices of Peace, and that the Prelates and Clergy in their Convocation made an expreſs Proteſtation againſt it, that it had not, nor ſhould ever paſs with their Conſents. Anſwer was made on behalf of the King, That He would not forbear for their Proteſtations to make his Juſtices as He was wont, and by his Coronation Oath was oblig'd to do. From whence we may obſerve, that the Clergy Aſſembled in Convocation were not then looked upon as a diſtinct Eſtate of Parliament, as ſome Men have without any due grounds ſuppoſed.

[2.] Ib. N. 38.

[3.] Walſingham alſo further adds concerning this Parliament, That the Commonalty of the Kingdom then deſired, that ſome one of the moſt diſcreet Barons might be Ordained to be about the King, who ſhould be able to return fit Anſwers to Foreign Miniſters; and therefore Thomas Beauchamp Earl of Warwick, being choſen by Common Aſſent, was appointed to remain continually with the King, and to Receive an Annual Penſion for his Trouble and Charge. If this were ſo (for I find it in no other Author) the Duke of Lancaſter, and the reſt of the Biſhops, Earls, and Barons, that had been appointed the King's Governors, were now laid aſide, as having very much Exhauſted the King's Treaſure, without any conſiderable Benefit; and therefore they rather deſired to have this ſingle Noble-man ſerve, than ſo many.

[3.] Ad huc An. The Commons deſire that a fit Perſon ſhould be about the King, to give Anſwers to Foreign Miniſters, and thereupon the Earl of Warwick is appointed for that purpoſe.

In this Parliament alſo [4.] Sir Richard le Scrope ſurrendred his Office of Chancellor, and Simon de Sudbury Archbiſhop of Canterbury was put in his Place, which was counted a diſparagement to his Archiepiſcopal Dignity.

[4.] Id ib. Sir Richard le Scrope Surrenders the Office of Chancellor, and Simon Archbiſhop of Canterbury ſucceeds him.

The reſt of this Year paſſed over without any thing of Moment done in England, and therefore I muſt entertain the Reader with Matters of more Private Concern. Preſently after [5.] Eaſter, the Lady Jane the King's half Siſter, was Married with Great Solemnity to Valeran Earl of St. Paul, a young French Lord, on whom, whilſt he was a Priſoner, ſhe had ſettled her Affections; ſo that he was not only diſcharged without any Ranſom, but the King beſtowed upon the Bride, the Mannor of Bieſleet as a Dowry; tho' all this could not make this Nobleman to embrace the Engliſh Intereſt, as you will find hereafter.

[5.] Id. ib. The Kings half Siſter is Married to the Earl of St. Paul.

[1] Id ib. A remarkable Duel between Sir John Anneſly, and Tho. Katrington Eſq; and on what Occaſion.

x before the L: Fitzwalter Leiutenant or Deputy to the L: Conſtable, & [illegible] the Earls of Warwick Northumberland & others as Deputy ~~Lieutenants~~ to the Marshal of England. Rot: Part: 3 R. 2. m. 17. vid. Rs. vol. p. 244.

I ſhall now give you an Account of a very Remarkable [1.] Duel or ſingle Combat that happen'd this Year, which was perform'd on the ſeventh of June in the Palace-Yard at Weſtminſter, the King being preſent, between Sir John Anneſly Knight, and Thomas Katrington an Eſquire, who was accuſed of Treaſon by the formerx for delivering up the ſtrong Fortreſs of St. Saviour in the Iſle of Conſtantine to the French for a Sum of Money (as you have already heard) which being by him deny'd, and by the Challenger as poſitively affirm'd before the Lords, ~~the Conſtable, and Marſhal,~~ a Battel enſued; in which (omitting unneceſſary Circumſtances, after a Tryal with Spears, Swords and Daggers) the Knight, tho' a far leſs Man, had the Advantage; yet when at laſt it ſo fell out that he had quite diſarmed the Eſquire, and thought to have grapled with him, and fling him down, he miſſing his hold, fell himſelf; whereupon, Katrington ſoon took the Advantage, and getting upon him, held him down, upon which the King preſently Commanded that they ſhould be taken up and parted: but the Matter did not end ſo, for the Knight going boldly up to the King, would not yield himſelf to be overcome, but earneſtly deſired that he and his Adverſary might be placed in the ſame poſture as they were before; but the Eſquire being quite out of breath, and diſpirited, was not in a Condition to accept of it; and being led between two, and placed in a Chair fell down in a Swoon; but coming again to himſelf, his Adverſary preſently calling him Traytor, Challenged him to renew the Combate a-freſh; but he not being able to look up, or make any Anſwer, the Victory was given on the Knight's ſide. [2.] And as for the Other, being carried to Bed, he fell Diſtracted, and died the next Day; or, as Fabian relates, he was on the Morrow drawn to Tyburn, and there hanged for the Treaſon, whereof, being vanquiſhed, he was prov'd Guilty according to the Law of Arms: But to proceed to Foreign Affairs.

[2.] Katrington is vanquiſhed, and dies diſtracted, or as others report, was Executed at Tyburn.

[3.] Id. ib. The Scots Invade England, and Burn and Plunder the Country, and take away many Priſoners from the Fair at Penreth.

The [3.] Scots toward the latter end of this Summer Invaded Cumberland, and Weſtmorland, Plundering, Killing and Burning where-ever they came, and driving away (as was reported) forty thouſand Head of all ſorts of Cattle, and going to Penreth, where was then a great Fair and Conflux of People, they killed ſome, carried away others Captive, and with them all the Goods of the Town and Fair. The Earl of Northumberland (who had ſuſtained great Damage by this Incurſion) was preparing to drive them out of the Country and Borders, and to force them to make ſatisfaction in Scotland, when he received a Prohibition from the King not to act any thing, but to expect the March Day, which was a Day appointed for the Engliſh and Scots to meet every Year, and adjuſt things done by either Nation upon the Borders, and ſhortly after the Truce was again renewed.

[4.] Id. ib. The French Gallies Land in Suſſex, and take and burn the Town of Winchelſey, and put the Abbot of Battle to flight.

This [4.] Summer the Gallies of France did much miſchief upon the Engliſh Coaſt, and Landing in Suſſex, they took and burnt the Town of Winchelſey, and when the Abbot of Battle-Abbey came thither with ſome Men to oppoſe them, they put them to flight, and kill'd ſome of the Monks that came Armed along with them. For the Earl of Arundel, who lived not far off, marching out with a very ſmall Retinue, ſerved rather to encourage theſe Pyrates, than repell them. And ſometime after the late diſaſter of the Fleet under the Command of Sir John Arundel [1] the Duke of Bretagne about ~~Whitſontide~~ Easter ſent again to the King for Aſſiſtance againſt the King of France; whereupon Thomas of Woodſtock Earl of Buckingham as General, with the Earl of Stafford, Sir Thomas Piercy, and many Barons, Knights and Eſquires of great Note and Skill in Arms, with a ſufficient Army, were appointed and retained for this Expedition, who Landing at Calais on the Nineteenth of July, Marched from thence [2] into Bretagne thro' Champagne, and other Countries, by ſmall Marches, to the great terror of the French, without any Reſiſtance; waſting the Countries as they went along; ſtaying two or three days, and ſometimes more, at every good Town, Where they took up their Quarters; but when they came to Rennes in Bretagne, the Engliſhmen wonder'd they heard not from the Duke, according to the Promiſe he had made them juſt before, by certain Meſſengers he had ſent on purpoſe; [3] wherefore the Earl ſent Sir Thomas Piercy, and Sir Thomas Trivet to him, but they met him on the way coming to the Earl. When they were got together at Rennes, they reſolv'd to [4.] Beſiege Nantes, as the moſt Obſtinate and Rebellious Town in Bretagne, and the Duke promised to marche ~~March'd~~ to Aſſiſt the Earl in this Siege with his whole Force; but the Engliſh having remained fifteen Days at Rennes, to reſt and prepare themſelves for Action, went before the Town, which they within having had notice of, put themſelves into a poſture to receive them, having Monſieur John de Barres for their Governor, beſides divers Valiant and experienc'd French Officers and Soldiers to join with them for the preſerving of the Place. But tho' the Engliſh lay before Nantes two Months and four Days, yet they never heard of the Duke, nor his Men; [5.] wherefore ſeeing it in vain to Beſiege the Town any longer, on the Morrow after New-years-Day they raiſed the Siege, and Marched towards Vannes where the Duke was, and there, and at ſeveral other Towns near upon the Coaſt of Bretagne the Engliſh were Quartered all Winter, the Earl's Intention being in the Spring to March into France, and therefore to that Purpoſe he ſent into England for more Forces. The King and his Council approved of his Deſign, and engaged to ſend another Army to Land at Cherburgh in due time to ſupport him; [6.] but it all came to nothing, for the Duke could not prevail with his Nobility to join Cordially with the Engliſh; wherefore ſeeing no other Remedy he was fain ſome time before to ſend certain Commiſſioners to Paris to make Peace with the French King; who, being then very much afraid of the Engliſh Army, eaſily yielded to it upon theſe Articles.

[6.] The Duke not being able to perſwade his Nobility to join with the Engliſh, makes Peace with the French King on certain Conditions.

Firſt, It was agreed that the Duke of Bretagne ſhould provide Ships to carry back the Engliſh into their own Country. Secondly, that the Gariſon of Cherburgh, which was with the Earl before Nantes, ſhould, if they would, return thither by Land, and have ſafe Conduct. Thirdly, That after the Departure of the Engliſh, the Duke ſhould go into France, and do his Homage and Fealty to the French King, as his Natural Lord.

great many Men, and almoſt all their Horſes, in this unfortunate Expedition; and here [1] Walſingham does, not without Cauſe, bewail how much both the Engliſhmen, and Engliſh Treaſure, were made Properties of, only to advance the Intereſt of a foreign Prince, who made uſe of them for no other end, but to make a ſeparate Peace for his own Advantage; and by that means the King loſt the faireſt Opportunity He ever had, of recovering what the King and his Grandfather had loſt in France.

The Death of Charles V. K. of France, with his Character.

And the rather, ſince [2] on the ſixteenth of September (during this preſent Expedition) Died Charles the Fifth, King of France, called the Wiſe: On his Death-Bed he left the Regency to his youngeſt Brother the Duke of Burgundy, (his eldeſt Son Charles (now King) being then a Minor of about Eleven Years Old.) But to ſay ſomewhat further of this Deceaſed Prince; He was certainly very Cautious and Cunning, doing greater things againſt his Enemies by Policies and Delays, than his Anceſtors could ever obtain by open Force; tho' it cannot be denied, but that after the Conſtable de Gueſclin came to have his ſupreme Command in Military Affairs, it was owing to his Courage and Conduct, that France was reſtor'd to its former Power and Grandeur; but he deceaſing before the King his Maſter, [3] and the Duke of Burgundy being left Regent of the Kingdom, it begot that Hatred and Emulation between him and the Duke of Anjou his eldeſt Brother, which, had it not been for fear of the Engliſh, might have broke into an open War; to which may likewiſe be added, that preſently after the Coronation of the Young King, there aroſe a great Tumult and Sedition in Paris, againſt the new Gabells, or Taxes, that were then anew impos'd upon the People; which not being able at preſent to be either reſiſted or appeaſed, was one great Reaſon, that there was no Army ſet out to reſiſt the Engliſh; ſo that at laſt, all the Means the great Men of the Kingdom had tried to appeaſe the Fury of the People, proving in vain, the King, with his Counſellors, were forced to retire to Places of Strength; the People of Paris in the mean while taking Arms, broke into the Houſe of one of the principal Men of the City, and pulled it down to the Ground, as looking upon him to be the chief Author of all their late Oppreſſions; and then ranging about the City without Controul, they fell upon and murthered as many of the Genoueze Mariners as they could light on; for indeed, the late Taxes had been beſtowed to pay and maintain them, to infeſt the Engliſh Coaſts with Piracy and Invaſions.

A Parliament holden at Northampton, where the A. Bp. and D. of Lancaſter declare the Cauſes of it, to be the great Expences the King had been at, in the late Expeditions into France and Scotland, with other great charges.

But to return to the Affairs of England: The King again wanting Money to maintain the War againſt France, [4] the next Day after the Feaſt of All-Saints, there was a Parliament holden at Northampton, which was adjourned until Thurſday following, at which time the Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, then Chancellor, (though many Temporal Lords were abſent in the Marches of Scotland, with the Duke of Lancaſter) declared to all there preſent, the Cauſes of their Meeting; ſaying, that it could not be unknown to them, that the Earl of Buckingham had been ſent over into France, with an Army that had coſt the King more than was given Him laſt Parliament; beſides, the late Expedition into Scotland, the Defence of Guienne, and his Charge in Ireland, had put Him to ſo great Expences, that He had been forced to pawn his Jewels, the Subſidy of Wools coming to little, by reaſon of the preſent Diſturbances in Flanders, that the Soldiers in the Marches of Calais, at Breſt, and Cherburgh, were in Arrear more than Three Months, and they were afraid, that they might deſert for want of their Pay ; that they were to conſider the King was mightily in Debt ; that He was bound, by Covenant and Indenture, to pay the Earl of Buckingham, and Others in that Expedition, for another half Year, which was near ended ; and that the King was to be at a very great Charge for Guarding the Coaſts ; and laſtly, deſired them to adviſe the King, how this Charge might be born with the moſt Eaſe, and the Kingdom beſt defended againſt all its Enemies, both by Sea and Land, in as ſhort time as they could.

When [1] the Commons had treated one Day about their Charge, they returned to the Lords, and in the Preſence of the King, Prelates, and Peers, Sir John Gildesburgh, Knight, their Speaker, demanded a more clear Declaration of what had been ſaid to them, and eſpecially what Sum was demanded to ſupport the Charge, praying no more might be required than was neceſſary, for that the Commons were poor, and of ſmall Eſtate to bear ſo great a Charge any longer ; [2] whereupon, a Schedule was delivered in by the King's great Officers and Council, containing the Sums neceſſary, which amounted to One Hundred and Sixty Thouſand Pounds Sterling.

[1] Ib. N. 10. The Commons by their Speaker deſire a more clear Declaration, of what was expected from them.

[2] Ib. N. 11. The King's Council demand 160000*l.*

The [3] Commons further pray'd the King and Lords, ſince they thought the Sum demanded was too much, and indeed inſupportable, that they would uſe ſuch Moderation, as nothing might be demanded, but what was to be born, and was abſolutely for the Cauſes above ſet forth : And further they pray'd, That the Prelates and Lords would treat by themſelves about the Matter, and propound the Ways by which any ſuch Sum might be Levied and Collected.

[3] *Ib. N.*12. The Commons deſire a Mitigation of the Sum demanded.

After [4] the Lords had adviſed about the Matter, they cauſed the Commons to come before them, and told them what they had thought on : Firſt, That a certain Sum of ſo many Groats, might be paid by every Perſon of the Kingdom, both Males and Females, the more ſufficient to help the leſs ſufficient : Secondly, If that pleaſed not, to have an Impoſition upon all manner of Merchandizes bought and ſold throughout the Realm, for a certain Term, every time they ſhould be ſold, to be paid by the Vendor : And Thirdly, Their Advice was, to raiſe a certain Sum by Tenths and Fifteenths ; but becauſe the laſt was very grievous to the poor Commons, and that it could not be known to what Sum it would riſe, nor by what time the other ways could be expedited, therefore the Lords pitched upon the Groats, and propounded Four or Five to be Levied upon every Perſon as above, ſo as the moſt able might be conſtrained to aſſiſt the leſs able, this way of Tallage ſeeming to them the beſt and moſt eaſie.

[4] *Ib. N.*13. The Lords propoſe another Poll-Tax ; with an Impoſition upon all Merchandizes.

The [5] Commons, when they had a long time treated upon the manner of the Levy, came into full Parliament, and made Proteſtation, they came not to grant any thing that Day ; but they thought, if the Clergy would ſupport a third part of the Charge, they would grant One Hundred Thouſand Pounds, to be raiſed by a certain number of Groats, ſo as the Layety might pay One Hundred Thouſand Marks, and the Clergy Fifty Thouſand, for that they poſſeſſed a third part of the Kingdom, and pray'd the King and Temporal Lords to move it to them, ſpeedily to reſolve and take upon them the Charge.

[5] *Ib. N.*14. The Commons demand, that the Clergy ſhould contribute a third part of the Charge, ſince they poſſeſſed a third of the Revenues of the Kingdom.

Anno Dom. 1380.

[1] Ib. N. 14. Which the Clergy refuſe to do, and give their Reaſons to the contrary.

To [1] which the Clergy replied, That their Grants were never made in Parliament, nor ought to be; and that the Laymen neither ought nor could conſtrain them in that Caſe, and claim'd the Liberty of the Church, which it had ever enjoy'd before that time; and deſired the Commons might be charged to do what they ought, and were bound to do, and they would do in the preſent Neceſſity, as they had done before.

[2] Ib. N. 15. The Lords and Commons agree to ſet 3 Groats upon every Head.

At [1] laſt the Lords and Commons agreed to give Three Groats of every Perſon in the Kingdom, Males and Females, of the Age of Fifteen Years, of what Condition and Eſtate ſoever, except very Beggars; the ſufficient People in every Town to contribute to the Aſſiſtance of the leſs able; ſo as none paid above Sixty Groats, including thoſe for himſelf and his Wife; the whole to be for the Support of the Earl of Buckingham, and the other Lords and People with him in Bretagne, and for Defence of the Kingdom, and Safe-guard of the Sea: Two Parts to be paid Fifteen Days after St. Hillary, and the other at Whitſunday next after. No Knight, Citizen, or Burgeſs of this Parliament, were to be Collectors of this Money, but that the King would order thro' the Kingdom, ſuch as ſhould equally Levy it, according to the Meaning of this Grant,

No Member of Parliament to be Collectors of this Money.

So ſenſible was the Parliament, even then, of the great Partiality of their own Members in Collecting of this Tax, that they would not truſt themſelves with it.

[3] T. W. The Duke of Lancaſter makes an inglorious Expedition into Scotland; and another Truce is made between the two Kingdoms.

I ſhall conclude this preſent Year, with the inglorious Expedition which the Duke [3] of Lancaſter made about Michaelmas laſt towards Scotland, when accompanied by the Earls of Warwick, Stafford, and other Great Lords and Soldiers, that made in all a great Army: Theſe Marching into the Northern Parts, to call the Scots to an Account for their late Depredations in England, they were ſo fright'ned at their great Preparations, that they preſently began to treat with the Duke, in order to conclude a ~~Truce for half a Year~~; but they were ſo far from making any Satisfactions ~~for the~~ Injuries they had Committed, that the poor Inhabitants of thoſe Parts ſuffer'd as much by the Engliſh Army, as they had done before from the Scotiſh Irruption; ſo that all which was gain'd for above Eleven Thouſand Mark's Expence, was no more but ſome Horſes which the Soldiers plunder'd from the Scots, and divided among themſelves.

[4] Id. ad hunc An. The Biſhop of Exeter is diſmiſſed from being Treaſurer, and Sir Robert Hales put in his Place.

In the beginning of the Year, [4] preſently after Chriſtmaſs, there was a great Council held at London, in which Thomas Brantingham, Biſhop of Exeter, was diſmiſſed from being Treaſurer, and Sir Robert Hales (Maſter of the Knight's Hoſpitallers) was put in his Place, a Worthy and Valiant Perſon, who yet did not pleaſe the Commons, any more than the late Poll-Tax.

Several Inſurrections, in divers Parts of the Kingdom, and on what occaſion.

[5] H. K. Col. 2633.

For in the latter end of May, there happen'd ſeveral dangerous Inſurrections and Rebellions in divers Parts of the Kingdom, which ſome of our Monkiſh Writers, tho' falſely, attributed to the Doctrines and Followers of Wickliff, which now began to ſpread among the common People; whereas there is no ſuch thing to be found among thoſe Tenets of his, which we find to have been lately Condemned; [5] but others more truly attribute it to the over ſevere Collection of the late Poll-Money, which, ſome of the King's Officers complain'd, had not been duely Collected as it ought; whereupon, one John Leg, and

Anno Dom. 1381.

Three of his Aſſociates, obtained a Commiſſion to inſpect and review the late Levy, bargaining to pay the King a great Sum of Money for the ſame: But indeed, on that pretence they committed horrible Oppreſſions, Exactions, and Inſolencies, in divers Parts, eſpecially in Kent, Eſſex, Norfolk, and the adjacent Counties; with which the common People, being at laſt highly Incenſed, and joining with the Villains or Bondmen, fell firſt into a Mutiny, and afterwards into open Rebellion; nor is it leſs Diſputable, where it firſt began, whether in Kent or Eſſex, tho' (as [1] Walſingham and Knighton relate) it was firſt in the former; who alſo mentions one Thomas a Baker, of Fobbings, that taking Courage, got together ſome of his own Town, and thoſe again drew in others of his Neighbours, to reſiſt the Poll-Tax Gatherers, ſome of whom had been ſo Inſolent, as to turn up certain young Girls, to ſee if they were of Age ſufficient to pay or not; which inſolent Carriage ſo provok'd one call'd (from his Trade) Wat a Tyler of Deptford, in Kent, whoſe Daughter had been ſerved in that manner, that he not only beat out the Collector's Brains with his Lathing-Hammer, but, to avoid Puniſhment, drew together the Rabble, and inſenced them (who were too ready of themſelves) into a moſt deſperate Rebellion. Then great Multitudes being got together, broke open the Goal of Maidſtone, where one John Balle, a factious Prieſt then a Priſoner, having gain'd his Liberty, marched along with them, and they growing ſtill more Numerous (ſome write near One Hundred Thouſand ſtrong) came to Black-heath, where he made a ſeditious Preachment to them, taking for his Text, or Theme, this common Proverb;

The Mob, break open the Goal at Maidſtone, are excited by John Balle a Prieſt, who preaches to them againſt all difference of Quality or Degrees.

When Adam Delv'd, and Eve Span,
Who was then a Gentleman?

From [2] which Proverb, or Saying, he endeavour'd to prove, That, by Deſcent from Adam, all Men were of one Condition; that Servitude was introduced by the unjuſt Oppreſſion of Wicked Men, contrary to the Will of GOD, who, if He had pleaſed to have created Slaves or Bondmen, would have appointed who ſhould have been Servants, and who Lords and Maſters; therefore they ſhould conſider, that now there was an Opportunity offer'd them by GOD, in which (caſting off the tedious Yoke of Servitude) they might enjoy their long deſired Liberty.

[2] Id. ib.

This Doctrine was highly applauded by the Rabble, who thus animated by their Multitudes, and holding Correſpondence with others as Mad as themſeves, in Eſſex and other Counties, they take up Arms, and ſtopping all Paſſengers they met with, making them Swear to be true to King Richard, and to the Commons, and never to own any King that ſhould be called John, which they did out of ſpight to the Duke of Lancaſter, againſt whom they had an implacable Malice.

They take Arms, and force all Paſſengers to ſwear to be true to them.

Then [3] the Eſſex and Kentiſh Men being join'd, made up a vaſt Body of near One Hundred Thouſand, chiefly conſiſting of Villains, Bond-Tenants, Country Clowns, or ſuch as were in Debt, and knew not how to ſatisfie their Creditors, and Criminals, who were afraid of the ſeverity of the Law; and theſe being headed by Wat Tyler, on the twelfth of June, marched up as far as Black-Heath, and there lay Excamped; their Pretences were Liberty, and the changing the Evil Laws and Cuſtoms of the Nation; for before they had come up, as well as after, they (being excited thereto by Balle their Preacher) cut off the Heads of all the Lawyers great and ſmall, and all that had any Offices in the Law, or relation to it, wherever they could find them; for that (as they ſaid) the People could not enjoy true Liberty until they were deſtroyed. [1.] Thereupon the King ſent to them to know the Reaſon of this Commotion, and the gathering together of ſuch Multitudes. They told the Meſſengers they were met to ſpeak with the King about certain Matters, and Order'd them to go back, and let Him know that He muſt come to them, and hear what they had to deſire. Some about the King perſwaded Him to go forthwith, but the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and Sir Robert Hales, Prior of St. Johns of Jeruſalem, and then Lord Treaſurer, earneſtly diſſuaded Him from it, moving Him rather to think of ſuppreſſing, than going to ſpeak with ſuch an unruly Rabble. Of which theſe Rude People having notice, they threat'ned to cut off their Heads; and forthwith Marching towards London, came into [2.] Southwark, where they pulled down Houſes, broke open the King's Priſons, and let forth the Priſoners, who join'd with them. The Bridge-Gate was at firſt ſhut againſt them, but by the Aſſiſtance of their Friends of the meaner ſort in the City, and by their Menaces and Threatnings if they had not free paſſage into it, the Gates were opened, and they paſſed, backwards and forwards, into, and out of the City as they pleaſed, giving out they came only to ſearch for Traytors to the Kingdom, and at that time paid for what they call'd for, which got them Reputation with the Common People, inſomuch that a great many then join'd with them.

And as an Inſtance of this, [4.] when one of their Fellows was eſpy'd to thruſt a piece of Plate into his Boſom, they preſently flung both it and him into the Fire, ſaying, They came not like Thieves, to enrich themſelves with Plunder. But as to Good Liquor they were not ſo ſcrupulous; for two and thirty of them being got into the Duke's Wine-Cellar, they Tippled ſo long, 'till the Rafters of the Houſe being on Fire, fell down, and ſtopped up the Paſſage that they could not get out, but were heard to cry there ſeven days after, and ſo periſh'd unpitied. But to proceed with the Actions of theſe Rebels.

From [5.] the Savoy they came back to the Temple, which was (as now) the Abode of the Lawyers, and burnt their Lodgings, Books, Papers, and all Records that were there kept. From this Place they went to Clerken-well, where they deſtroy'd all the Goods in the Hoſpital of St. John, and ſet fire on that Magnificent Building. They then divided themſelves into Three Bodies, one of which being

The King Granted their Deſire, on Condition they would return home, and leave two or three of every Pariſh or Town, to ſtay and bring with them their Charters of Freedom, Sealed with the Great Seal, which were for the Manumiſſion and ſetting Free all his Liege Subjects from all Bondage, with a Pardon to them of all Treaſons, Felonies, Tranſgreſſions, &c. that had been done by any of them, with other things needleſs to be recited, for which I refer you to my [3.] Author, who hath expreſſed them Verbatim. Yet [4.] all this did not ſatisfie Wat Tyler, with his Kentiſh Rabble, who had placed themſelves on Tower-Hill, and about St. Katherines, and in the mean while went into the Tower, where the Terror of this Rude Multitude was ſo great, that the Gates being open'd to them without Reſiſtance (tho' there were in it Six Hundred Archers, and as many Men at Arms) they durſt not take notice, or ſo much as ſtop any of thoſe People, who went in, and came out at their pleaſure; ſo that from thence they ſeized and hurried away the Archbiſhop of Canterbury Lord Chancellor, Sir Robert Hales Lord Treaſurer, John Leg, one of the King's Serjeants at Arms, and a Franciſcan Fryar, (only becauſe he was intimate with the Duke of Lancaſter) and upon Tower-Hill cut off their Heads. [5.] After this, they went into the City, and cut off the Heads of many Engliſhmen, to whom they had any averſion; and among the reſt, they diſpatch'd that Famous Merchant Richard Lyons, ſo often mention'd, whoſe Head they ſet upon a Lance; and their hatred to the Flemings was ſo great, that they drew out of the Church of the Auguſtin Fryars Thirteen of them, and out of other Churches Seventeen more, and cut off their Heads in the Streets (that being their only way of Murther) with mighty Shouts and Rejoycing.

And [2.] being come near the King, the ſame Knight was ſent again to Him, to receive and bring back Propoſals. Tyler was offended, becauſe this Meſſenger came to him mounted, and told him, it became him to alight from his Horſe in his preſence, and therewith drew out his Dagger to ſtrike him: [3.] Then the King coming up to pacifie him, made his Meſſenger alight. The [4.] Demands which Tyler made, beſides a General Enfranchizement of the Bond-Men, (which the King had already Granted) were, that all Warrens, Parks and Chaſes ſhould be made Free and Common to all, ſo that as well the Poor as Rich ſhould have Liberty to Fiſh, Fowl, and Hunt in all Places throughout the Kingdom, with ſeveral other the like extravagant Demands; at which the King making ſome demur, the Tyler behaved himſelf ſo inſolently, that thoſe who were about the King could not but repreſent to His Majeſty that it was inſufferable, and the before Celebrated [5.] John Philpot, (according to his uſual Courage) told the King that if His Majeſty would but Command His Lieutenant, viz. the Mayor, to Arreſt the Traytor, he would loſe his Life if it were not happily accompliſh'd. Whereupon the King was prevail'd with to give ſuch a Command to William Walworth, then Mayor of London, who waiting an Opportunity, and obſerving Tyler to play with his Dagger, ſhifting it from one hand to the other, as if he meant ſome miſchief, and that at laſt (to what intent is not known, whether out of rudeneſs or deſign) he laid one of his hands upon the King's Bridle, fearing the Ruffian might attempt His Royal Perſon, he inſtantly executed his Arreſt, by giving him a blow on the Head with his Dagger, which was ſeconded by Philpot's Sword, and another Eſquire's into his Body, ſo that immediately he fell down dead from his Horſe to the ground. [6.] When the Rabble ſaw this, they began furiouſly to cry out, Oh! our Captain is Slain, our Captain is Murthered, let's Revenge the Death of our Captain, &c. But the King with a Courage and Ingenuity beyond His Years (for He was not yet above Fifteen) clapt Spurs to His Horſe, and rode to the Head of them, crying aloud, What mean you, my Lieges? what would you do? Would you Shoot your King? Come, you ſhall have no Cauſe to grieve for the Death of this Traytor, I will be your Captain and Leader, follow me into the Field, and you ſhall have whatever you deſire.

[7.] Id. ib. They follow the King towards St. George's Fields, till Sir Robert Knolles bringing a ſtrong Party of Armed Men, makes them fling down their Arms, and beg Pardon.

Upon [7.] which words being amazed, and not certain of one another's minds, nor indeed each Man of his own, they followed Him towards St. George's-Fields, 'till Sir Robert Knolls with a Thouſand Armed Men raiſed in the mean time by the Mayor, came upon them out of the City; at whoſe approach (being now Headleſs, and all in confuſion) they were ſo terrified, that they forthwith flung down what Arms they had, and beg'd for Mercy, which the King Granted, and withal gave them a Charter of Freedom in Form as before recited, but Proclaim'd that no Citizen ſhould have any Correſpondence with them, nor ſuffer them to come within the Liberties. Then the Military Men about the King asked his Permiſſion to ſerve the Rebels, as they had ſerved others, to cut off an hundred or two of their Heads, but [1.] He would not conſent to that, leaſt the Innocent might ſuffer with the Guilty, for many had been drawn in by Fear, and ſuch Fair pretences as they could not know to be falſe, and He did believe they might become Good and Loyal Subjects to Him, ſo He ſent them the like Charter He had Granted to thoſe of Eſſex, and other Counties.

[1.] Yet the King would not permit any of them to be kill'd.

At [2.] the very ſame time, the Townſmen of St. Albans, and Country Ruſticks, with the Villains belonging to that Abbey, and the Clowns of Hertfordſhire, and the Countries adjoining, met altogether at St. Albans, requiring of the Abbot and Convent to be Manumiſed, and made Free, to have the Liberties of the Town enlarged, and to have a certain Charter of Privileges and Liberties Granted by King Henry the Third to that Town, reſtored to them; which by the King's Order (not being then able to do otherwiſe) was Commanded to be deliver'd: But that not being to be found, they threatned to Burn the Abbey down to the ground, notwithſtanding they had received before from the Abbot and Convent Letters of Manumiſſion and Freedom, as dictated by themſelves. They were beſides ſo Wicked and Cruel, that they [3.] cut off the Heads of all ſuch as they thought were their Enemies, or would not joyn with them, and burnt or pulled down their Houſes, and deſtroyed their Goods, following and performing in all things the Dictates and Orders of their Great Ringleader Wat Tyler, which they had lately received from him, and ſeen practiſed in London on Corpus-Chriſti-Day, many of theſe Villains and Ruſticks, and St. Alban's-Men, being then there; William Gryndecobbe a Servant to the Abbey, and William Cadyndon, a Chandler in the Town of St. Albans were the Chief Ringleaders in this Tumult, who had received their Inſtructions as above at London; there they made [4.] Proclamation for all of their own Condition to come into them, with ſuch Arms and Weapons as they had, under pain of loſing their Heads, and having their Houſes burnt (if they had any) beſides the Loſs of all their Goods: Theſe they cauſed to enter into an Oath, that they would adhere to King Richard, and the true Commons of England, wherever they came; than they broke open all the Priſons, and ſet the Priſoners at Liberty.

[2.] Id. ib. The Towns-Men of St. Albans join with the Clowns of Hertfordſhire, and demand their Freedom of the Abbot, and threaten to burn the Abbey.

[3.] They cut off the Heads of ſeveral whom they thought to be their Enemies, and burn their Houſes.

[4.] They make Proclamation for all of their Condition to come into them, or elſe to have their Houſes burnt. &c.

While [5.] they were in the heighth of theſe Villanous Practices, they received News of the Death of Wat Tyler, and that the Citizens of London had joined with the King againſt the Kentiſh and Eſſex Rebels; and upon this ſome Meſſengers were ſent from the King to make Proclamation, Commanding them upon forfeiture of Life and Member to be quiet, and return to their own Homes. At this they were ſomewhat humbled, which made them abſtain from other more Barbarous and Outrageous Actions; yet they ſtill kept together and wou'd not ſeparate, how much ſoever they were perſuaded to it, uſing their ordinary Practices againſt the ſaid Abbots and Monks, tho' they had then obtain'd the Kings Writ or [5.] Id. ib. They receive the news of the Death of Wat Tyler, and that the City of London had declared for the King, which puts ſome ſtop to their Fury, yet they ſtill pretend the King's Authority for what they had done.

The King is forced to ſend his Writs to the Sheriffs, &c. to make Proclamation to the contrary.

Letters of Protection for their Perſons and Goods, but to little purpoſe, for theſe Rebels pretended they had the Kings Conſent, Order and Authority for whatever they did; which cauſed Him, to undeceive the People, to ſend his Writs to all Sheriffs, Mayors, Bailiffs, and others his Faithful Subjects, to make Proclamation to the contrary, with Orders to oppoſe them every where in their Tumultuous Riſings and Actings againſt the Peace, Commanding them to deſiſt from ſuch Aſſemblings and go home: This did bear Date at London, June the Seventeenth. To conclude, the Abbots and Monks were forc'd to Grant a Charter by their Common Seal to the Towns-Men of St. Albans, and the Villains belonging to the ſaid Abbey, before they would be quiet, or obey the King's Writ of Protection lately ſent down.

[1] Id. ib. The ſame ſort of People riſe in Suffolk, under Jack Straw and pulling down the Houſes of the Lawyers, cut off the Head of Sir John Cavendiſh, the Lord Chief Juſtice, and ſet it on the Pillory, at St. Edmunds-bury.

And to let you ſee that the like Rebellious Humours had alſo ſeized divers other Countries, [1] on the ſame Day, viz, the Thirteenth of June, the ſame ſort of People, to the number of about Fifty Thouſand, aroſe in Suffolk, under the Conduct of John Straw, a wicked Prieſt, who having received Inſtructions from Wat Tyler at London, acted the ſame Villanies, and committed the ſame Inſolencies, as in other Places: for they pulled down and deſtroyed the Houſes of the moſt conſiderable Lawyers, and killed the Owners, not ſparing Sir John Cavendiſh, Lord Chief Juſtice of England, whoſe Head they cut off, and ſet upon the Pillory of the Town of St. Edmundsbury, with thoſe of John of Cambridge, and de Lankinheath, Monks of that Abbey; and here they cauſed to be delivered into their Hands, the Charters of Liberties and Priviledges granted to that Abbey, to free the Townsmen from the Power and Juriſdiction of that Place, which, tho' done by the immediate Threatnings and Force of the Country People, yet under-hand proceeded from the Inſtigation of the Towns-men, who durſt not be ſeen in it themſelves.

[2.] Id. ib. The Rabble in Norfolk riſe under John Litiſter, a Dyer in Norwich, and compel the Lord Scales, and ſeveral other Knights, to joyn with 'em, which they are forced to do for their own Safety.

In [2] Norfolk alſo, much about the ſame time, a vaſt number of ſuch like People, under the Conduct of John Littiſter, a Dyer of Norfolk, took upon them the ſame Pretences, and followed them in all their Actions: Theſe compelled the Lord Scales, Sir Will. Morley, Sir John Brewes, Sir Stephen Hales, and Sir Robert de Salle, to remain with them, who were fain, for their own Security, to do and allow, whatever they did require or expect; but Sir Robert de Salle, who publickly condemned and abhorred their Actions, had his Brains knocked out, for his ill-timed Honeſty, by one of his own Villains; whereupon, the reſt ſeeing they muſt either loſe their Lives, or diſſemble, choſe rather to comply with the latter, and carried it ſo cunningly, that they became Littiſter's Favourites, who now ſtiled himſelf King of the Commons, and had (what were called) his Royal Officers, amongſt whom Sir Stephen Hales was his Carver. At length, theſe Rebels, whether they were tired out, or elſe repented of what they had ſo wickedly engaged in and done, or rather conſidered what they were like to ſuffer for it; they ſent two of the ſaid Knights, viz. Sir William Morley, and Sir John Brewes, with three of their own number, in whom they placed their greateſt Confidence, to the King, to obtain a Charter of Manumiſſion and Pardon, for what was paſſed; and that it might be more large than the Charters granted to other Counties; they alſo ſent by them a great Sum of Money, which had been received of the Citizens of Norwich, to preſerve their City from

The Rebels ſend 2 Knights to the King, to deſire a Charter of Manumiſſion and Pardon, for what they had done.

Burning, Slaughter, and Plundering, that they might thereby obtain what they deſired.

But [1] Henry Spencer, Biſhop of Norwich, who was then in Rutlandſhire, hearing of this Inſurrection in Norfolk, was coming thither, with Eight Lances only, and a few Archers; but at Icklingham, near Barton-Mills, he met with theſe Two Knights above-mentioned, and their Three Companions, going to the King; and watching his Opportunity, he laid hold on the Three Traytors, and preſently cauſed their Heads to be cut off, and ſet up at New-market; and then went forward into Norfolk, where many Knights and Gentlemen came in, and marched with him to North-Walſham; but there the Rebels lay ſtrongly intrenched, yet with thoſe few Forces he had with him, (tho' he was the firſt Man that charged the Enemy) he aſſaulted their Trenches, and won the Ditch: The Fight was very ſharp for a while; but the Rabble ſoon fled, and in their perſuit many of them were killed; but Littiſter, and the chief Promoters of this Rebellion, being taken, they were drawn and quartered, with many others, thro' the whole County, by which means it was again reduced into a peaceable Condition. Knighton ſays, this Martial Biſhop did the ſame thing in Cambridge and Huntington-Shires; and 'tis very probable, he alſo ſubjected thoſe of Bury St. Edmunds, and the whole Country of Suffolk (being part of his Dioceſs) into good Order.

[1] ib. id. The Biſhop of Norwich going towards Norfolk, meets the Meſſengers ſent by the Rebels, and cauſes them to loſe their Heads, and then marches againſt the reſt, and puts them to the Rout. He executes Litiſter, and the chief Promoters of the Rebellion.

Yet, [2] notwithſtanding the Defeat of theſe Rebels, and the King's Proclamation, for reſiſting them (as hath been already mention'd) the Ruſtics in Eſſex got together again from their Receſſes, though in leſs Numbers than before, at Billeric, a Village near Hatfield, where they reſolved either to enjoy their extorted Liberty, or to die fighting for it; ſo taking freſh Courage, they ſent certain Meſſengers of their own Body to the King, lying then at Waltham, to know if He would permit them to enjoy the Liberty already granted them; and farther required to be equal to their Lords as to that point; nor would they be compelled to appear at any Courts, except thoſe of Frank-Pledge, twice in the Year. The King, and his Council that was there with Him, were at firſt much ſurprized, at the freſh Inſolence of theſe Rebels; but after ſome Deliberation, the King gave them an Anſwer, with his own Mouth, That had not they come to Him as Meſſengers, they ſhould have been hanged; but ſeeing they did, He would ſpare them on that Account; but bad them return to their Companions, and let them know, that as they had been born Villains, ſo they ſhould remain in the ſame Servitude, or rather worſe; and that He would do his utmoſt, during his Life and Reign, ſo to keep them, that they may be an Example to Poſterity, and a warning to themſelves and others, not to offend in the like manner; and then He bid them go home, and live quietly in his Allegiance, or elſe upon their return to their Companions, if they did not like that Advice, they might do as they thought good.

[2.] Id. ib. The Ruſticks in Eſſex take Arms again, though in leſs Numbers, and ſend to the King to make new demands, which are refuſed.

Yet [3] for fear the Rebels might not diſperſe, but rather increaſe, the King forthwith ſent the Earl of Buckingham, and the Lord Thomas Piercy, Brother to the Earl of Northumberland, with ſome Forces to ſuppreſs them, who found them (like thoſe of Norfolk) entrenched within a Ditch, beſides their own Carriages, ſet in their Rear, as alſo with the ſtronger Defence of the adjoyning Woods; yet upon their being being aſſaulted, they were diſperſed without any Difficulty, by no more than Ten Lances, that marched before thoſe Lords ; and when they ſaw them thus put to the Rout, they encompaſſed the Woods, that none of them might eſcape, and ſo there were killed about Five Hundred of them in divers Places, and the Soldiers took Eight Hundred of their Horſes ; yet thoſe that had eſcaped rallied again, and making haſt to Colcheſter, began by Threats and Promiſes, to allarm the Towns-men into the like Madneſs ; yet not being able much to prevail there, they went into Sudbury ; but the Lord Fitz-Walter, and Sir John Harlſton, hearing of their approach, followed them with ſome Forces, and killed abundance of them ; however, they let ſome eſcape, and committed the Ring-leaders to ſeveral Priſons.

The like is done by the Lord Fitz Walter, and Sir John Harlſton.

[1.] Id. ib. The King ſends the Lord Chief Juſtice Treſilian into Eſſex, to enquire into the Raiſers of this Rebellion, whereupon 500 of the Rebels caſt themſelves on the King's mercy, which is granted on Condition. [2.] The Ringleaders are Executed.

Then [1.] the King hearing of this Succeſs, remov'd to His Bower of Havering, and there appointed Sir Robert Treſilian His Chief Juſtice to ſit and enquire concerning thoſe Malefactors, and to Puniſh them according to Law. But when the Eſſex Boors ſaw there was no more ground of hopes, above five hundred of them came bare-headed, and with bare feet before the King, and caſting themſelves on their knees begged His Mercy, which was ſoon Granted them, but upon Condition that they ſhould diſcover and deliver up the Ring-leaders of theſe Commotions; by which means many, being Impriſoned, and found [2.] Guilty before the ſaid Juſtice by Verdict of the Jury, were Hanged (ſometimes nine or ten on a Gallows) for Beheading being then looked upon as not ſo baſe and remarkble a Puniſhment; the Chief of them were Executed, by Drawing, Hanging, and Quartering, and thus Matters ſtood in Eſſex.

[3.] Id ib. Commiſſions of Oyer and Terminer are iſſued for the Trying thoſe taken in London.

Then [3.] in other Counties where theſe Inſurrections and Tumults were ſuppreſs'd, Commiſſions of Oyer and Terminer were iſſued out for the Trials of the Chief Contrivers and Managers of them; firſt, thoſe of London, and ſuch of Kent, Eſſex, Norfolk and Suffolk, as were found within the Liberties of the City, were Tried before the Lord Mayor; of whom the Chief were John Straw, John Kyrkeby, Alan Treder, and John Starling of Eſſex, who gloried that he had murthered the Archbiſhop. Theſe had their Heads cut off, with ſeveral others not named.

[4.] Id. ib. The King comes in Perſon to St. Albans, with the Lord Chief Juſtice, who Tries and Condemns the Ringleaders in the late Inſurrection to be Hang'd, and Quartered.

At [4.] St. Albans, the King coming thither in Perſon, with Sir Robert Treſilian, he ſate in Judgment upon theſe Traytors; and then William Gryndecobbe, William Cadyndon, and John the Barber, with Fifteen others, were Condemn'd, Drawn, and Hanged: And of the Chief Men of the Town were Impriſoned, Richard Walyngford, John Garlick, William Berewill, Thomas Putor, and many more of the ordinary ſort of the Country People were Impriſoned, but afterwards by the King's Mercy they were ſet at Liberty.

[5.] Ball the Prieſt is Condemn'd to be Hanged, but is Repriev'd 'till he had made his Confeſſion.

And [5.] John Ball the Prieſt, being taken at Coventry, and brought to St. Albans, he was adjudged to be Drawn, Hang'd, and Quarter'd, and was Executed accordingly, on the Fifteenth of July, having been ſome days Repriev'd through the Mediation of the Biſhop of London. This Man had Preach'd up Doctrines to pleaſe the People above twenty Years, and for his Seditious Sermons was in Priſon when this Rebellion firſt broke out in Kent. He alſo made to them at Black-Heath the Speech already mention'd. His Chief Tenet was, That Tythes ought not to be paid, unleſs he that paid them were more able than the Curate that receiv'd; nor were they to be paid neither, unleſs he were alſo of better Life and Converſation than his Pariſhioners, with other Points related by my Author to be held by John Wickliff, needleſs to be here inſerted, tho' I find no grounds for that in his Writings. But to return to this Ball, he is further ſaid to have excited the Common People to Act reſolutely in killing all the Great Men of the Kingdom, with the Lawyers and Juſtices; and laſtly, to deſtroy all ſuch as they knew would be any ways injurious to them for the future.

The [1.] Speech which Ball made at his Execution, with the Confeſſion of John Straw a little before his Death, plainly diſcover the Deſigns of all theſe Tumults and Rebellions; for the latter being thereto allured by the fair Promiſes of the Lord Mayor of London, own'd, that when they Aſſembled at Black-Heath, and ſent to the King to come to them, their Purpoſe was to have ſlain all the Noble-Men, Knights and Gentlemen that attended Him, and to have carried the King with them from Place to Place, that the Rabble might with greater boldneſs come in to their Aſſiſtance when they ſhould ſee Him, as it were the Promoter of their Inſurrections; and that when there ſhould have been ſufficient Numbers got together in all Countries, they were to have killed ſuch Lords, Knights, and others, as were moſt likely and able to reſiſt them, eſpecially the Hoſpitallers; then at laſt they were to have killed the King, and all the Biſhops, Monks, Canons and Rectors of Churches, that were Endowed with any Lands and Poſſeſſions, ſparing only the Friars Mendicants, who they thought were ſufficient to Celebrate and Perform Divine Service thro' the whole Nation. Theſe things being perform'd, when there had been none Greater, more Potent, and Knowing than themſelves, they would have made ſuch Laws as they pleaſed, by which the People were to be Govern'd; and they intended to have made Kings, as Wat Tyler in Kent, and in every other County, One. On the Eve alſo of that Day, whereon Wat Tyler was killed, the City-Rabble being on their ſide, they intended to have burnt London, and divided all the Rich Goods found there, amongſt themſelves. This he affirm'd to have been their Deſign, as he deſired God would have Mercy on him, at his going out of the World; and then had he his Head ſtruck off.

[1.] Id. ib. This Dying Speech, and Jack Straw's Confeſſion, diſcover the Wicked Deſigns of thoſe Rebels.

After this the [2.] King, for their good Service in deſtroying Wat Tyler, preſerving the City, and giving Him a ſpeedy Aſſiſtance againſt the Rebels, Knighted William Walworth Lord Mayor, John Philpot, Nicholas Brembre, and Robert Laund, Aldermen; and gave to Sir William Walworth a Hundred Pounds per Ann. Land, and to the other Three, Forty Pounds per Ann. to them and their Heirs for ever; and not long after He Knighted Nicholas Twyford, and Adam Francis, two other Aldermen.

[2.] The King Knights Sir William Walworth the Mayor, and ſeveral Aldermen, for their good Service againſt the Rebels.

It is alſo to be Noted, that theſe [3.] Rebels, tho' in ſeveral Shires, held a ſtrict Correſpondence, and their Leaders ſent abroad their Epiſtles of Advice and Encouragement; ſome of which (as they were taken) I ſhall inſert, for the Reader's Diverſion, that he may admire the Stile of theſe Popular Orators, and obſerve what ſtrength of Perſwaſion there was in Nonſenſe upon thoſe, who were capable of no better.

[3.] Theſe Rebels held Correſpondence with each other in ſeveral Counties.

The Kingdom being ſettled, the King revokes his former Charters of Mannumiſſion to the Villains.

+ vid. the Record 5 R. 2. p. 1 [illegible] col 317 m 33

The [1] Storm being thus happily over-blown, and a competent Force raiſed to ſecure the Peace of the Kingdom, and the Delinquents being now brought to ſpeedy Juſtice, the King (ſo ſoon as He could do it with Safety) revoked all his former Charters of Manumiſſion and Pardon, by a Proclamation under his great Seal, wherein, after He had recited the ſaid Charters, He declared, That for that they did Iſſue, without mature Deliberation, or that He had well weighed the Purport of them ; and that the Grant of the ſaid Letters did manifeſtly tend to the great prejudice of Him and his Crown, and to the Diſinheriſon as well of Himſelf, as of the Prelates and Nobility of the Kingdom, as alſo of the Holy Church of England ; and alſo to the Damage of the Common-wealth : He therefore, by the Advice of his Council, thereby revokes the ſaid Letters Patents, and alſo Commands it to be Proclaimed in all Towns, Cities, &c. whereby He ſtrictly enjoins all and ſingular, as well Free as Bondmen, that without any Contradiction, Murmuring or Reſiſtance, they do and perform all Works, Cuſtoms and Services, which they owed either to Himſelf, or any other their Lords, before the late Diſturbance, without any withdrawing or diminiſhing of the ſame ; and that all ſuch Charters of Manumiſſion as had been already made, ſhould be forthwith given up to be Cancel'd, nor preſume to claim any Liberties or Priviledges thereby, with other Clauſes not of Moment enough to be here ſet down. This bears Date at Chelmsford, the Second of July, this Fifth Year of his Reign.

During [1] theſe Convulſions, the Duke of Lancaſter (very happily for the Preſervation of his Perſon) to whom the common People bore ſo great a ſpight, was gone into the North againſt the Scots; but having Tidings of theſe Inſurrections, thought fit to clap up a Truce for two Years, which he got Ratified upon Oath, ſome Days before the Scots had any Notice of the Troubles in England; but conceiving himſelf yet in Danger, for the general (tho' falſe) Report was, that the King, to pacify the Rebels, had conſented to abandon him to their Pleaſure, whenever they could ſeize him; and [2] having alſo received divers Slights and Affronts in that Diſtreſs from the Earl of Northumberland, (needleſs to be here recited) he deſired of the Scotiſh King, and his Nobility, a ſafe Conduct, and to reſide for a time amongſt them, who honourably entertains him at Edinburgh, till he was ſent for by the King; and then a new Cauſe of Quarrel happen'd between him and the Earl of Northumberland; for in his Return, he was denied paſſage thro' the Town of Berwick, by a Captain, Sir Matthew Redman, by vertue of a Command from the ſaid Earl, Lord Warden of the Marches, not to ſuffer any from Scotland to enter the ſame; which indeed the King had ſpecially ordered, forgetting the Duke's being then in that Kingdom; however, this bred ſuch an Animoſity in the Duke againſt the Earl, that when he came home, he charged him with ſeveral things, before the King, at Berkhamſtead, which the Earl as ſtoutly anſwered: and great numbers of Armed Men followed each of them, ſo that it cauſed mighty Factions and Diviſions in the Kingdom.

[1] Id. ib. The Duke of Lancaſter being in the North, is forced to clap up a Truce with the Scots.

[2] H. K. Col. 2642. He receives a ſafe Conduct from the K. of Scots, and retires for a time to Edinburgh. The D. in his Return, being kept out of Berwick by the Earl of Northumberland's Order, That with other Affronts received, highly incenſes the Duke againſt him, ſo that he complains to the King.

When [3] all things were grown quiet, on the ſixteenth of July Writs were ſent forth for a Parliament to meet at Weſtminſter, on Monday after the Exaltation of the Holy Croſs, or fourteenth of September, which was afterwards Prorogued to the Morrow of All-Souls, being Monday, when it was further Adjourned to the next Day, many Lords and Prelates being abſent; and ſo unto Wedneſday, and then too by reaſon of the Quarrel between the Duke of Lancaſter and the Earl of Northumberland, who came to the Parliament with great Retinues of armed Men and Archers, the King cauſed the Parliament to be Adjourned unto Saturday following, within which time He compoſed the Differences between them, and ended the Quarrel, by making the Earl crave the Duke's Pardon.

Then [4] the Cauſe of Summons was declared to be, that they might conſider how to procure the Quiet and Peace of the Nation, and ſettle it after the late Tumults and Inſurrections, and to confirm or repeal the Grants the King had made of Liberty and Manumiſſion, obtain'd by Force by the Bond-Tenants and Villains; and laſtly, that the King was much indebted, and in great Neceſſity for Money to maintain his Court, and the Wars.

Whereupon, [5] the whole Parliament, Lords and Commons, declared, The Grants of Liberties and Manumiſſion to the ſaid Villains and Bond-Tenants, to be obtain'd by Force, and was in Diſheriſon of them the Nobles and Commons, and Deſtruction of the Realm; and therefore to be null, and repealed by Authority of Parliament.

[5] Ib. N. 13. The late Charters of Manumiſſion declared void.

The [6] Commons alſo pray'd the King, that they might have certain Prelates and Lords to commune with them about their Charge, for that the Matters very highly concerned the State of the Realm, and it was much to the purpoſe to have their Advice.

The [1] Anſwer was, They ſhould give in the Names to the King in Writing, of ſuch as they deſired, that He might adviſe about it; which was done, and the King granted their Deſire.

[2.] Ib. N. 16. The Commons alſo deſire, that all the Eſtates of the Kingdom ſhould treat apart concerning their Charge, and they Report their Reſolutions to the Commons, which Method is refus'd by the King.

And [2] the Commons further pray'd the King, That the Prelates by themſelves, the great Lords Temporal by themſelves, the Knights by themſelves, the Juſtices by themſelves, and all other Eſtates ſingly, might be charged to treat and commune about their Charge; and that their Advice might be reported to the Commons: To which it was Anſwered, That the King had charged the Lords, and other Sages, to commune and Treat diligently upon the ſaid Matters; but the antient Cuſtom and Form of Parliament had always been, that the Commons ſhould firſt report their Advice, upon the Matters given them in charge to the King and Lords of Parliament, and not on the contrary; and therefore the King would, that the antient and good Cuſtoms and Form of Parliament ſhould be kept and obſerved.

[3] Ib. N. 17. The Commons complain of the ill Government of the Realm, and diſorders of the Court; with the abuſes in the Law.

After [3] the Commons had conferred with the Lords, they return'd into the Parliament, and made great Complaint of the ill Government of the Realm, which, if not amended, the Kingdom would be in ſhort time ruined: They complained alſo of the Government about the King's Perſon, his Court, the over great number of his Servants, of the Abuſes in the Chancery, King's-Bench, Common-Pleas, Exchequer, and of grievous Oppreſſions in the Country, by the great Multitude of Embracers (in the French Record Braceurs) and Maintainers of Quarrels, who behaved themſelves like Kings in the Country; ſo as there was very little Law or Right, and of other things, which they ſaid were the Cauſe of the late Commotions, and Miſchiefs of the Land, and requeſted they might be amended.

[4] Ib. N. 18. The King conſents that certain Prelates and Lords ſhould be appointed to examine into thoſe Abuſes.

Then [4.] the King by Advice of the Lords and His Council, Granted, that certain Prelates, Lords, and Others, ſhould Survey and Examine the Government of His Perſon, and Court, and to think of ſufficient Remedies. The Perſons choſen to make this Enquiry were, the Duke of Lancaſter, the Archbiſhop Elect of Canterbury, the Archbiſhop of York, the Biſhops of Wincheſter, Ely, Exeter, and Rocheſter; the Earls of Arundel, Warwick, Stafford, Suffolk, and Saliſbury; the Lords Zouch, Nevil, Grey of Ruthin, and Fitz-Walter; Sir Richard le Scrope, Sir Guy de Brian, and others. The King's Confeſſor was charg'd to abſtain from coming to, or remaining at Court, at the Requeſt of the Commons, and Aſſent of the Lords, being one (as was ſuppos'd) that gave the King ill Advice.

[5.] Ib. N. 19, 20, 21, 22, 23. Certain Petitions of the Commons, without any Anſwers to them.

Then [5.] follow certain Petitions of the Commons, tho' their Anſwers are not ſet down.

Firſt, They Petition the Duke of Lancaſter, and others, Aſſign'd by the King for that Purpoſe, to place the moſt diſcreet and valuable Officers about the King's Perſon, and His Court, to appoint a Chancellor, Barons and Officers in the Exchequer, Judges of one Bench and the other, that they might know their Names, and what they were to do, and the Method they were to take in the Regulation of the Realm, after theſe things were done.

[6.] Ib. N. 25, 26.

They [6.] alſo Petition that an end might be made of the War, which was in great part maintain'd by the Goods that the Enemies of the Nation took by Sea and Land, from the Engliſh, to the great Diſhonour of the Government, and Nation, and Deſtruction of the whole Realm.

They [1.] likewiſe Petition, That certain of the Chief Clerks in Chancery, certain Juſtices, Barons of the Exchequer, and others Learned in the Law(not there named) might Conſult of the Grievances above; and that certain Merchants (not named neither) might declare the Cauſes of the Low Prizes of our Commodities, the carrying over our Money, Waſhing and Clipping thereof; but I find no Report made of this Matter, or Remedy Order'd, tho' there is ſomething in the Statutes at Large this Year, about Exportation of Money, and the Exchequer, vid Cap. 2. & 9, 10, 11, 12, 13.

[1] Ib. N. 28.

Then the[2.] Commons brought into Parliament a Schedule or Draught containing 3 Articles for as many ſorts of Pardons, if the King would pleaſe to Grant them. The Firſt was for the Lords, Gentlemen, and others, that in Reſiſtance of the Rioters and Traytors cauſed ſome of them to be Slain, without due Proceſs of Law; for which ſee the Statutes at large of this Year, Cap. 5. which Statute exactly agrees with the Record.

[2.] Ib. N. 30. The Commons bring in a Draught for three ſorts of Pardons.

The [3.] Second, To appeaſe and quiet the Minds of the Common People, concerning all Treaſons and Felonies committed in the late Riots and Tumults. Which Pardon was Granted to all and ſingular Perſons, [4.] except ſuch as were of the Towns of Canterbury, St. Edmonds-Bury, Beverly, Scarburgh, Bridgewater, and Cambridge; except alſo the Perſons whoſe Names were after written, and were brought into Parliament, as the Chief and Principal Exciters and Movers of theſe Inſurrections in the ſeveral Countries; and thoſe that killed the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, Lord Chancellor, the Prior of St. John's, Lord Treaſurer, and Sir John Cavendiſh, Lord Chief Juſtice; and except ſuch as had eſcaped out of Priſon, and had not then rendred themſelves; provided that ſuch as received Damages and Loſſes by theſe Inſurrections, ſhould not by this Pardon be fore-cloſed from recovering any Recompence by due Courſe of Law.

[3.] Ib.

[4] Ib. N. 32. A Pardon granted to all Offenders in the late Tumults, except ſuch Places and Perſons as are particularly excluded.

The [5.] Third was, for the good People that kept themſelves in Peace, and were no ways conſenting to the ſaid Tumults and Inſurrections, yet were ſome ways concern'd by favouring or receiving the Rebels. The Forms of theſe Pardons were now agreed on, and read, tho' the King had not yet paſſed them.

[5.] Ib.

Afterwards, upon the [6.] Petition of the Commons, that the Towns above-named might, with other Towns, receive the Benefit of the Pardon (except thoſe Perſons that were ſpecially excepted) the King granted, except for the Inhabitants of the Town of St. Edmonds-Bury, who for their ſo long continued Wickedneſs, He would not have Comprized in his Grace; and except alſo the Perſons whoſe Names were deliver'd into Parliament, as the Chief and Principal Ring-Leaders, Abettors and Procurers of the late outrageous Treaſon, which was put off for that time.

[6.] Ib. N. 35. The Commons Petition that the Towns already excepted might alſo partake of the General Pardon.

After the [7.] Buſineſs of the Pardons was over, the Commons made a Rehearſal of their Requeſts and Grievances, which they would have amended, and deſired to have a view of what was done in that Matter, which the King then did not immediately Anſwer, but [8.] told them He had been at great Expence in quieting the Nation of the late Tumults, and otherwiſe, as was declared to them before by His Officers; and that He was to be at further great Expences, by reaſon of the Queen's coming over, her Marriage, and Corona-

To [1.] which the Commons Anſwer'd; That conſidering the Evil Hearts and Rancour of the People thro' the whole Realm, they neither durſt nor would grant any manner of Talliage.

[2.] *Ib.N.*37. They alſo deſire to know the extent of his Pardons.

They [2.] alſo deſired the Parliament may be Adjourned 'till after Chriſtmaſs, which was granted; and then they alſo deſired again, to know the extent of His Grace and Favour in Pardoning.

[3.] *Ib.N.*39. The King demurs to grant a Pardon, 'till they would agree to a Supply.

The [3] King Replied, It was not the Cuſtom of Parliament to have a General Pardon, and ſuch Favour from the King, when the Commons would not grant Him any thing; and told them, He would adviſe further of His Grace and Pardon, until they ſhould do what belonged to them: And ſaid moreover, it was Cuſtomary to grant Pardons the laſt day of the Parliament, when He anſwer'd their Supplications and Petitions in Writing.

[4] *Ib. N.*40. The Commons continue the Cuſtoms upon Wool and Woolfels.

Whereupon [4.] the Commons came into full Parliament before the Lords, ſaying, They had adviſed and conſider'd the great Charge of the King, as well here, as beyond Sea; and then the Prelates, Lords and Commons, continued the Subſidy of Wool, Leather, and Woolfels, until Candlemaſs next enſuing, as it was laſt Granted; which was read in Parliament, as alſo the Declaration of the King's Grace and Pardon; at which the Commons were much Joyed, and thanked the King moſt humbly for the ſame.

[5.] Ib.N. 54. Great Complaints made in Parliament againſt the Mayor, Bayliffs, and People of the Town of Cambridge, for their Actions againſt the Univerſity in the late Tumults.

I find [5] alſo in this Parliament, that there were great Complaints made againſt the Mayor, Bayliffs, and Commonalty of the Town of Cambridge, for their evil Practices, as well out of the Town in the Country, as in it, againſt the Univerſity, in the time of the late Tumults, as by the Bill exhibited againſt them may appear; wherein is ſet forth, that they went to Corpus Chriſti, or St. Benedict-Colledge, where they ſeized the Charters, Writings, Books and Records, broke down the Scholar's Chambers, and took and carried away Goods and Chattels to a great value: Alſo that they compelled the Maſters and Scholars, under pain of Death, and Deſtruction of their Habitations, to renounce all manner of Franchiſes and Priviledges granted to them by any King whatſoever, and ſubmit to the Government of the Town for ever: Alſo by threatning Death, they cauſed the Maſters and Scholars to enter into Bonds to pay them great Sums of Money, and forced them to give a general Acquittance and Releaſe, of all Actions Real and Perſonal: And by the ſame threatning, they compelled the Maſters and Scholars to deliver them their Charters and Priviledges, which they burnt in the Market-place, contrary to the King's Proclamation and Prohibition.

[6] *Ib. N.*46.
[7] Ib. N. 48. The ſaid Officers are ſummoned to appear before the King and his Council in Parliament.

Whereupon, [6] the King Iſſued his Writs, to John Maſterman, the preſent Mayor, (who was then one of the Burgeſſes for the Town in this [7.] Parliament) and Bayliffs, and to Edward Lyſtere, the late Mayor, and Bayliffs, when the Riot and Tumult was made, to appear in Parliament, to acquit themſelves, if they could, before Him and his Council; there reciting in his Writs moſt of what they had done in prejudice of the Chancellor, Maſters and Scholars of the Univerſity; they appear'd, and were order'd to deliver up the Renunciationciation-Bond, and Releaſe above-mentioned under the Univerſity Seals, which were Cancell'd in Parliament, and are entred upon the Roll: Then the Bill againſt them being Read in their preſence in Parliament, they were asked what they had to ſay, why their Franchiſes and Privileges ſhould not be taken into the King's hands as Forfeited. At that time they were not Charged with any Crime, but, as they were told, were only to Anſwer concerning their Franchiſe, [1.] which they did by their Councel, and denied the Matter of Fact, and further ſaid, if any ſuch things were done, they were done by the Traytors and Malefactors of the Counties of Eſſex, Hertfordſhire, and Kent, who came to their Town in great Numbers; but it appearing that they were always preſent at their wicked Practices, and that the Renunciation, Bond and Releaſes of the Univerſity, were in their keeping, and that upon the King's Precept they would not deliver them, it was thought Evidence enough to find them guilty of the whole; whereupon they ſubmitted themſelves entirely to the Kings Grace, to do what He pleaſed with their [2.] Franchiſes; ſome part whereof, by Advice and Aſſent of the Prelates and Lords, the King gave to the Univerſity, and the Reſidue He granted to the Town.

Anno Dom. 1381.

[1.] *Ib.N.*57. They appear and deny the Matters of Fact, which being prov'd, they ſubmit themſelves to the King's Grace.

[2.] Whereupon their Franchiſes being given up, ſome are granted to the Univerſity.

On [3.] the Thirteenth of December, becauſe Chriſtmaſs was near, and the time of the Queen's coming into England alſo approach'd, and her Marriage and Coronation were to be Solemniz'd, the King Adjourned the Parliament, by the Aſſent of the Prelates, Lords, and Commons, unto the Friday next before the Converſion of St. Paul; and did Will and Command that the Pleas, Cauſes, and other Matters moved in that Parliament, and remain'd undetermined, and all other things, with their Dependencies, ſhould continue as they were, in the ſame Condition, untill the Friday abovesaid.

[3.] *Id.N.*64. The Parliament is Adjourned till after Chriſtmaſs.

Therefore I ſhall ~~begin~~ this Year with the King's Marriage; in order to which [4.] Pileas Cardinal of St. Praxedes, with the Duke of Tarſilia, and many other Noblemen, had in the beginning of the preceding Year, come over into England, to ~~conclude~~ a Treaty of Marriage, between the King, and Anne, Siſter to Wenceſlaus, then Emperor, and King of Bohemia; ~~at laſt~~ the Articles ~~being~~ agreed between them, [5] ~~She~~ about the latter end of December arrived at Dover, and was receiv'd with great Solemnity, by thoſe Noblemen that went to meet Her; and was Married to the King on the Fourteenth of January, in the Chappel-Royal at Weſtminſter; and the Wedding being Celebrated with great Magnificence, She is crowned Queen. She was a Princeſs of great Vertue and Goodneſs, which was all the King had with Her; for inſtead of a great Portion in Money, which He was then offered with the Lord of Milan's Daughter, the King gave the Emperor no leſs than Ten Thouſand Marks for his Alliance; and He was alſo at the whole Charge of Her Journey, and coming over: But this Match proved of no Advantage at all to England; for Her Brother the Emperor being a few Years after depoſed by the Princes of the Empire, becauſe of his Tyranical and Arbitrary Temper, He was forced to reſt contented with the bare Kingdom of Bohemia, which lay ſo remote and encompaſſed with the Territories of other Princes, that He could do England neither good nor hurt.

[1] Id. ad hunc An. The Duke of Lancaſter prevails with the King, to ſend ſome Forces to the Aſſiſtance of the K. of Portugal, under the Conduct of the Earl of Cambridge, who arrive at Liſbon, with what was done there by them.

Before I proceed further, I cannot but take notice, that in the beginning of this Year, [1] the Duke of Lancaſter, Titular King of Caſtile, had ſo far prevailed with the King and Council, as to ſend a ſmall Army to the Aſſiſtance of the King of Portugal, who being then hard put to it by King Henry the Baſtard, the Portugueze Prince offer'd very advantageous Conditions; and among others, that by the Power of his Fleet, He would hinder the French and Spaniards from going in or out of the Streights of Gibraltar; and therefore Edmund of Langley, Earl of Cambridge, as General, the Lord William Beuchamp, and other Noblemen, as chief Commanders, ſet Sail for Portugal, and arriving at Liſbon, were there joyfully received by the King; but though theſe Forces were too few to make an Invaſion into Caſtile, yet they ſerved very well to act defenſively for the Security of Liſbon, which was not long after Beſieged by the Spaniards, and had been taken, had it not been defended by the Engliſh, who making a brisk Sally upon the Enemy, forced them to raiſe the Siege from before that City, from whence they carried nothing but Blows and Wounds. This deſerves our Notice, becauſe it gives us Light to what was tranſacted in the next Seſſion of Parliament.

The Parliament ſits again after Chriſtmaſs. [2] Rot. Parl. 5. Rich. 2. N. 66. The Duke of Lancaſter offers to go into Portugal, if the Kingdom would provide Money to pay the Army.

And that began in the latter end of January, according to the late Prorogation: where the firſt thing that I find to have been propoſed was, [2] the Duke of Lancaſter's Offer, to make another Expedition into Portugal, if England would provide him with Sixty Thouſand Pounds, to pay the Wages of Two Thouſand Men at Arms, and Two Thouſand Archers, for half a Year: The Reaſons for this Voyage were, for the ſaving of ſuch Engliſh as were then there, and that he might recover his Right there in thoſe Parts, and alſo for the Safeguard of the Sea, and the Realm of England, and (if GOD pleaſed) for the greater Deſtruction of her Enemies; offering alſo to repay this Sum in Three Years, either in Money, or acceptable Service. Upon this Offer and Voyage the Lords had a long Debate; ſome approved his Reaſons, others not, ſo as he could not then obtain what he deſired.

[3] Ib. N. 67. The Lords and Commons continue the Subſidy upon Wool, &c. for 4 Years, to come, for the defence of the Kingdom.

Yet they will not be thereby engaged to make War with Spain.

Then [3] the Lords and Commons, on the Five and Twentieth of February, conſidering the Neceſſities of the King, and the Multitude of his Enemies by Sea and Land, with the great Expences He muſt be at for the Defence of the Kingdom, and Reſiſtance of ſuch Enemies, granted of their Free-Will to the King, the Subſidy of Wool, Woolfels, and Leather, as He received it upon the laſt Grant, from that Day until the Feaſt of St. John Baptiſt next coming, and from thence for Four Years; whether ſuch Defence or Reſiſtance ſhould be by the Voyage of the Lord of Lancaſter into Spain, or any other manner whatever, with this expreſs Proteſtation of the Commons, That it was not their Intention to be obliged by any Words in this Grant to Quarrel, or have any War with Spain; but only for the Defence of the Kingdom, and Reſiſtance of its Enemies, by the Advice of the Lords, as it ſhould ſeem beſt to them All to ordain.

In [4] this Parliament alſo were made ſeveral Statutes concerning Strangers being admitted to buy and ſell Commodities in their own Names, without any hindrance of the Merchants of England; and alſo for the forbidding of Furs, and regulating the exceſs of Apparel among inferior People; to ſettle the Price of Wines, and many other Matters: But what (ſaith Walſingham) do ſuch Acts of Parliament ſig- nify ? When after they are made, they take no effect, or are nothing regarded; for the King, with his Privy Council, took upon them to alter, or wholly ſet aſide all thoſe things, that by general Conſent had been ordained in Parliament. Of ſuch ill Conſequence was the exerciſe of the King's Prerogative, for the diſpenſing with Laws for the Publick Good; of the truth whereof, there were too many unhappy Inſtances.

[1.] Id. ib. Richard L'Eſcrope made Chancellor, but is within a few Months diſmiſſed from his Office, by a Court-Faction, and for what cauſe.

Amongſt [1] other Tranſactions in this Parliament, upon the Requeſt of the Lords and Commons, Sir Richard L'Eſcrope was by the King appointed Lord Chancellor, as being a Perſon of known Judgment, Learning, and inflexible Integrity; but within a few Months he was by a Court-Faction, turn'd out of that Office, which he had prudently and laudably adminiſter'd, meerly becauſe to do the King faithful Service, he had diſpleaſed ſome of his unworthy Favourites; the Relation of which, I ſhall ſet down in Walſingham's own Words: 'Edmund Mortimer, Earl of Marche, and ſeveral other Lords, being 'lately Dead, certain greedy and ambitious Knights and Eſquires, and 'others of inferior Rank, that were Servants to the King, had begged 'of Him Grants of divers Lands and Lordſhips, lately belonging to the 'Deceaſed, that they might have the Profits thereof, for ſo long time, 'as the King, by the Cuſtom of the Realm, was to hold them in his 'Hands; which, the King not minding the value, nor conſidering 'any Reaſon they had to deſire, or merit to deſerve, ſuch Revenues, 'preſently conſented to, ordering them to the Chancellor, to have 'their Grants paſſed under the Great Seal; but the prudent and honeſt 'Chancellor, who zealouſly deſired the Proſperity of the Kingdom, 'and juſt Profit of the King, abſolutely refuſed to do it; telling them 'the King was much in Debt, and 'twas moſt neceſſary He ſhould reſerve 'ſuch Contingencies to Himſelf, therewith in part to ſatisfy his Creditors; 'and that ſince they well knew the King's urgent Occaſions, they 'could be no good Subjects to his Majeſty, who conſulting their own 'Advantages more than his Service, and preferring private Lucre be'fore publick Neceſſities, ſhould go about to circumvent, and further 'impoveriſh Him, by ſuch prejudical Requeſts, from which they ſhould 'do well to deſiſt, and be content with his Majeſty's former Largeſſes, 'which were ſufficient for them.

'Nettled with this Repulſe, theſe Courtiers reſort to the King, 'grievouſly complaining of the Chancellor's Obſtinacy, that he con'temned his Majeſty's Command; and that it concerned Him preſently, 'and with due Severity, to chaſtiſe ſuch an affronted Diſobedience; 'for otherwiſe, the Royal Authority would become contemptible to 'all his People, and his Commands be accounted of no value, &c. 'Whereupon, the young King, more regarding the falſe Suggeſtions of 'theſe ſelf-deſigning Flatterers, than the faithful Allegations and Ad'vice of his Chancellor, ſends him a haſty Meſſage, to demand the 'Seal of him; but the Chancellor would deliver it to no other Hands 'than the King's; to whom having ſurrendered it, He was pleaſed to 'retain it for ſome Days in his own Cuſtody, ſealing divers Grants 'therewith Himſelf, till at length the keeping of it was conferr'd on 'Robert Braibrook, Biſhop of London, on the Twentieth Day of Septem'ber; by which Action, the King very much diſcontented the Great 'Men, and Others, of the Kingdom; and gave the firſt occaſion of 'diſlike to his Government, or rather to his chief Miniſters, who then 'managed

Walſingham alſo mentions another Parliament, or great Council, to be held at London in the beginning of May, when John Wickliff, growing more bold by reaſon of the Schiſm at Rome, ſent up to the Lords and great Men there aſſembled, certain Articles, to the number of Seven, containing the Sum and Subſtance of his Doctrines, thereby hoping to ſpread them, and draw the Nobility to take his part. My Author hath ſet down theſe Articles at large, which I have alſo given you among the Eccleſiaſtical Affairs at the end of this Reign.

[1.] Id. ib. Another Council, at which, ſeveral of the chief Perſons of Flanders offer to put themſelves under the Subjection of the King; but are ſent home again.

About [1] Michaelmaſs following, the ſame Author mentions another Council to have met at London, at which were preſent many of the chief Perſons of Flanders; who having again lately expelled their Earl out of the Country, came now to offer to put themſelves under the Subjection of the King of England: But that Ambaſſy not ſeeming ſufficient, they were ſent back again, to bring along with them ſome Delegates, from the chief Towns of Flanders, who were of greater Note and Reputation, by whom it might evidently appear, that they had full Powers to enter into ſuch a Treaty, and confirm what ſhould be agreed on; of whoſe Return, and what was further done, I ſhall ſpeak in due place.

[2.] Id. ib. The Fiſhmongers, by the Lord-Mayor's Suggeſtions, are forbid to ſell Proviſions.

In [2] this Council alſo, the Mayor of London (as my Author ſays) having made a falſe Suggeſtion to the King and Council, concerning the Frauds and Deceits which the Fiſhmongers uſed in ſelling of Victuals, obtained an Ordinance, that none of them for the future ſhould vend any Proviſions, as Fleſh, Wine, and the like, by Retail; ~~of~~ nor that any Apothecary ſhould be choſen Mayor. *

[3.] Id ib. The Earl of Cambridge, having ſuffered many Loſſes by Land, and Perils at Sea, returns home with thoſe Forces he had left. A ſhort Account of the chief Actions performed by the Earl of Cambridge in Portugal.

I find nothing elſe to have happened worth noting, [3] but that about the beginning of Winter, Edmund Earl of Cambridge, having ſuffer'd great Perils by Sea, and loſt much of his Equipage in a Storm, return'd into England out of Portugal, with thoſe few Forces he had left, having been very unworthily dealt with by that King; who having made uſe of the Engliſh for the defence of his Capital City (as you have already heard) marched out with them the laſt Summer into the Field, in order to give Battel to the King of Caſtile: But He fearing the Courage of the Engliſh, enter'd into a Treaty with the King of Portugal; and being quickly agreed upon the Terms, they ſoon ſtruck up a Peace, very much for the Advantage of the Portugueze: Of which one of the chief Articles was, That the Engliſh ſhould be immediately ſent home; and leaſt they might pretend that they wanted Shipping for their Tranſportation, the King of Caſtile Himſelf provided it, whilſt the Portugueze furniſhed all other Neceſſaries; and ſo the Earl of Cambridge with the Engliſh Forces, were forced to quit that Kingdom, whether they would or not. All the Advantage he gain'd by this Voyage was, that he betrothed his Son (whom he had gotten divers Years before, by one of the Daughters of Peter King of Caſtile) to the Daughter of the King of Portugal: But becauſe the Earl miſtruſted the uncertain Temper and Faith of that Nation, he brought over his Son along with him; and the King of Portugal upon a like Miſtruſt, would not let his Daughter go over into England, and ſo this Match ſome time after upon his Death broke off, without ever being Conſummated.

Anno Dom. 1382.

If we [1] look into other foreign Parts, we ſhall find a great Revolution to have happened this Year in Italy, where Charles of Durazzo (whom our Author calls Carolus de Pace) having been the laſt Year Crowned King of Naples by Pope Urban, in Oppoſition to Joan I. Queen of that Kingdom, marched into it with a great Army, and routed that commanded by the Queen's General: He thereupon took Capua and Cajeta, with divers other Cities, and cloſely beſieged Naples it ſelf; where, notwithſtanding all the Attempts of Otto Duke of Brunſwick, Husband to that Queen, to raiſe the Siege, his Army was Repulſed, and himſelf ſorely Wounded, and taken Priſoner, whom his Adverſary threatning to ſhoot into the Caſtle del Ovo, by a battering Engine, the Queen (being retired thither) was thereupon forced to ſurrender both it, her ſelf, and all her Treaſure, only on Condition to have her Life ſpared; and (as our Author relates) She then took upon her the Vail of a Nun: But the Italian and French Writers with greater certainty report, that ſome time after, She was privately ſtrangled by Charles, her Kinſman and Adverſary, to Revenge the Death of Andrew, King of Hungary, her firſt Husband, whom She was ſuppoſed to have Murthered ſeveral Years before.

But this Affair did not end here; [2] for the Duke of Anjou, younger Brother to the late King of France, having been, upon the firſt beginning of the Quarrel between the Queen and Count Charles, adopted by Her for her Son and Succeſſor, upon the News of the danger She was in, made all the haſt he could to aſſiſt Her with a powerful Army; and before he went for Italy, he was ſolemnly inveſted with the Kingdom of Sicily at Avignon, by Clement, Antipope to Urban above-mention'd; then this new King having reduced Provence to his Obedience, his proceeded on Journey for Italy, and had at firſt good Succeſs againſt his Competitor, by taking divers Towns and ſtrong Places in Apulia and Calabria, and was thereupon own'd by divers of the great Men of thoſe Parts; But King Charles making up in Subtilty, what he wanted in down-right Force, about the end of this Year, amuſed his Adverſary with a Challenge, to end the Difference by ſingle Combat, which was afterwards altered to Ten Combatants of a ſide: And by this means he gained ſo much time, that having new fortified his ſtrong Places, and recruited his Forces, he broke off the Agreement of Fighting, and openly defying the French Prince, kept himſelf on the Throne, in ſpight of all he could do againſt him.

Alſo Clement the Antipope, in Revenge of King Richard's oppoſing Him, now granted a Cruſado againſt Him, and all his Adherents; but to make amends for this, [4] Pope Urban ſent over his Bulls to Henry Spencer, Biſhop of Norwich, (a Martial Prelate) as his Legate, to raiſe Croiſado, which was to be in the nature of that for the Holy War, to fight with and ſubdue his Enemy Clement the Antipope, and all his Followers and Favourers, whom He thereby Excommunicated and and Depoſed from all Honours, and forbid any Converſation with them living, and ſo much as Burial of their Bodies when Dead, &c. in which Bull (amongſt other things belonging to the Spiritual Power) he, as the Popes Legate, exerciſed here. There was likewiſe granted a Diſpenſation to all Beneficed Clergymen, that would undertake this Expedition to be abſent from their Cures, during that War, and to recieve the entire Profits of them, as if they had been perſonally preſent; and there was further granted to all that croſſed the Seas in this Quarrel, either at their own Expence, or of any others, full Remiſſion of all their Sins; and beſides, the like Priviledges to others that paid any Money for this purpoſe, as to thoſe who went to recover the Holy Land; and there was further granted alike Remiſſion and Indulgence, to all ſuch as ſhould give any conſiderable part of their own Goods, towards the Payment of ſuch Soldiers, as ſhould be raiſed by the ſaid Biſhop, or his Deputies; and if any ſhould happen to die or be killed in this Expedition, they were alſo to recieve the like Grace; and becauſe the Form of this Abſolution may be a Novelty to thoſe that never ſaw it, I ſhall here ſet it down at large, as I find it in my Author.

[2.] Id. ib. The Biſhop, by vertue of theſe Bulls, and Abſolutions, raiſes a great Sum of Money, where with he raiſes an Army.

By [2] vertue of theſe Bulls and Abſolutions, the Biſhop collected a great Sum of Money, beſides Jewels, Necklaces, Rings, Diſhes, Spoons, and other Silver Implements, eſpecially from Ladies and Gentlewomen; and indeed, many gave beyond their Ability (as ſome thought) to obtain the Benefit of this Abſolution and Pardon for their Sins. ^* Upon this, divers People found Men at Arms, others Archers, and ſeveral others went in their own Perſons; ſo fooliſhly Superſtitious were People, even of the beſt Quality, in thoſe Times, to venture their Lives, and ſpend their Eſtates, in the Pope's particular Quarrel, without the leaſt Benefit or Advantage to Religion or themſelves thereby. But the Undertakers were, not long after, ſo much convinced of the Raſhneſs and Folly of this Expedition, that I do not find any Pope, ſince that time, to have ventur'd upon the like Project, of making Cruſadoes againſt his Enemies, or thoſe of the Catholick Church, as He is pleaſed to ſtile them: Only I muſt here further remark, That to publiſh this Abſolution, there was a ſufficient number of Preachers ſent all England over, and alſo beyond Sea. Beſides this, the Mendicant Friars were to vend it; and to ſtir up the People to contribute, went up and down with a Clerk, to take the Names, and recieve Money of their Contributors, not omitting the very Labourers; but we ſhall ſpeak more of this Biſhop's Actions by and by, and in the mean while return to Civil Affairs.

Anno Dom. 1383.

Whilſt [1] this Martial Prelate was making theſe warlike Preparations, a Parliament, or rather great Council of Peers, was ſummoned in the beginning of Lent, in which it was for ſome time debated, Whether it was fit to hazard ſuch conſiderable Forces upon ſo ſlight a Quarrel, as the proſecuting of Schiſmaticks againſt the Pope; thoſe who were for it, urg'd apparent Reaſons of State, that now was the time for the King to recover his Right in France, and weaken the French King, who then lay under Pope Urban's Excommunication, for ſiding with Clement; during which, He could expect no Succeſs on his Arms: It remained, I ſay, very doubtful which way the great Men would incline; but at laſt, upon hearing that Antiphone ſung, Ecce Crucem Domini, fugite, partes Adverſæ, i. e. Behold the Croſs of our Lord, fly ye Adverſaries; they were thereby, as with a Charm, brought over to Vote in favour of the Expedition; and upon this they aſſigned the Fifteenth, given in the laſt Parliament to be imployed herein; and now the Project went on more vigorouſly than ever, inſomuch (ſaith my Author) That in all this ſpacious Kingdom, there was ſcarce one Perſon to be found, that did not either offer his Perſon, or beſtow part of his Goods, for promoting the ſame.

[1] Id. ib. A great Council Summon'd in Lent, where it was Debated whether it was fit to hazard ſuch great Forces on ſo ſlight a Quarrel.

But at laſt they agree in the Affirmative, and appoint the 15*th* given in the laſt Parliament, for this purpoſe.

The [2.] Biſhop's Deſign in this Enterprize, was to paſs over into Flanders with the Army that was to be rais'd with this Money, there to aſſiſt the Flemmings, then in Rebellion againſt their Earl, and the French King, whoſe Confederate he was; but before this could be put in Execution, the [3.] ill News came over of the routing of the Gauntois by King Charles; for they having upon his entrance into Flanders raiſed a numerous Train, were by means of their Countrymen of Bruges, and the Parts adjacent (who joined with the French againſt them) utterly put to flight, and the Siege of Oudenard being thereby raiſed, they were forced to retreat to their City of Gaunt, with the loſs of above Twenty Thouſand Men of their own, and Confederate Forces: But for all this, the Citizens of Bruges had little cauſe to brag of their Victory, for the French immediately put Gariſons into that, and all other Places that had aſſiſted them, and (according to their uſual Cuſtom) treated both their Friends and Enemies with equal Rigour, and eſpecially the Engliſh Merchants of [4.] Bruges, whom they Plundered of all they had; this put off the Biſhop's intended Expedition into Flanders for ſome time; but in the mean while the King returned in Triumph to Paris, and upon His Entry diſarmed the Citizens, and put a great many of them, as well as others to death, who had oppoſed His raiſing of ſome freſh Impoſitions; but having now perfectly ſubdued them, He laid new and greater Taxes upon them than they had ever paid before: But to return again to England.

[2.] The Biſhops deſign to paſs over into Flanders, to aſſiſt the Flemmings againſt their Earl, &c.

[3.] T. W. ad hunc An. The Gauntois are routed by thoſe of Bruges, aſſiſted by the French.

[4.] The Engliſh Merchants at Bruges, are Plundred by them.

[5.] All things being thus concluded for the Biſhop's Tranſportation, about the middle of May, he with his Army was ready to put to Sea, the Fleet lying then in Kent waiting for a Wind; but the King (whether He reſolved quite to forbid him the Voyage, or elſe thought that Prelate had got too much Money, and ſo was willing to ſhare with him in it, or for what other Reaſon I know not) ſent him a Writ to come back to know his further pleaſure; but the proud Biſhop miſtruſting the worſt, was ſo intent upon the Affair of his Lord and Maſter the Pope, that he had no leiſure to obey his King;

[5.] Id ib. The Biſhop being to go to Sea with his Army, the King Summons him to come to him, but the Biſhop refuſes to obey it, and paſſes over to Calais and therefore to avoid any more delays, he preſently haſtened over to Calais, from whence, after a few Day's ſtay there, he marched forward under the Standard of the Croſs, and beſieged [1.] Graveling, and took it by Aſſault, where his Men uſed great Cruelties; then Dunkirk was yielded without much trouble; but ſome Flemmings joining with the French and Bretons, to the number of about Thirty Thouſand, came toward the Town, againſt whom the Biſhop (tho' with a very ſmall Number in reſpect to theirs) marched out of Dunkirk, and gave them Battel, the very Clergymen and Monks who had undertook the Cruſado Fighting in Perſon, becauſe they look ed upon it as the Cauſe of God; and tho' ſome of them were ſlain, yet at laſt he took in Caſſel, Dixmuyde, Burburgh, Newport, and Popering, without ſtriking a ſtroke. Fluſhed with this Succeſs, he then beſieged the Town of [2.] Ypres a long time, and aſſaulted it often, and yet was always repulſed and beaten off, ſo that at length, whether he would or no, the Army Mutinyed, and raiſed the Siege, for the major part of it revolted from him, leaving the great Cannon behind them, with one vaſt one, called the Canterbury-Gun; yet after this, the Biſhop obtain'd a Victory againſt the French, which was chiefly owing to the Valour and Bravery of the Engliſh Archers. In this Fight they took a great many Priſoners, and killed about Three (tho' Walſingham ſays Twelve) Thouſand; thoſe that remain'd with the Biſhop went to Dunkirk, and Sir Hugh Calverly along with him, and from thence to Graveling, whilſt Sir Thomas Trivet, Sir William Elinham, and others marched to Burburgh with another Detachment, and Fortified that Place. Some time after the King of France came pouring upon them with a mighty Force, and Beſieged and Aſſaulted the Town, but was beaten off with great loſs of Men; yet within a few Days after that, the Gariſon ſeeing there was no hopes of Relief, yielded up the Place to the Arms of France, upon Condition that they might march away with Horſe and Arms, and all their Goods, and ſo they did, to Calais.

Anno Dom. 1383.

[1] The Biſhop takes Graveling, Dunkirk, and ſeveral other Places, without any oppoſition.

[2.] He Beſieges Ypres, but is forced to quit it, by reaſon of a mutiny in his Army.

Burburgh tho' new Fortified, is ſurrender'd to the French King upon Conditions.

[3.] Id ib. The French come before Graveling, and Summon the Biſhop to ſurrender it, which he refuſes, yet at laſt demoliſhes it, and goes for England.

After [3.] Burburgh was taken, the French Army marched before Graveling, and Summon'd the Biſhop to yield the Town, and the French offer'd him Fifteen Thouſand Marks to quit it, giving him liberty firſt to Demoliſh it, and then to depart and go whither he would, and all his Men, with their Goods; but the Prelate deſired a ſhort Truce to conſider of theſe Terms, and appointed a Day to give his Anſwer, and in the mean time ſent to England for Relief; which not coming at or before the Day, he accepted the Terms, levelled the ground, and came for England after Michaelmaſs; and thus ended this Cruſado, or the Pontifical War.

[4.] Id ib. The Biſhop wrote to King Richard to ſend over ſome more Forces to give the French Battle, who is very hot upon it at firſt, but preſently cools

[4.] But I cannot here omit what Walſingham further relates, that during the ſaid Truce, the Biſhop of Norwich wrote a Letter to King Richard to deſire Him that he ſhould ſend over ſome more Forces to give the French King Battel, and compel Him to raiſe the Siege. The King was then at Daintry in Northamptonſhire, but on the receipt of this News, being at Supper, He inſtantly aroſe from Table, and in a great heat took Horſe, and rid Poſt with ſuch ſpeed, that He came to St. Albans at Midnight, and there having borrow'd the Abbot's Guelding, He haſtned to Weſtminſter, making ſhew as if He would never reſt 'till He had gone in Perſon, and Routed the French

King, and all his Army. But being ſomewhat weary with Riding, He went to Bed, and having taken Advice on His Pillow, was nothing ſo Fierce the next Morning, but wholly laid aſide the thoughts of going Himſelf, and reſolved to ſend ſome body in His Room, for which purpoſe the [1.] Duke of Lancaſter was Nominated; but he was ſo tedious in making Preparations, that the Biſhop in the mean while was glad to quit Graveling, having firſt diſmantled it, and ſo returned home to England, after a vaſt Treaſure ſpent, and many thouſand Lives loſt, with as little Glory as he ſet forth with mighty expectation, the Succeſs of his Arms being ſuitable to the Ridiculous Occaſion of them.

[1.] The Duke of Lancaſter is nominated to go in the King's ſtead, but before he can go, Graveling was diſmantled.

We [2.] ſhall now return to the Affairs of England, where in the mean while the King and His young Queen ſpent the Summer in Jollity and Youthful Recreations, going on Progreſs to the Great Abbies about the Kingdom, with an exceſſive Retinue of Bohemians; and lying at the Abbey of St. Edmunds-Bury no leſs than ten Days, it proved too great a Burthen, being both of them preſented there, as well as at all the other Monaſteries in thoſe Parts, with great Gifts which the Queen beſtowed upon her Countrymen. And this, as it was a ſign of exceſſive Eaſineſs, and Prodigality in the King, ſo it much leſſen'd the Eſteem His Subjects hitherto had of Him; but to come to Matters of greater Importance.

[2.] Id. ib. The King and Queen go on Progreſs, and are very Burthenſom to the Abbeys.

Some time before the Return of the Biſhop of Norwich, there were [3] Writs Iſſued out, for a Parliament to meet on Monday before the Feaſt of All-Saints, or firſt of November; in which Writs it was ſet forth, That by Advice and Aſſent of the Council, a Parliament was called for their Mediation and Aſſiſtance, in a Treaty of Peace, to be had then between the King, his Kingdom and Subjects, on the one part; and Robert King of Scotland, his Lands, Dominions and Subjects, on the other part; and for other difficult and urgent Buſineſs, which concerned Him, the State and Defence of the Kingdom, and Church of England.

[3.] Rot. Clauſ 7 Ric. 2. M. 37 A Parliament ſummon'd, and for what end.

Then Sir [4.] Michael de la Pole, Lord Chancellor, ſhewed the Cauſes of this Parliament to be, for that the Truce with the Scots was to end at Candlemas next. And whereas the Duke of Lancaſter had been ſent to renew it, he was return'd, and brought back word, That the Scots would ſend Commiſſioners to London to Manage the Treaty. [5.] Another Cauſe was, To provide againſt Three Powerful Enemies, Spain, France, and Flanders. And here he offer'd ſeveral Reaſons, to prove it was better for us to begin and make War upon them, than they upon us, or to ſuffer them to Invade us. [6.] Further ſhewing, that theſe Wars were not to be imputed to the King, ſeeing they had deſcended to Him with the Crown; and the laſt Clauſe was, for the maintenance of good Laws, and ſecurity of the Peace; then he put them in mind of [7.] giving an Aid to ſupport theſe great Charges.

[4.] Rot. Parl. 7 Rich. 2. N. 3. The Lord Chancellor De la Pole ſhews the Cauſes of this Parliament, to adviſe concerning a Truce with Scotland, and carrying on the War agrainſt France and Spain.

[7.] An Aid demanded to ſupport theſe Charges.

Then [8] the Chancellor ſpoke to the Lords ſeparately, and told them the King Commanded them to have due Conſideration of the neceſſary Matters that had been declared to them, and of the apparent inſupportable Miſchiefs, and the great neceſſity He had for Money to prevent them; and that they ſhould Treat by themſelves diligently upon theſe things, and with as much ſpeed as might be, laying aſide the Debate of any other Matter, and to Report their Advice from time time to time to Him; and ſaid further, the King Commanded them to Treat from Day to Day, and to diſpatch what they came for, and not to depart from Parliament without His ſpecial Licenſe, under the Peril that might thereupon enſue.

[1] Ib. N. 12. The Lords & Commons grant the K. two half fifteenths, on a certain condition.

And [1.] the then Lords and Commons conſidering the Extraordinary Charge the King was to be at, by reaſon of the War then open on every ſide, Granted two half Fifteenths, upon Condition the Clergy would Contribute and Grant as became them, which they alſo did.

[2] Ib. N. 18. The Biſhop of Norwich is accuſed, for his Miſcarriages in the late Expedition.

[3] Ib. N. 23. And not being able to clear himſelf, is condemn'd to be Fined, and Ranſomed at the King's pleaſure.

In [2] this Parliament the Biſhop of Norwich was accuſed by the Chancellor in ſeveral Articles for his Miſcarriages in his late Expedition. The firſt was, That he had promiſed to ſerve the King with ſuch a number of Men for a whole Year, and ſerved but half a Year, and then returned with his Army quite broken; of which Article he could not [3.] clear himſelf, and therefore was adjudged to make Fine and Ranſom at the Kings Pleaſure, and the Temporalities of his Biſhoprick to be ſeiz'd for that purpoſe.

[4] Ib. N. 24. Sir William Ellinham, and divers other Commanders in the late Expedition, are queſtioned in Parliament, & impriſon'd, for delivering up ſeveral Places to the French for Money.

[4.] Sir William Ellinham, Sir Thomas Trivet, Sir Henry de Ferrers, and Sir William de Harrendon, were all likewiſe accuſed in Parliament before the Lords, for receiving Money for the delivery of ſeveral Fortreſſes to the French; the Sums in the whole amounting to Twenty Thouſand Franks in Gold. They all made pitiful Excuſes, and craved the King's Mercy; ſo Judgment was pronounced by the Chancellor, That they ſhould refund what they had received to the King, and remain in Priſon until they had made Fine and Ranſom to Him.

Yet notwithſtanding, the Scots ſent not any Commiſſioners to this Parliament, but did much [6.] Injury upon the Borders, and received Forces from France, to join with them againſt the Engliſh; but ~~they~~ hearing there were great Preparations making againſt them, towards the end of this Parliament they ſent their Commiſſioners thither, but they were rejected, and ſent Home, without coming to any Treaty at all, ſince they did not offer any ſufficient Satisfaction for the Miſchiefs they had done. x

After this time I find nothing conſiderable to have happened (the time paſſing away at Court in great Jollity and Security) till the beginning of June, when [3] News came of a formidable Invaſion from France; and that John de Vienne, their Admiral, was ſailed from thence with a large Fleet, and had tranſported great Forces into Scotland, to join with the Scots, to invade England: Whereupon, [4] the King forthwith prepared an Army to march into Scotland, and ſent the Duke of Lancaſter with a good Force before, to ſecure the Borders. Then, on the Seventh of July, the King came in Perſon to Leiceſter, and the Queen with Him, where He was attended by the Flower of the Engliſh Militia, as Earls, Barons, Knights, and others, to a vaſt Number, who made noble Preparations for them, at which the King was extremely pleaſed; but when He arrived at York, that Satisfaction was very much abated, by reaſon of an unhappy Accident which then fell out; for [5] a Quarrel ariſing between the Lord John Holland, the King's half Brother, and Sir Ralph de Stafford, eldeſt Son to the Earl of that Name; the former meeting the latter upon the Road, as he was going to the Queen (whoſe menial Servant he was) killed him on the ſpot, and that not very fairly; at which the King (with whom the Deceaſed had been bred up) was ſo highly incenſed, that He commanded his Brother to be ſeized, and his Goods to be Confiſcated; but this Young Lord, finding the Tide run ſo high againſt him, avoided the Storm, by taking Sanctuary at Beverly: When the Princeſs (Mother to the King, as She was alſo to this Nobleman) heard this ill News, She preſently ſent Meſſengers to his Majeſty, to intercede all they could for her Son, and to beg his Pardon; but the King was ſtill ſo angry at him, that He abſolutely denied her Requeſt; this Anſwer which the Meſſengers brought her to Wallingford, She took ſo much to Heart, that it caſt her into a fit of Sickneſs, of which, within Four or Five Days, She Deceaſed. Her Body, after it was Embalmed, was Preſerved till the King's Return from Scotland, when it was ſolemnly Buried in the Church of the Friars Minors at Stanford: But after this, the King's Fury againſt his Brother, leſſen'd by Degrees. The [1.] King enter'd Scotland about the beginning of Auguſt,x though to little purpoſe, for either He could not find the Scots at all, or at leaſt could not follow them into their Woods, Bogs, and Faſtneſſes in the High-lands, whither they were gone, and had driven their great Cattle with them. But finding nothing in the Country; He burnt Edinburgh, and ſeveral other Towns, cut down much of the Woods, and burnt them. But when the Duke of [2.] Lancaſter would have perſwaded the King to have imitated His Grandfather King Edward, in carrying His Arms beyond the Scottiſh Sea, or Frithe, and in totally reducing that Kingdom, the King was ſo far from hearkning to him, that ſuſpecting the Duke gave Him this Advice only to ruin Him, and His Army, for want of Victuals (the Proviſions and Forage being all deſtroyed on that ſide,) return'd the Duke very ſharp and upbraiding Language upon that Subject; whoſe Anſwers, notwithſtanding they were temper'd with great Duty, and Modeſty, yet had ſo little effect, that the Lords there preſent had a difficult Task to [3.] reconcile the King to him, tho' they compaſſed it at laſt. But there being no more to be done this Campaign, the King return'd home into England; and indeed it was high time for Him to do ſo, for while theſe things were Tranſacting in [4.] Scotland, the Scottiſh and French Forces ſlipping by the Engliſh, entred the Weſt Marches, burnt Penrith, Plunder'd the Country, took many Priſoners, and made an attempt upon Carliſle. But hearing of the coming of the Engliſh Army, they got again into their own Country; but carried more out of England, than the King with His Royal Army could do out of Scotland, tho' they had the Plunder of the Capital City of the Kingdom into the Bargain. Upon ſuch unequal Terms muſt a Richer Nation make War upon a Poorer, as War-like as themſelves.

At which the King of France was ſo incenſed, that quitting for a time his Deſign againſt England, He immediately marched to Reduce that Place; and tho' he received divers Repulſes, yet the Flemings finding they could not long maintain it againſt ſo great a Force, took the opportunity of Marching away in the Night, and returning to Gaunt, after they had ſpoiled the Wines and Proviſions they left behind: And tho' the French King thus recover'd the Place, yet England received that Advantage by this delay, that Winter being now pretty well advanced, the French King was forced to defer his intended Invaſion to the next Year, when He again reaſſumed it, tho' with no better Succeſs, of which we ſhall ſay more hereafter.

[5.] Which raiſes a great deal of Envy and Diſcontent among the Nobility.

The [5.] Advancement of this Nobleman to ſo high a degree of Honour, created a great deal of Envy and Diſcontent among the Nobility, as being a Young Man, no ways remarkable either for Prudence or Valour, and had no great matter to recommend him to the King's Favour, but a Noble Extraction, and a handſom out ſide; and this extraordinary fondneſs upon that Account, was the occaſion of a great deal of Scandal, both upon the King, and this His Minion.

[6.] The making of Noblemen in Parliament, rather a confirmation than creation, of them.

But I cannot here omit that (if what Knyghton relates be true) all theſe Noblemen above-mentioned, were before Advanced to thoſe new Titles and Dignities, when the King was in Tividale, upon His laſt Expedition into Scotland; which plainly ſhews, that what was done afterwards in [6.] Parliament, was rather a Confirmation than a new Creation of them; and that this was then look'd upon, not only as the moſt unqueſtionable, but alſo the moſt honourable way of being confirm'd in any great Dignities, or Titles of Honour.

[7.] Ib. N. 32. The Commons Petition the King that the State of His Houſhold might be reviewed, by His Great Officers.

[7.] In this Parliament alſo the Commons Petition'd the King, That the State of His Houſhold might be viewed, and looked into every Year by the Chancellor, Treaſurer, and Clerk of the Privy-Seal, and what was amiſs, to be amended at their Diſcretion: And alſo that the Statutes of Antient time made concerning the Houſhold, might be kept, and duly examined in all their Points.

Anno Dom. 1385.

[1.] Ib. The King's Anſwers to theſe Petitions, and what was further enacted in this Years Parliament.

As [1.] to the firſt Article of the Petition, this Anſwer was, That the King would do it when He pleaſed. As to the Second, the King grants, and it was alſo at the ſame time Enacted, That all Lords, and other Perſons, having any Lands on the Marces beyond Tine, do dwell thereupon, ſaving that the King may ſhew Favour to whom He pleaſes. The Commons further deſire to know who ſhould be the King's Chief Officers, and Governors of the State of the Kingdom; The Anſwer was, The King had Officers enough at preſent, and would change them at his Pleaſure: After which, this Parliament was Diſſolved.

[2.] The Biſhop of Canterbury falls into the Kings diſpleaſure; who is alſo angry with the Chancellor, and Sir John Devereux, for interceding for him.

In Eccleſiaſtical Affairs we find nothing Conſiderable, only that William de Courtney, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, having about the beginning of this Year [2.] fallen under the King's Diſpleaſure, He Commanded his Temporalities to be ſeized into His hands, which had been done, if the Lord de la Pole, then Chancellor, had not oppoſed it; at which the King was for a time much diſpleaſed. He alſo gave Sir John Devereux very contumelious Language, for offering to intercede for him; wherefore the Archbiſhop prudently retired from Court, and lived privately at home, 'till he had made his Peace with the King. This I take notice of, that the Reader may hence obſerve, of how Wilful and Arbitrary a Temper this young Prince was, and which afterwards increaſed, and ſhewed it ſelf in many other Inſtances, as you will find in the ſequel of this Hiſtory.

[3.] As for other Church-Matters, nothing happened worth our Remark, but that about the beginning of this Year, John Wickliff deceaſed of a Palſie, to the great joy of the Monkiſh Writers of thoſe Times; who (as they never fail'd to do towards their Enemies) aſcribed his Death to the Judgment of God, and that as a Puniſhment for his Heretical Preachments, the uſe of his Tongue was taken from him. [4.] He was Buried at his own Pariſh-Church at Lutterworth in Leiceſterſhire, where his Bones reſted in Peace until Forty one Years after; and then by a Decree of the Council of Conſtance, they were dug up, and burnt, as thoſe of a Heretick.

As [5.] to Foreign Affairs, I have little elſe to obſerve, only that the King of Portugal having lately obtain'd a great Victory with a handful of Men, (part of which were Engliſh Auxiliaries) againſt the vaſt Army of John King of Caſtile, in the Plain of Juberoth; and having afterwards Summon'd an Aſſembly of the Eſtates to meet at Lisbon; they finding themſelves too weak alone to encounter the Forces of Caſtile, reſolved to ſend over Ambaſſadors into England, to Sollicite the King to ſend them a ſpeedy Aſſiſtance againſt their Common Enemy. Theſe Ambaſſadors were kindly received, and a Powerful Aid was promiſed to be ſent them, under the Command of the Duke of Lancaſter, who was reſolv'd to lay hold of this Opportunity to renew his Claim to the Kingdom of Caſtile, in Right of his Wife, Eldeſt Daughter to Peter late King thereof. But this Expedition was not undertaken 'till the Summer following.

But when he would have returned again toward the latter end of this Year upon the ſame Errand, the Peers of the Kingdom being then Aſſembled in Parliament, looking upon him only as a Deceiver, told the King plainly, they would not Treat with him, and ſo his coming over was ſtop'd.

[2.] Id. C. 38, 39. He ſends Envoys to Portugal, to deſire an Interview with him, which is perform'd; with what is agreed at it.

But [3.] notwithſtanding, this Treaty did not take effect till the Year following, for the French King having promiſed the King of Caſtile a great Aſſiſtance againſt the Duke of Lancaſter, yet defer'd the ſending of it this Summer, becauſe He was engaged in making mighty Preparations to Invade England with a vaſt Army, as you will find anon; and that being Conquer'd (as they made ſure of it) they ſhould then eaſily drive the Duke and his Forces out of Spain. So that the Fame of this terrible Invaſion being heard in Portugal, the wary Prince would not conclude this Alliance with the Duke, 'till he heard the Succeſs of the French Expedition againſt England; which being diſappointed, and that Fear over, [4.] the King of Portugal ſent his Ambaſſadors to Compoſtella, one of whom was betrothed to the Lady Philippe, as Proxy for the King his Maſter, who when ſhe was brought to O-porto, Married her with great Solemnity in the Cathedral Church of that City.

[4.] Id. C. 54, 55. The King of Portugal ſends Ambaſſadors to Compoſtella, where he is by Proxy betrothed to the Lady Philippe, Daughter to the Duke.

After which, tho' the Duke of Lancaſter ſubdued the greateſt part of Galicia, partly by his own Forces, and partly by thoſe of Portugal, and that without any conſiderable Reſiſtance made by the King of Caſtile, who was adviſed by his French Commanders not to act any thing 'till the arrival of an Army of their Country-Men, who were daily expected; yet for all this, before the end of the next year, the Engliſh Army under the Command of the Duke of Lancaſter was ſo waſted by the diſeaſes of that Country, that not being able to act any thing further conſiderable, he was fain to enter into a Treaty with John King of Caſtile, Son to Henry the Baſtard, and to quit all his Right to that Kingdom, upon certain Conditions, as you will find hereafter. But thus much I thought fit to relate concerning this Expedition into Spain, which was of more Honour than Advantage to England, that certainly was very much weakned, by being deprived of ſo many gallant Men, at a time when the Nation had ſo much need of them againſt their Enemies the French, to whoſe Affairs we ſhall now return, as well as thoſe of England.

But ſoon after, this Lord made haſt to return and defend his Native Country, which, he heard, this Summer was under great Conſternation, and frequent Allarms, by reaſon of a terrible Invaſion threatned by the French King, who had prepared a vaſt Navy, and a mighty Army, on that Deſign; which being got ready at Sluis, lay waiting an Opportunity to paſs the Channel; and the better to ſecure their Men at their firſt Landing in England, they had framed a wonderful Wooden Wall, Three Miles in compaſs, being no leſs than Twenty Foot high, and of a proportionable thickneſs, in which they were to have incloſed their Camp. But it happened luckily, that the Lord Beauchamp, Captain of Calais, took three of their Ships, laden with part of the ſaid Incloſure, which the King cauſed to be ſet up round about Winchelſea, for Security of that Town; and alſo, he took another Ship full of great Guns, and other Inſtruments of War: This, tho' it ſomewhat diſcourag'd the French King's Deſign, yet did it not make Him wholly lay aſide the Proſecution of it all the reſt of this Summer, had He not been kept back by contrary Winds, as you will find anon. x

Froiſart alſo relates, [1] That after the danger of the French Invaſion was over, there were not only great diſcontents and murmurings among the common People, againſt the new Favourites, but alſo great Animoſities among the Nobility, by reaſon that the King's Uncles were not conſulted with, in the publick Affairs of the Kingdom; and the Arch Biſhops of Canterbury and York hated each other, becauſe the latter had got the ſtart of the other in the King's Favour; ſo that when the next Parliament was aſſembled, they would give the King no Money, unleſs his Officers, that had had the Management of the Publick Revenues, were called to an Account, with which Party the King's Uncles alſo joyned, out of hatred to the Favourites; but what was done in this Parliament, may be better learn'd from our own Hiſtorians and Records.

According to the [2] Writs of Summons iſſued out on the Eighth of Auguſt, a Parliament met at Weſtminſter, on the firſt of October; but before I come to give you an account of the Proceedings of it from the Records, I ſhall ſet down ſome remarkable Tranſactions relating to it, as they are in my Author; [3] for though the King appeared in Perſon at the opening of this Parliament, yet finding the Commons reſolv'd to impeach the Earl of Suffolk, then Chancellor, of divers Crimes, his Majeſty retired from it, leaſt he might ſeem to Countenance their Proceedings, and therefore trifled away his time at Eltham, during great part of the Seſſions; whereupon, the Nobles of the Realm, and the Commons with Joint Aſſent, diſpatched a Meſſage to Him, That the Chancellor and Treaſurer ought to be removed from their Offices, becauſe they were not for the Advantage of Himſelf and Kingdom; and becauſe alſo they had ſuch Matters to treat of, concerning the Lord Michael de la Pole, as could not be ſafely treated of, whilſt he remain'd in the Office of Chancellor; the King being hereat highly offended, commanded them not to make mention of any ſuch Matter, but forthwith proceed to the Buſineſs, for which they were ſummoned, and haſten to a Concluſion; adding, That He would not for Them, or at their Inſtance remove the meaneſt Scullion-Boy in his Kitchin. But that which moſt of all anger'd them againſt the Chancellor was, That he, in the Name of the King, had deſired of the Commons Four Fifteenths, to be paid in one Year, and as many Tenths from the Clergy; alledging, That the King was ſo much in Debt, that He could not otherwiſe be freed from them, and other Burthens lying upon Him, as well upon the Account of War, as of his Houſhold, and other Charges; but they, by joint Aſſent of Lords and Commons, returned this Anſwer to the King, That they neither could, nor by any means would proceed in any Buſineſs of Parliament, or diſpatch ſo much as the leaſt Article, till the King ſhould come and ſhew himſelf in Perſon amongſt them, and remove the ſaid Michael de la Pole from his Office; upon which the King ſent this Anſwer, That they ſhould order Forty Knights of the moſt ſubſtantial and wiſeſt of the Commons to come unto Him, and declare the Opinions of all the reſt. But then were they more afraid, every Man for his own Safety; for a ſecret Rumour had privately come to their Ears, That the Death of theſe Forty was deſigned by Treachery; for it was ſaid (and it appeared afterwards ſo unto them) that as theſe were going to ſpeak with the King, a Multitude of Armed Men ſhould ſet upon, and Murther them: Or elſe that being invited to a Feaſt, ſome Armed Ruffians ſhould ruſh in

The Parliament agree to ſend a Duke and Biſhop to the King with a very bold Meſſage.

[1] Id. ib. The Meſſage it ſelf.

'Sir, [1] the Prelates, Lords and Commons, in Parliament aſſembled, with moſt humble Submiſſion recommend themſelves to Your moſt Excellent [Here is a Chaſme in the Author, but the Word is,] Your Royal Dignity, wiſhing You Succeſsful in the Courſe of Honour, and Invincible againſt the Power of Your Enemies; together with the moſt firm Band of Peace and hearty Love towards Your Subjects, as well for the increaſe of Your own Intereſt and Advantage, in reſpect of GOD, and the Salvation of Your Soul, as for the unſpeakable Comfort of all the People You Govern, on whoſe Behalf we are to intimate theſe Things unto You:

N. B.

'That we have it ſettled and confirmed by antient Conſtitution, from a laudable and approved Cuſtom, which none can Gain-ſay, That the King ought to aſſemble the Lords, Nobles, and Commons of the Kingdom, once a Year, unto his Parliament, as the higheſt Court of the Realm, in which all Equity ought to ſhine bright without any Spot, clear as the Sun, and wherein as well Poor as Rich may find a never-failing Shelter for their Refreſhment, by reſtoring Tranquility and Peace, and removing all kind of Injuries, where all publick Grievances, or Errors, are to be redreſs'd, and wherein with the moſt prudent Council, the State and good Government of the Kingdom is to be treated of; and conſidering that the King and Nation's Foes at home, and their Enemies abroad, may be diſcovered, and repulſed, by ſuch means as moſt conveniently and honourably may be done; and alſo with wholſome Deliberation therein to foreſee and order, how the neceſſary Burthens of the King and Kingdom may with moſt eaſe (the publick Wants conſider'd) be ſupplied: They conceive alſo, That ſince they are to ſupport all publick Charges incumbent, they ſhould have the Superviſal how, and by whom their Goods and Fortunes are to be expended: They ſay moreover, that this is their Priviledge by antient Conſtitution, That if the King will fully eſtrange Himſelf from his Parliament (no Infirmity or neceſſary Cauſe diſabling Him) but obſtinately by his ungovernable Will, ſhall withdraw Himſelf, and be abſent from them for the ſpace of Forty Days, not regarding the Vexation of his People, nor their grievous Expences; That then from that time it ſhall be lawful for all, and every of them, without any Damage from the King to go home, and return into their own Countries, And now, You for a longer time have abſented Your ſelf, and for what Cauſe they know not, have refuſed to come among them. To which the King anſwered to this effect.

The King's Anſwer, threatning to call in the French King.

Now do We plainly diſcover, that our People and the Commons intend to Reſiſt, and are endeavouring to make Inſurrections againſt Us; and in ſuch Caſe nothing ſeems better for Us, than to call in our Couſin the King of France, and from Him to ask Advice and Aid, nay even to ſubmit Our Self to Him, rather than to truckle to our own Subjects. To which they thus replied:

The Lords Reply.

'Sir, this Council is not ſafe for You, but rather tends to Your inevitable Deſtruction; for the King of France is Your Capital Enemy, and the greateſt Adverſary to Your Kingdom; and if He ſhould once get Footing on Your Land, would ſooner endeavour to deſpoil You of it, to invade Your Kingdom, and to drive You from Your Throne, than in the leaſt to lend You his aſſiſting Hand, if at any time (which GOD forbid) You ſhould ſtand in need thereof; rather therefore recall to Your Memory, how Your Noble Grand-father King Edward the Third, and in like manner Your Father, a Prince of the ſame Name and Renown, with great Labour and Hazards, during their whole Lives, indefatigably contended for the Conqueſt of that Kingdom, which by Hereditary Right appertained to them, and after them to You by Succeſſion: You may alſo be pleaſed to call to mind, how many of the Nobles, what innumerable Troops of the Commons of England, loſt their Lives in that Quarrel: Remember alſo, the ineſtimable Treaſures the People of England freely parted with, for the Maintenance of that War.

'And yet, what is more to be lamented, they have in Your time ſuſtained ſo many Taxes for the ſupport of Your Wars, as that now they are reduced to ſuch incredible Poverty, that they can neither pay their Rents for their Livings, nor aſſiſt their King, nor afford themſelves even the Neceſſaries of Life: Thus the Royal Power is Impoveriſh'd, and an unhappy Condition brought upon all the great Men and Nobles of the Kingdom, who, as well as the Commons, are weakened and undone; for a King cannot be Poor that has a Rich People, nor that King be Rich, whoſe Subjects are Beggars: Nor do theſe Ills redound alone to You the King, but to all the Nobility and great Men, every one in his Rank and Degree. And all this is brought to paſs by Your evil Miniſters, who have ill Governed both King and Kingdom to this Day; and unleſs we do quickly ſet to our helping Hands, the Kingdom will in leſs time than we think of, be miſerably ſubverted.

'But there is yet one part more of our Meſſage remaining, on the behalf of Your People, to be imparted to You, That we have an Antient Conſtitution, [1] and it was not many Ages ſince experimented, it grieves us that we muſt mention it, that if the King, through any evil Council, or a weak Obſtinacy or Contempt of his People, or out of a perverſe and froward Wilfulneſs, or by any other irregular Courſes, ſhall alienate Himſelf from his People, and refuſe to govern by the Laws and Statutes of the Realm, according to the laudable Ordinances, and their faithful Advice; but will throw Himſelf headlong into wild Deſigns, and ſtubbornly exerciſe his own ſingular arbitrary Will; that from that time it ſhall be Lawful for his People, by their full and free Aſſent and Conſent, to depoſe that King from his Throne, and in his ſtead to eſtabliſh ſome other of the Royal Race upon the ſame: Therefore, that ſuch a grievous and unhappy Diſſention may never ſpring up amongſt Your People; that they may never, thro' ſuch lamentable Diviſions (pleaſing only to Your Enemies) be by Your evil Counſellors ſubverted; and that this Kingdom ſo honourable, and from Your Father's Days hitherto moſt

[1] This Paſſage reflects on the Depoſition of Edward II.

Anno Dom. 1386.

' famous in War, may not now in Your time (thro' the Diſtractions ' of evil Government) be miſerably laid waſt ; or that the Title of ' theſe Miſeries may never be fixed as a ſcandalous Mark upon Your ' Reign ; recall, we beſeech You, Your Royal Mind from ſuch fooliſh and pernicious Councils ; and whoſoever they are that ſuggeſt ' ſuch Matters to You, do not only refuſe to hearken to them, but ' totally remove them from Your Preſence ; for in a time of Danger it ' will be found, that they can no ways prove effectual to ſerve You, ' when You ſhall ſtand moſt in need of them.

Dr. Brady confuted, who will not allow this Speech for Genuine.

I have here given you the exact Relation of this Diſcourſe, between the King and the Duke and Biſhop above-mentioned ; whereby it appears, what Sentiments theſe great Men then had, concerning the Authority of Parliaments, in thoſe Days. And tho' Dr. Brady (who hath given us a lame and partial Relation of this Tranſaction, upon a Suppoſition, that no Subjects did ever accoſt a Prince in that manner) will not allow this Speech to be Genuine, but to have been wholly made and invented by the Author, the better to ſet off his Hiſtory, according to the Humour of the Writers of thoſe Times, that abound in long and feigned Orations ; yet for all this, I cannot come over to his Opinion in this point ; for as to the firſt Objection, it ſignifies little, if we conſider the high Quality of the Perſons that brought this Meſſage, the One being the King's Uncle, and the Other a Prelate of a noble Family, and One over whom ſecular Princes in thoſe days had no coercive Power ; and likewiſe the great Authority of the Two Houſes of Parliament, who then ſent them ; and it is not likely, that they went to Him without any Inſtructions what to ſay : But as for his other Objection, however it may be ſaid of other Writers, yet I am ſure it cannot againſt this (whom we now cite) ſince he is very ſeldom guilty of making ſet Speeches ; and I ſhall leave it to the Reader's Judgment, whether this Author, who was a Man at this very time, and wrote his Hiſtory in the ſucceeding King's Reign, ſhould preſume to forge a Speech of ſo dangerous a Conſequence, when the ſame Biſhop who ſpoke it (or at leaſt had a ſhare in it) was then alive, and being then tranſlated to the See of Canterbury, could eaſily have contradicted ſo notorious a piece of Forgery. But to return to the Hiſtory.

[1.] H. K. Col. 2683. The King is pacified, comes to the Parliament, and there makes the Biſhop of Ely Chancellor. [2] Rot. Clauſ. 10 Rich. 2. M. 35. Ib. M. 16. [3.] The Earl of Suffolk late Chancellor, is Impeached.

[1.] By theſe, or ſuch kind of Speeches, the King laying aſide His Paſſion, was reduced to a better Temper, and being pacified, promiſed, that after Three days He would come to the Parliament, and with mature Advice willingly acquieſce in their Petitions. The King came as He had promiſed, [2.] and on the four and twentieth of October next following, Thomas Arundell, Biſhop of Ely, was made Chancellor, in the Place of Michael de la Pole, Earl of Suffolk, and [3.] on the ſame day, Gilbert Biſhop of Hereford was made Treaſurer, inſtead of John de Fordham, Biſhop of Durham. John de Waltham was alſo made Keeper of the Privy-Seal; and immediately after, the ſaid Michael de la Pole was Impeached of ſeveral High Crimes, and Miſdemeanors, by the Commons, as follows. The Title in the Record is thus.

Anno Dom. 1386.

Rot. Parl. 10 Rich. 2. part. N. 1.

The Impeachment or ARTICLES Exhibited by the Commons in full Parliament, againſt Michael de la Pole, Earl of Suffolk, late Chancellor of England, in the Term of St. Michael, in the Tenth Year of the King, and the Judgment upon them.

The Articles of Impeachment.

Firſt, That the ſaid Earl being Chancellor, and Sworn to Act for the juſt profit of the King, hath Purchaſed of our Lord the King, Lands, Tenements and Rents to a great Value, as appears by the Record in the Rolls of the Chancery, and that againſt his Oath, not regarding the great Neceſſity of the King, and Realm; being Chancellor at the time of ſuch Purchaſe made, did cauſe the ſaid Lands and Tenements to be ſet at a much ſmaller Value than really they were worth by the Year, in deceit of the King.

Ib. N. 7. His Anſwer to this Article.

To the Firſt Article, the Earl Anſwer'd to this effect; That while he was Chancellor, he neither Purchaſed any Lands of the King, nor did He give any to him, unleſs when He made him an Earl, he had Four Hundred Marks per Ann. from the King by way of Exchange, for ſo much as he had by Inheritance out of the Cuſtoms of Kingſton upon Hull, whereof ſome part was aſſigned to him by one Tydeman of Limburgh, and others, before he was Chancellor, and ſome part ſince that time, which exchange was for the King's Annual advantage, as alſo becauſe of the Sum of One Thouſand Marks paid by the Earl on that Conſideration. And he further endeavour'd to prove, That the Oath he had taken, when he was made Chancellor, had another Intent than what they (the Commons) would put upon't; and yet notwithſtanding that Oath, he might lawfully take, or purchaſe from the King.

But the Commons not being ſatisfied with this Anſwer, made their Reply thereunto; and this firſt Article being of the greateſt Moment, I ſhall here ſet down in Engliſh all that relates to it, Tranſlated from the ſame Roll.

[1.] Ib. N. 8. Then the Commons Reply to it.

Then [1.] the Commons, in Reply to the ſaid Anſwer, ſhew'd the Lords the Copy of his (the Chancellors) Oath, when he took the Great Seal into his Cuſtody, being in manner following, Viz.

> You ſhall Swear that you will well and truly ſerve our Lord the King, and His People, in the Office of Chancellor, and will do Right to all Perſons, both Poor, and Rich, according to the Laws and Cuſtoms of the Realm, and ſhall faithfully Adviſe the King, and Conceal His Councils; and you ſhall not know of, nor permit any Damage or Diſheriſon to the King, nor that the Rights of His Crown ſhall by any ways be deſtroy'd, if you can hinder it; and if you cannot hinder it, you ſhall then clearly and expreſly make it known to the King, together with your faithful Advice and Council thereupon, and you ſhall always act for, and procure the Profit of the King in all things where you may reaſonably do it: So Help you God, and the Holy Goſpels.

Wherefore the Commons Prayed, that this being read, and well underſtood, and the Circumſtances of his ſaid Anſwer Conſider'd, to wit, that he had not denied to have receiv'd of the Gift of the King, ſince he was made an Earl, and being then in the Office of Chancellor, cellor, divers Lands and Tenements, as is contain'd in the Impeachment; and it is openly known that he had received from the King other Lands and Tenements, that are certain and ſure, to the value of Four Hundred Marks per Annum, in Exchange for Four Hundred Mark Yearly, which he had upon the Cuſtoms of Kingſton upon Hull, that are caſual, and not ſo ſure, without informing the King of His Damage in that Particular. And whereas he the ſaid Chancellor has alledged, that he received part of the ſaid Lands and Tenements ſo taken in exchange, before he was Chancellor. The Commons Reply, That he was then Sworn of the King's Privy-Council, and that afterwards, at his being made Chancellor, was again obliged by Oath; and that being in the ſaid Office, he had agreed to the Exchanges by him before deſired, and had received from the King the Remainder of the ſaid Lands and Tenements in full performance of the ſaid Exchanges; and therefore they [1.] demand Judgment of the Parliament upon his aforeſaid Anſwer; which being thought inſufficient by the Lords, the following Judgment was given, being to this effect. That ſince the ſaid Earl had not alledged in his Anſwer, that he had obſerv'd his Oath, when he Swore that he would not know of, nor ſuffer any Damage or Diſinheriſon of the King, nor that the Rights of His Crown ſhould any ways be deſtroyed, if he could hinder it; with the reſt of the Clauſe in the ſaid Oath, as is above recited; yet that he being the Principal Miniſter of the King, and knowing his Eſtate, and the Neceſſity of the Realm, had taken ſuch Lands and Tenements as are laid in the ſaid Impeachment, and are recited in the firſt Article; and tho' he hath alledged in his Anſwer, [2.] That the Gifts ſo beſtowed upon him, were Confirm'd in full Parliament, yet ſince he had produced no ſuch Record Enroll'd in Parliament; therefore it was adjudged, that all Mannors, Lands, Tenements, and their Appurtenances ſo received by him from the King, ſhould be ſeized, and taken into His hands, to have and to hold them to Him, and His Heirs, as fully as ever they had been before the Gift ſo made of them to the ſaid Earl, with the Iſſues and Meſne Profits of the ſame, from the time of the ſaid Grant, and which were to be Levied out of the reſt of the ſaid Earl's Lands elſewhere; yet that it was not the Intention of the King, nor of the Lords, that this Judgment ſo given ſhould make him loſe the Title of Earl, nor yet the Twenty Marks Yearly which he was to Receive out of the Iſſues and Profits of the County of Suffolk, by reaſon of the ſaid Title.

[1.] The Commons demand Judgment upon the Earl's Anſwer.

[2] *Ib. N.*13. The Judgment given againſt him.

II. Id. ib. The Second Article is, [2.] That whereas Nine Lords were Aſſigned by the laſt Parliament, to View and Examine the State of the King, and Realm, and to deliver their Advice how the ſame might be Improved, Amended, and put into better Order and Governance; and thereupon ſuch Examination to be deliver'd to the King, as well by word of Mouth, as in Writing; and altho' the ſaid late Chancellor did ſay in full Parliament, that the ſaid Advice and Ordinances ſhould be put in due Execution, yet it was not done, and that by the Default of him who was the Principal Officer, or Miniſter. But the Earl's Anſwer to this being not very Material, I omit.

III. Ib. Item, Whereas a Tax was Granted by the Commons in the laſt Parliament, to be Expended according to a certain Form demanded by the ſaid Commons, and aſſented to by the King, and Lords, and not otherwiſe, yet the Moneys thence ariſing, were expended in another manner, ſo that the Sea was not guarded as it was order'd to have been, whence many Miſchiefs have already happen'd, and more are like to enſue to the Realm, and all this by the default of the ſaid Lord Chancellor. This Article the Earl denied, and I do not find it was proved.

IV. Ib.

Item, Whereas one Tideman of Limbergh having had Granted to him, and his Heirs a Gift of Fifty Pounds per Annum by the King's Grandfather, out of the Cuſtoms of Kingſton upon Hull, which the ſaid Tideman had Forfeited to the King, ſo that the Payment of the ſaid Fifty Pounds per Annum was diſcontinued for Five and Thirty Years, and upwards, yet the ſaid Chancellor knowing the Premiſſes, Purchaſed to him and his Heirs of the ſaid Tideman, the ſaid Fifty Pounds per Annum, and prevailed with the King to Confirm the ſaid Purchaſe, whereas the King ought to have had the whole Profit.

[1.] For this Purchaſe, the ſaid Earl was adjudged to make Fine, and Ranſom, and the ſaid Fifty Pounds were to go to the King, and his Heirs, with the Mannor of Flaxflete, and Ten Marks of Rent, which were exchanged for the Fifty Pounds per Annum out of the Cuſtom or Profits, with the Iſſues aforeſaid.

[1.] Rot. Parl. N. 14, 15. The Judgment againſt the Earl on this Article.

V.

And whereas the Maſter of St. Anthony is a Schiſmatick, and for that Cauſe the King ought to have the Revenues (being to the Value of Four Hundred Marks Yearly) which appertain to him in England; the ſaid late Chancellor, who ought to advance and procure the Profit of the King, took to Farm the ſaid Profits at Twenty Marks per Annum, and ſo got to his own Uſe above Three Hundred Marks; and afterwards when the true Maſter Nominated by the Pope, ought to have had the Poſſeſſion, and Livery of the ſaid Profits, he could not obtain the ſame, 'till he, and two Perſons with him became bound by Recognizance in Chancery, of Three Thouſand Pounds to pay Yearly to the ſaid Chancellor, and his Son John One Hundred Pounds per Annum, for the term of their two Lives.

As [2.] to this, it is adjudged, that the King ſhall have all the Profits belonging to the ſaid Maſter of St. Anthony's at the time of the Purchaſe; and that for the Recognizance ſo made, the ſaid Earl ſhall be Awarded to Priſon, and Fined and Ranſomed at the Pleaſure of the King.

[2] Ib. N. 16. The Judgment on the 5th Article.

VI.

Item, That in the time of the late Chancellor, there were granted and made divers Charters, and Patents of Pardon, for Murthers, Treaſons, Felonies, &c. againſt the Laws of the Land; and that before the commencement of this preſent Parliament, there was made and Sealed a Charter of certain Franchiſes granted to the Caſtle of Dover, in Diſinheriſon of the Crown, and to the Subverſion of the Pleas and Courts of the King, and of His Laws.

To [3.] this the Judgment was, The King Awards that thoſe Charters be Repealed.

VII.

Item, [4.] Whereas by an Ordinance made in the laſt Parliament, that Ten Thouſand Marks ſhould be raiſed for the Relief of the City of Gaunt, yet by the Default of the ſaid late Chancellor, the ſaid City of Gaunt was loſt, and alſo a Thouſand Marks of the ſaid Money.

[1] Ib. N. 14, 15, 16.

The Sum of the Earl's Anſwers to the reſt of theſe Articles, were either by denying ſome of them, or confeſſing and excuſing others.

Anno Dom. 1386.

[1] The ſaid Earl is not only turned out of his Office of Chancellor, but is alſo Impriſoned.

But for all that, he had the like Judgment as before, upon every Article wherein he was Charged with deceit of the King. And for all theſe Offences, the ſaid Earl was not only [1.] Diſcharged from his Office of Chancellor, but being Arreſted, was Committed to the Cuſtody of the Conſtable, and after the Parliament was up, he was ſent Cloſe Priſoner to Windſor-Caſtle; but he did not continue there long, for Reaſons you will find by and by.

[2.] Ad hunc An. According to Walſingham, all theſe Articles were fully prov'd.

[3] Rot. Parl. Ib. N. 18. The Commons upon the Kings compliance with them, give the King a great Tax, which is to be depoſited in the hands of certain of the Nobility.

[4] T. W. Ib.

Note, He was Created to that unheard of Title the 13th of Octob. foregoing. The Duke of Ireland is to have 30000 Marks, provided he will go over into Ireland.

But [2.] Walſingham relates that all theſe Articles above-mentioned, were ſo fully prov'd, that the Earl could not deny them; inſomuch that when he ſtood upon his Defence, he had nothing to ſay for himſelf. Whereupon the King bluſhing for him, ſhook his head, and ſaid, Alas, alas, Michael, ſee what thou haſt done? And further, when His Majeſty deſired a Supply, the Commons Anſwer'd, That He did not need any Talliage of His Subjects, when He might ſo eaſily furniſh Himſelf with a Sum of Money from him who was His juſt Debtor. [3.] Yet at laſt, upon His Majeſtie's yielding to have him turn'd out of the Chancellorſhip, and admitting the Articles to be proved (which at firſt He was very unwilling to ſuffer) they freely Granted Him half a Tenth, and half a Fifteenth; they likewiſe gave Him of every Tun of Wine coming in, or going out of the Realm, Three Shillings, and Twelve Pence upon every Pound of Merchandize, except of ſuch Staple Commodities as Wooll, and Woolfells, only provided, that it might well and duly be expended; to which purpoſe, it was to be depoſited into the hands of certain of the Nobility appointed for that Purpoſe: And not long after, all, or the greateſt part of it was Received by the Earl of Arundel, who was then going to Sea with a [4.] great Fleet, to Secure the Coaſts againſt the French, and Spaniards. And the Parliament alſo, at the King's Inſtance, granted, That Robert de Vere, newly made Duke of Ireland, (the King's Chief Favourite) ſhould have the Sum of Thirty Thouſand Marks (which was to be received of the Heirs of Count Charles of Blois) wholly to his own uſe, provided he would be gone before next Eaſter into Ireland, and there make uſe of it, to recover the Dominions that the King had given him in that Kingdom; ſo paſſionately did both Lords and Commons deſire his Abſence, that they would rather want ſo much Treaſure, than endure him here any longer, to influence the King.

[5] Rot. Parl. 10 Rich. 2.

[6] The Parliament name eleven Lords, Commiſſioners to Regulate all Abuſes.

Furthermore, [5] the Parliament obſerving, that by the great Corruption of the King's Officers, the publick Revenue was vainly conſumed, the King inſufferably defrauded and abuſed, the common People of the Realm, by continual and grievous Burthens, miſerably impoveriſh'd, the Rents and Profits of the Nobles and Great Men much impair'd, and their Poor Tenants in many Places forced to abandon their Husbandry, and leave their Farms empty and deſolate; and yet that by all theſe things the King's Officers became unmeaſurably Rich; they therefore choſe [6.] Eleven Lords of the Realm, and gave them Leave and Power to Enquire into, Treat of, and Determine all Affairs, Cauſes, and Complaints ariſing ſince the Death of King Edward the Third, to that preſent time; as alſo of the King's Expences, and His Miniſters, and all other Matters whatſoever, happening within that time to them Aſſigned; and they cauſed the ſaid Lords ſo Choſen, to be Sworn on the Holy Evangeliſts, well and truly truly to Regulate all Burthens, and other Affairs incumbent on the King, and Kingdom, and to do Juſtice to every one, according to the Grace and Underſtanding given them by God. The King likewiſe took an Oath to ſtand to their Ordination, and to encourage them in their Actings, and not to revoke any Article of their Power, but to Confirm, and hold good and ſtable whatſoever the ſaid Counſellors ſhould do, or order, during that time: Six of whom, with the Three Chief Officers of the King, appointed by Conſent of Parliament, viz. the Chancellor, the Treaſurer, and the Lord Privy-Seal, ſhould at any time make a Quorum: And it was alſo ordained by the Act of this Parliament, That if any one ſhould Adviſe the King to make any Revocation of their Power, tho' the King ſhould not revoke it, yet the Perſon upon direct and manifeſt proof, probably Convicted only of ſuch ill Counſel, ſhould for the ſame Forfeit all his Lands, and Goods; and if he attempted it a ſecond time, he ſhould be Drawn, and Hang'd, as a Traytor.

The King alſo grants them a Commiſſion under His Great Seal, with the effect of it.

And for a further Confirmation thereof, the [1.] the King iſſued forth His Commiſſion under the Great Seal of England, Confirming the ſaid Lords in that Power. Which Commiſſion being now obſolete, I ſhall only give you the Subſtance of it, as it is abreviated from the Record, by Dr. Brady; reciting, That the King of his own Free-Will, and at the Requeſt of the Lords, and Commons, had changed the Great Officers of the Crown above-mentioned, for the good Government of the Kingdom, the good and due Execution of the Laws, and in relief of his own Eſtate, and eaſe of his People, and had appointed Eleven Commiſſioners, viz. William Archbiſhop of Canterbury, Alexander Archbiſhop of York, Edmond Duke of York, and Thomas Duke of Glouceſter, (the King's Uncles) William, Biſhop of Wincheſter, Thomas Biſhop of Exeter, Nicholas Abbot of Waltham, Richard Earl of Arundell, John Lord Cobham, Richard le Scrope, and John Devereux, to be His Great and Continual Council for one Year next coming, after the Date of theſe Letters Patents. By which He gave them Power to Survey and Examine all His Officers, Courts, Houſhold, and the Government of the whole Kingdom; to Receive all his Revenue, as alſo all Subſidies, Taxes, and other Payments; to do what they would in the Kingdom, and to amend all things according to their Diſcretions. And theſe Powers, as great perhaps as any King ever Exerciſed, were given to any Six of them, with His Three Great Officers, willing, that if any difference in Opinion ſhould happen between His Counſellors, and thoſe Officers, that the Matter ſhould be determin'd by the major part of them; Commanding and Charging all Prelates, Dukes, Earls, Barons, the Steward, Treaſurer, and Comptroller of His Houſhold, the Juſtices of one Bench and the other, and other his Juſtices whatſoever, Barons and Chamberlains of the Exchequer, Sheriffs, Eſcheators, Mayors, Bayliffs, and all other His Officers, Miniſters, and Lieges whatſoever, that they ſhould be Attending, Obedient, Counſelling and Aſſiſting to the ſaid Counſellors and Officers, ſo often, and in what manner they ſhould direct. Dated at Weſtminſter the Nineteenth Day of November. Upon this Commiſſion a Statute was made, and the whole recited in it, which you may ſee in the Statute-Book, 10 Richard II. Cap. 1.

[1] Rot. Parl. 10 Rich. 2. Part 1. M. 7.

Anno Dom. 1386.

[1] Rot. Parl. 10. Rich. 2. N. 35, 36. The Parliament is diſſolved, at the end of which the K. makes a Proteſtation.

This [1.] Parliament ended on the Twentieth of November; and the laſt thing entred upon the Roll before that Memorandum, is, That the King made open Proteſtation in full Parliament, with His own Mouth, That for any thing which was done in that Parliament, He would not that any prejudice ſhould come to Him, or His Crown, but that the Prerogative and Liberties of His Crown ſhould be ſafe, and preſerved.

[2] T. W. The King notwithſtanding reſtores the Earl of Suffolk to Favour.

[3] The Favourites contrive to have the Duke of Glouceſter, and others, Murthered, at an Entertainment, which is defeated, and how?

What was the Reaſon of the King's making this Proteſtation, you will find under the next Year, when He not only recall'd the above-mention'd Commiſſion, but alſo Revoked and Abrogated all the Proceedings of this Parliament; for not being ſatisfied with what they had done againſt the Earl of Suffolk, and Duke of Ireland. [2.] He was ſo far from parting with them, that He receiv'd them into much greater Favour and Confidence than ever before; and at Chriſtmas following, admitted the Earl of Suffolk to ſit down with Him at the Table. And Walſingham further confirms, what Knyghton alſo relates, viz. That theſe Favourites had now ſo great power with Him, as that during the Seſſion of this Parliament, they framed a Deſign (to which the King gave His Conſent) of [3.] Inviting the Duke of Glouceſter, and divers Leading Men in the Houſe of Commons, to Supper at the Houſe of a certain Citizen of London, where they were all to have been Murther'd; by whoſe Deaths they hoped not only to be reveng'd upon their Enemies, but to ſet the King free from all Reſtraints for the future. But this Conſpiracy fail'd of its intended effect, by reaſon that the Duke of Glouceſter having timely notice of it, warned the reſt not to accept of the Invitation, but rather to be content with a moderate Supper at Home, than to pay ſo dear for their Entertainment Abroad. The ſame Author further Relates, that Sir Nicholas Brambre late Mayor of London, was Privy and Conſenting to this wicked Plot, but that by the Induſtry and Courage of Sir Richard Exton the Mayor for the preſent Year, it was happily defeated; who being asked by the King to give his conſent, or at leaſt connivance to this Action, ſaid, He would never have his Hands imbrued in Innocent Blood. So that the Perſons againſt whom the Deſign was laid, grew thereby the more Popular, and Beloved, as the others grew more and more odious to the People.

[4.] Vol. 3. Cap. 27.

Froisarts Accot of this Transaction

But ſince [4.] Froiſart (I know not from what Information) has made a quite different Relation of the Means by which this Extraordinary Commiſſion was obtained, and the Conſequences of it; I ſhall here give an Abſtract of thoſe Tranſactions, without paſſing my word for the truth of them, ſince I look upon them as very improbable.

He ſays that the People being highly diſcontented at the Inſolent Carriage of the Duke of Ireland, who Govern'd the King at his pleaſure, as alſo upon the Rumour of a Great Tax of a Noble a Head to be paid throughout England; which Rumour was ſuppos'd to have been raiſed by the King's Uncles, on purpoſe to render the People more diſſatisfied with the Archbiſhop of York, the Duke of Ireland, and the reſt of the King's Officers and Miniſters at that time; upon this the Citizens of London, ſent ſome of their Body to the Duke of Glouceſter, deſiring him to take upon him the Government of the Kingdom, and to bring thoſe to an Account, who had Govern'd it hitherto ſo little to its Advantage, for that the poor Commons thought it very hard to have Taxes upon Taxes, and yet none be able to tell what became of them; to this the Duke anſwer'd, That he believed they had ſufficient Cauſe of Complaint; but as for himſelf, tho' he was the King's Uncle, yet he could do nothing alone, ſince his Majeſty did put ſuch a Confidence in thoſe He now imploy'd, that it was in vain for them to interpoſe; however, he adviſed them, that if they would obtain their Deſire, their beſt way was to engage the reſt of the Cities and great Towns of England in the ſame Deſign, and then inſtructed them further what they ſhould ſay, when they came before the King. [1.] Ibid.

The [1] Londoners gave the Duke Thanks for his good Advice, and he bad them be ſure to attend the King at Windſor, at St. George's Feaſt next enſuing, where they ſhould find his Brother of York and himſelf preſent, and ready to aſſiſt them: Then, the next Day after the Feaſt, there came to Windſor about Sixty Deputies from London, and as many from York, and other Towns in Proportion: The King would at firſt have gone away without ſeeing them, or giving them any Anſwer; but being better adviſed by his Uncles, and the Earl of Saliſbury, He received them in the Lower Hall of the Palace, where they addreſſed themſelves to Him, to the ſame effect as they had been before adviſed by the Duke, deſiring a ſpeedy Aſſembly of the Eſtates of the Kingdom, to call thoſe to Account that had misbehaved themſelves in their Employments, and put other more worthy Perſons into their Rooms, according to the Advice of his Uncles, and the Prelates, Earls and Barons of the Kingdom. When the King heard this, He told them in few Words, That their Requeſts were long, and therefore He had not time to return an Anſwer to them, but would defer it till the next Parliament, which ſhould be held at Weſtminſter at Michaelmaſs following; and that if they then brought Him their Requeſts, He would communicate them to his Council, and what was reaſonable to be done, ſhould be granted; and what was not ſo, He would reject; but that his Subjects ſhould never be his Maſters; and that He never perceived, that either Himſelf, or thoſe that Govern'd under Him, ever intended other than what was Right and Juſtice.

At this Word Juſtice, Seven of the moſt zealous of them cried out at once, that with Submiſſion to his Majeſty, Juſtice was at a very low Ebb in his Kingdom; and that He did not, neither could know the Truth, ſince thoſe that adviſed Him, did all they could to hide it from Him, for their private Profit and Intereſt; but as for their own Parts, they did not deſire to ſtay ſo long as the Day He had aſſigned for their bringing their Complaints in Parliament, ſince a more ſpeedy Remedy might be preſently applied, by calling thoſe to an Account who had miſmanaged his Revenues, and to know how they had diſpos'd of thoſe immenſe Sums, that had been raiſed by Taxes thro' the Realm, for Nine Years laſt paſt; and if they could give a fair Account, they (the Citizens) would be very well pleaſed; but thoſe that could not ſhew any ſuch Diſcharge, ſhould ſtand to the Judgment of his Uncles, and the other Lords of the Realm. Froiſ. Ib.

The King was much ſurprized at this bold Demand, and looked upon his Uncles, to hear what they would ſay: Then the Duke of Gloceſter told Him, That he ſaw nothing but what was reaſonable in this Demand of the Commonalty of his Realm; and turning to his Brother the Duke of York, asked him what was his Opinion of it, who anſwer'd, that he thought ſo too; and then all the Prelates and Barons there preſent, being asked their Sentiments, they agreed with thoſe Two Princes: Whereupon, the time for this Great Council was appointed to be within Eight Days after the Feaſt of St. George, at Weſtminſter, where all the Prelates and Lords there preſent promiſed to appear.

[1] Id. ib.

In [1] this Parliament, which continued above a Month, Froiſart ſays, Sir Simon Burley was firſt called to an Account for the Sum of Fifty Thouſand Francs, and it was demanded how he had diſpoſed of them? He excuſed himſelf by the Arch-Biſhop of York, who ſaid, that he had not diſpos'd thereof it otherwiſe than by the Orders of the King's Chamberlains, ~~Mr.~~ Sr. Robert Treſilian, ~~Mr.~~ Sr Robert Beauchamp, and others; and that, when he was like to go to Priſon, becauſe he could not ſhew any Diſcharge for this Money, he would have fled into Germany to avoid the Storm, had he not been diſſuaded by the Duke of Ireland, who promiſed to lay down that Sum for him, out of the Ranſom of John of Bretagne, Son to Count Charles of Blois, and ſo he ſtay'd his Tryal; but not being able to give ſuch an Account of this Money, as was ſatisfactory to the Parliament, who charged him with no leſs than Twenty-five Thouſand Francs, he was committed cloſe Priſoner to the Tower, being a Perſon much hated of the King's Uncles, and alſo of the whole Commonality of England, for his great Pride and Inſolence.

Then this Author further relates, that King Richard, to ſecure the Duke of Ireland from being queſtion'd by this Parliament, left London, and went down with him to Briſtol, and thither the Queen and all the Court followed; and that in the mean while, the King's Council held on the Parliament at London, and proceeded with that Severity, that they condemned Sir Simon Burley to be Beheaded, whom this Author, who knew him for a long time, very much bewails, as being a well bred Knight, and of a very great Senſe; and upon this News being brought to the King, who was ſtill at Briſtol, He was extremely grieved at it, and vow'd to revenge his Death.

Then he proceeds to relate, how the Arch Biſhop of York was turned out of his Office of Treaſurer by this Parliament, who alſo appointed a new Privy-Council, and endeavour'd a thorough Reformation in the Government, which the King, in Favour to the Duke of Ireland, did all He could to hinder and oppoſe.

Ib Cap. 28.

And therefore to this end, whilſt He continued at Briſtol, He gave the Duke ſecret Orders to raiſe an Army in Wales, and to march with it under the King's own Banners towards London, to reduce that City and his Uncles, who were ſupported by it, unto his Obedience; whereupon, the Duke advanced with an Army of about Fifteen Thouſand raw Men, as far as Oxford, againſt whom the Duke of Glouceſter marched from London, with above Twenty Thouſand Men towards Oxford, beyond which City, he paſſed the Iſis, and ſoon after encountred the Duke of Ireland, and put him to flight.

This is the Sum of this Author's Relation, who was certainly miſtaken in his Information, concerning theſe Tranſactions; for in the firſt place it is very improbable, that there was ever any ſuch Addreſſes from the Cities and great Towns of England, to the King, to call his Officers to an Account; for had it been ſo, certainly ſuch a remarkable Paſſage could not have been paſſed over in Silence by our Hiſtorians, and yet none of themdo take the leaſt notice of any ſuch thing; nor could a Parliament be then Summoned within ſo ſhort a time as Eight Days; nor was this, or the enſuing Parliament, held at the time this Author aſſigns; neither was Sir Simon Burley ſentenced to be Beheaded till the next Parliament; and then it was not becauſe he could not render an Account of the Money he had received, but for other Matters, as you will find anon, from the Record of the Proceedings againſt him in that Parliament; nor was the Arch-Biſhop of York turn'd out from being Treaſurer in this Parliament, but the ~~Earl of Suffolk~~; neither did the King leave London to go down to Briſtol, with the Duke of Ireland, to raiſe Forces againſt his Uncles, during the ſitting of this Parliament, as this Author imagines; for tho' the King at firſt refuſed to come to it, when the Earl of Suffolk began to be queſtion'd, yet He never went further than Eltham, as hath been already related; and when the Duke of Ireland, a little before the next Parliament, went into Wales, and raiſed Forces, the King did not go with him, but ſtay'd all the while in Town, till the Buſineſs was over; and then was fain to conſent to call a Parliament, as you will find hereafter. In ſhort, this Author ſo confounds the Tranſactions of theſe Two Parliaments, that none can diſtinguiſh them; for he makes them to have been but one, contrary to all the Accounts of all our Hiſtorians, and the Records of Parliament themſelves. I have taken the more Notice of this, becauſe ſeveral of the French Writers, who take upon them to give an Account of the Affairs of England, have, by blindly following this Author, been led into many groſs Miſtakes; as in particular, the Pere d'Orleans, in his late Hiſtory, of the Revolutions of England, of whoſe Performances, ſince I have ſaid ſo much in the Preface to this Volume, I ſhall mention no more of him here.

Bp. of Durham

Mezeray. The King of France continues in Flanders, ready to invade England with a vaſt Fleet and Army; but is hinder'd by a contrary wind.

As to foreign Affairs, I find this very conſiderable Action, that the King of France, being encourag'd by theſe Domeſtick Diviſions, was ſtill in Flanders, accompanied with a great number of his Nobility, having lain all this Summer at Sluice, ready to invade England, if GOD had not prevented it, by keeping the Wind contrary, from the middle of Auguſt to the middle of November, and the Wind chopping about, ſo far flatter'd the French Fleet, that they ſet out to Sea: but by that time they were Seven or Eight Leagues off from the Shore, it not only turn'd about into its former Quarter, but blew with ſuch Violence, that it drove them back again upon the Coaſt of Flanders, and deſtroy'd ſeveral of their Ships in the Haven of Sluice, upon which Accident, the King of France having called a Council, it was therein reſolved, That it now being late in the Year, this Expedition ſhould be deferred till the following Spring; but before that time, England being put into a better poſture of Defence, this Deſign came to nothing: Yet thus much is certain, That this Kingdom never had a greater Deliverance; for the Flower of the Engliſh Forces were now Abroad with the Duke of Lancaſter in Spain, beſides the great Diſcontents and Diviſions at Home; and Froiſart relates, That the World never ſaw a greater Fleet together; for it conſiſted of near Thirteen Hundred Sail of Veſſels of all ſorts; and as for the Land-Forces, Walſingham adds, that beſides, above Forty Dukes and Earls there lay ready to go on Board, Whereupon, the Expedition is put off till the next Spring.

The vaſt Preparations of the French for this Invaſion.

Anno Dom. 1386.

Three Thouſand Men at Arms, or Horſemen, beſides ſo vaſt a Number of other Soldiers, that it ſeems incredible, and the French themſelves own them to be no leſs than Sixty Thouſand Fighting Men. But the fear of this Storm being now over, it was thought fit to do ſomewhat againſt the French, by way of Revenge.

Anno Dom. 1387.

Walſingham, Ad hunc An. The Earls of Arundel and Nottingham, go out with a great Fleet, fall upon a Navy of Foreigners, where they take a great number of Ships, and Priſoners, beſides a vaſt quantity of Wines.

[1] The ſame Earls go out again, and relieve Breſt, and return home with great Honour and Applauſe, except from the King's Favorites.

[2.] The K. receives the Earl of Nottingham very coldly.

And in order to it, about the beginning of March this Year, Richard Earl of Arundel, now Admiral, having got ready a powerful Fleet, went on Board, accompanied with Thomas Mowbray Earl of Nottingham, and about the middle of that Month (contrary to expectation) ſet out to Sea; for certain Traytors had given the Enemy Notice, that they could not be ready before May, which proved much for the Advantage of the Engliſh, for by this means the Enemy growing more ſecure, the Admiral about the latter end of March, diſcover'd a great many Ships of Flemmings, French and Spaniards laden with Wine, and well guarded by Men of War; upon his meeting with them they had a ſharp Engagement, wherein he took ſeveral of the latter, and a great number of Priſoners, beſides thoſe that were killed; the reſt fled, and he perſued them for two whole Days, and took in all an Hundred and more of their Ships, reckoning great and ſmall, wherein were Nineteen Thouſand Tuns of Wine; and Knyghton Relates, that the Admiral of Flanders was alſo taken, with divers other Perſons of Note, all which tended very much to the Honour as well as Advantage of theſe [1.] Noblemen. And not long after, the aforeſaid Earl having Recruited the Fleet, Sailed out again to the Coaſt of Bretagne, where he Landed near Breſt, and not only Relieved that Place, but aſſaulting two Forts, which had been lately built for the defence of that Coaſt, he took the one, and put a Gariſon into it, and burnt and deſtroy'd the Materials that were got ready for the finiſhing the other, and then they return'd Home, with the general Applauſe of all Men, except the Duke of Ireland, and Earl of Suffolk, and ſome Courtiers; who not being given to Martial Actions themſelves, envied the Worthy Atchievements of others. Yet it ſeems, theſe had ſo much influence over the King, that tho' the Earl of Nottingham was Lord Marſhal, and had been brought up with Him, yet upon his Return from this Expedition, He was ſo far from Congratulating his good Succeſs, or giving him thanks for what he had done, that He [2.] receiv'd him with great Coldneſs and Indifference, and ſcarce took any notice of him. This deſerves our Conſideration, becauſe it ſhews us by what means this Prince, from being highly reſpected, and beloved. came within a ſhort time after to be generally hated, and deſpiſed by the Nobility, and People; for theſe Minions had ſo corrupted His Natural Temper by Luxury, and Effeminateneſs, that not only Military Affairs, but even thoſe many and Princely Exerciſes of Hawking, and Hunting, were thought too rough and tireſome for their tender Bodies.

[3.] Id. ib. The K. ſends the L. Piercy to Sea, to defend the Coaſt againſt the French, who behaves himſelf gallantly.

And [3.] ſome time after, leſt thoſe Noblemen ſhould gain too much honour by going out again, the King and His Council reſolv'd to ſend Henry Lord Piercy (for the quickneſs and ſpeed in his Warlike Undertakings call'd Hot-ſpur) to Sea in their ſtead; who tho' he was but very poorly provided of Men, and beſides, not much Countenanc'd by the Court, which envied the great Reputation he had acquir'd at the Recovery of Berwick, and was afraid of the encreaſe of it, yet he undertook the Employment, and having guarded the Seas the reſt of this Year, and behaved himſelf very gallantly, againſt the French, (tho' our Authors do not give us the Particulars) he return'd home in Safety, very much to the diſappointment of his Enemies.

[1.] Not long after, there happen'd an Action, which mightily exaſperated the Nobility and People againſt the Duke of Ireland, who was now become ſo ſtrangely Inſolent, that preſuming on his Power with the King, he was openly Divorced from his Wife Philippe, Grand-daughter to King Edward the Third, by his Daughter Iſabel, Wife to the Lord de Coucy, a Lady of ſufficient Beauty, and irreproachable Vertue, and in her ſtead, prefer'd to his Bed, one Lancerona, a mean Bohemian, who waited on the Queen, (being as ſome ſay) a Vintner's Daughter, or (as others) a Joyner's; but tho' the King took no notice of this Affront offer'd to his Couſin German, yet the Duke of Glouceſter, her Uncle, highly reſented it, and only waited for an Opportunity to Revenge it; which the other quickly perceiving, he was reſolved to ſtrike firſt. And Eaſter being now over, and the time limited by Parliament for the Duke of Ireland's departure elapſed, he (though ſo largely hired to it as aforeſaid) cared not for that Voyage; wherefore to amuſe the People, [2.] the King went down with him into Wales, pretending it was only to ſee him take Shipping there; but the truth of the Matter was, that being there remote from the Nobility, they might the more ſecurely Conſult how to circumvent and deſtroy the Duke of Glouceſter, with the Earls of Arundel, Warwick, Derby, and Nottingham, and other Faithful Subjects of His Kingdom. There were then about the King, Michael de la Pole, Sir Robert Treſilian the Chief Juſtice, and ſeveral others, who being conſcious of their own Evil Deſerts, were afraid to be brought to Juſtice, as well as the ſaid Duke of Ireland; and therefore Conſpired with him againſt the Lords above-mention'd. Having thus laid their Plot, and agreed upon the manner of putting it in Execution, [3.] the King comes to Nottingham; and, as if the Duke of Ireland's Voyage had been quite forgot, brings him, and the reſt of the Cabal along with Him, and thither they Summon divers Citizens of London, the Sheriffs of the ſeveral Counties, and all the Judges of England; the Londoners, becauſe ſeveral of them had lately confeſſed themſelves guilty of Treaſon, and been Pardon'd by the King, hop'd, in return of that Favour, that they might ſtand by the King, and accuſe the Lords of ſuch Crimes, as His Majeſty, with His Councellors in Wales had contriv'd againſt them. Then the Sheriffs were Adviſed with, what Forces they could Raiſe for the King's Service againſt the Barons; and were alſo Commanded That they ſhould not permit any to be Return'd as Knights of the Shire, or Burgeſſes for the next Parliament, but ſuch as the King and His Council ſhould Direct, or Nominate. To which, the Sheriffs Reply'd, That the Commons generally Favour'd the ſaid Lords, ſo that it was not in their Power to Raiſe an Army in this Caſe; and as for Parliament-Men, the People would hold their Antient Cuſtoms; which require, that they be freely Choſen by the Commons, nor could the ſame be hinder'd.

[1.] Id. ib. The Duke of Ireland is Divorc'd from his Lady, and Marries a Bohemian, of mean Birth, which is highly reſented by the Duke of Glouceſter.

[2.] The K. carries the Duke of Ireland with him into Wales, as if he meant to accompany him towards Ireland, but indeed to conſult about the Deſtruction of the Duke of Glouceſter, and other Noblemen of his Party.

[3.] The K. at Nottingham hold a Council of the Judges, Sheriffs, and divers other of his own Party, with whom, the King tampers to pack a New Parliament, but receives no great Encouragement in that Project.

The Judges ſhew themſelves more compliant to the King's deſigns. H. K. Col. 2693.

The King propoſes ſeveral Queſtions to the Judges concerning the late Proviſions enacted in the laſt Parliament.

Theſe Anſwers were not very agreeable to the Court-deſigns: But the Judges were more Compliant; for not only Treſilian, the Chief Juſtice, had lately indicted two Thouſand Perſons at Coventry, on pretence of Treaſon, and he, and one John Blake, an Apprentice, or Bariſter at Law, (whom the Chief Juſtices had lately introduced into Court, to ſecond his Deſigns) peruſed and approved, under their Seals, the ſaid Indictment againſt the Lords; but alſo the better to Colour their Proceedings with a Form of Law, ſeveral Queſtions were propounded to the Judges, touching the late Proviſions, or Act of Parliament, giving the Eleven Lords Power to inſpect and puniſh Miſcarriages of the King's Miniſters, as aforeſaid: To the end (as a modern Author well obſerves) that what the Duke of Ireland, and the reſt of that Faction, thought fit, might the better paſs for Law from the Mouths of the Judges. The Queſtions being ſo framed and propoſed, it was eaſier to underſtand what the King would have to be Law, than what in Truth was ſo; for it ſeems they went againſt their Conſciences, in that ſeveral of them, and particularly [1] Sir Robert Belknap, Chief Juſtice of the Common-Pleas, did at firſt, (though earneſtly preſs'd to Sign the Reſolutions) refuſe ſo to do, till the Duke of Ireland and de la Pole forced him to it, by threatning to kill him, if he denied it; whereupon, having put to his Seal, he burſt forth into theſe Words before them: Now want I nothing but a * hurdle and a Halter to bring me to that Death I deſerve: If I had not done this, I ſhould have been killed by your Hands; and now I have gratified the King's Pleaſure, and Yours in doing it: I have well deſerved to dye, for betraying the Nobles of the Kingdom; which laſt Words were like to have proved fatally Prophetick; for not long after, in the next Parliament, he was indeed condemned to Dye, tho' he was not Executed for the ſame; for ſome Authors ſay, That all the Judges of England (except Sir William Shipwith, abſent by reaſon of Sickneſs) joyned the Anſwers to theſe Queſtions; which ſeems probable enough, becauſe they were afterwards all Queſtioned, and puniſhed for the ſame, yet in the Record there are but Five named; poſſibly, the Others might conſent, tho' theſe only ſet their Seals to it.

[1] Id. Col. 2694. Several of'em anſwer as the King would have them, out of Fear.

* It is Ratis in the Latin, being miſwritten for Cratis.

[2] Id. ib.

The [2] Queſtions ſo propoſed to the Judges, and their Anſwers, were as follow:

The Preface to them is thus:

The Preface to the Queſtions propoſed to the Judges.

'Be it remembred, that on the Five and Twentieth Day of Auguſt, 'in the Eleventh Year of the Reign of King Richard the Second, at the 'Caſtle of Nottingham, before our ſaid Lord the King, Robert Treſilian, 'Chief-Juſtice of England, and Robert Belknap, Chief-Juſtice of the 'Common-Bench of our ſaid Lord the King; John Holt, Roger Fulthorp, 'and William de Burgh, Knights, Juſtices, and Aſſociates of the ſaid 'Robert Belknapp, and John de Lockton, the King's Serjeant at Law, in 'the Preſence of the Lords, and other Witneſſes under-written, were 'perſonally required, by our ſaid Lord the King, on the Faith and 'Allegiance wherein to Him they are bound, to anſwer truly unto certain Queſtions here-under Specified; and to them then and there duly recited, and that they ſhould thereupon declare the Law according to their Diſcretions.

I. The Queſtions themſelves. Imprimis, It was demanded of them, Whether that late Statute or Ordinance and Commiſſion, made in the late Parliament held at Weſtminſter, be not derogatory to the Royalty, and Prerogative of our ſaid Lord the King?

To which they unanimouſly anſwer'd, That the ſame are derogatory thereunto, eſpecially becauſe they were made againſt his Will.

II. Item, It was Query'd of them, How thoſe are to be puniſhed, who procured that Statute and Commiſſion?

To which they unanimouſly anſwer'd, That they were to be puniſhed with Death, except the King would pardon them.

III. Item, It was Query'd, How thoſe are to be puniſhed, who moved the King to conſent to the making of the ſaid Statute?

Whereunto they anſwer'd with one accord, That they ought to loſe their Lives, unleſs his Majeſty would pardon them.

IV. Item, It was asked them, What Puniſhment they deſerved, who compelled, ſtreightned, or neceſſitated the King to conſent to the making of the ſaid Statute and Commiſſion?

To which they all Anſwered, That they ought to ſuffer as Traytors.

V. Item, It was demanded of them, How thoſe are to be Puniſhed, who hinder'd the King from exerciſing thoſe things which appertain to his Royalty and Prerogative?

To which Queſtion they unanimouſly anſwer'd, That they are to be puniſhed as Traytors.

VI. Id. Col. 2695. Item, It was asked of them, Whether, after in a Parliament aſſembled, the Affairs of the Kingdom, and the Cauſe of calling that Parliament, are by the King's Command declared, and certain Articles limited by the King, upon which the Lords and Commons in that Parliament ought to proceed, if yet the ſaid Lords and Commons will proceed altogether upon other Articles and Affairs, and not at all upon thoſe limited and propoſed to them by the King, until the King ſhall have firſt anſwer'd them upon the Articles and Matters ſo by them ſtarted and expreſſed, although the King's Command be to the contrary; Whether in ſuch caſe the King ought not to have the Governance of the Parliament, and effectually over-rule them, ſo as that they ought to proceed firſt on Matters propoſed by the King; or whether on the contrary, the Lords and Commons ought firſt to have the King's Anſwer upon their Propoſals, before they proceed further?

To which Queſtion they Anſwer'd unanimouſly, That the King in that behalf has the Governance, and may appoint what ſhall be firſt handled, and ſo gradually what next in all Matters to be treated of in Parliament, even to the end of the Parliament; and if any act contrary to the King's Pleaſure made known therein, they are to be puniſhed as Traytors.

VII. Item, It was demanded, Whether the King, whenever He pleaſes, can diſſolve the Parliament, and command the Lords and Commons to depart from thence, or not?

To which they unanimouſly Anſwer'd, That He can; and if any one ſhall then proceed in Parliament againſt the King's Will, he is to be puniſhed as a Traytor.

VIII. Item, It was demanded, Since the King can, whenever He pleaſes, remove any of his Judges and Officers, and juſtify or puniſh them for their Offences; whether the Lords and Commons can, without the Will of the King,

Anno Dom. 1387.

Impeach in Parliament any of the ſaid Judges or Officers, for any of their Offences ?

To which they unanimouſly anſwer'd, They cannot ; and if any one ſhould do ſo, he is to be puniſhed as a Traytor.

IX. Item, It was demanded, How he is to be puniſhed, who moved in Parliament, that the Statute ſhould be ſent for, whereby Edward the Second (the King's Great Grandfather) was proceeded againſt, and depoſed in Parliament ; ſincce by means of ſending for, and peruſing which Statute, the ſaid late Ordinance and Commiſſion were deviſed and brought forth in Parliament ?

To this they anſwer'd, That as well he that ſo moved, as he who by pretence of that Motion, carried the ſaid Statute to the Parliament, are Traytors, and as ſuch to be puniſhed with Death.

X. Item, It was demanded of them, Whether the Judgment given in the laſt Parliament held at Weſtminſter, againſt Michael de la Pole, Earl of Suffolk, was Erroneous and Revokable, or not ?

To which Queſtion they unanimouſly anſwer'd, That if that Judgment were now to be given, they would not give it ; becauſe it ſeems to them, that the ſaid Judgment is Revokable, as being Erroneous in every part of it.

The Favourites carry the King into the Northern Countries to raiſe Men, but find themſelves much Diſappointed, in the Numbers they expected.

[3] H. K. Col. 2697.

The King returns to London, and hopes there to compaſs his Deſigns, by means of the Lord-Mayor.

But [2] though they had thus got the Judges on their ſide, and by that means had got a Colour of Law for what they did, yet the greateſt Difficulty remained ſtill behind, which was how to Arm themſelves with power ſufficient for the Execution ; in order to which, they privately ſent abroad to Levy Men, but found them to come in but very ſlowly, becauſe the Lords were generally Beloved, and theſe Favourites of the King as much Hated ; but however, they were reſolved to puſh the Matter as far as it would go ; and to this end, either to raiſe Forces, or elſe the better to keep the King from being reconciled to his Uncle the Duke of Gloceſter, and the reſt of the Lords of his Party, they [3] carried Him about, as it were on Progreſs, thro' divers Counties of the North-parts of England, during the reſt of this Summer, and the Autumn following, and that with ſuch Celerity, that (as Knighton obſerves) no King of England ever ſo quickly compaſſed the Borders of his Kingdom, as King Richard then did ; but finding themſelves unable to bring their Deſigns to effect in the Country, by reaſon of the general Oppoſition that was made againſt them, by the Nobility and Gentry in thoſe Parts, they reſolved once more to try the Affections of the City of London ; where they made the King believe, that He would find a very ſtrong Party to ſupport his Intereſt ; and at firſt, I confeſs He had ſome reaſon to think ſo ; for coming to Town on the Tenth of November, accompanied by Alexander, Arch-Biſhop of York, the Duke of Ireland, the Earl of Suffolk, and Sir Nicholas Brambre, with ſome more of their Faction, He was very honourably received by the Mayor and Citizens, who went out to meet Him with a great Multitude of Horſemen richly apparell'd, and Conducted Him and

His Queen to St. Paul's Church, and from thence to His Palace at Weſtminſter: But He did not continue long there, for the day following, the King and His Favourites having Intelligence that the [1.] Duke of Glouceſter, and the Earls of Arundel, and Warwick, were marching towards London, with a great Force from Haringay-Park, near Highgate, it put them into ſuch a conſternation, that they immediately perſwaded Him not to truſt to the uncertain Fidelity of the Londoners, who would fail Him, if they were put to the Trial.

[1.] The D. of Glouceſter, and other Noblemen of that Party march up to Haringay, and put the Court into a great conſternation.

[2] T. W. The motions of the Duke of Glouceſter, and thoſe of his Party, to defend themſelves from the deſigns of their Enemies

* The Duke takes an Oath before the Biſhop of London.

And [2.] here I ſhall give you an account of the late motions of the Duke of Glouceſter, and the reſt of the Lords of his Party, who having ſome time before diſcover'd the Deſigns of the Court againſt them, did all they could, firſt to vindicate, and then to defend themſelves from their Artifices. For which end, the Duke, to take off all the evil Impreſſions that had been made againſt him to the King, a little before his coming to London, went voluntarily to the Biſhop of that City, and ſeveral Noblemen of the Realm, and there made Oath, That he had never ſo much as imagined any thing to the prejudice of the King, but had always ſtudied and performed to his Power, whatever tended to the King's Honour and Advantage, and what alſo was pleaſing to Him*, except only that he could not reſpect, or look kindly upon the Duke of Ireland, whom the King immoderately loved, and who had diſhonour'd one that was not only a near Relation of the Duke's, but alſo of the King's, which it was fit ſhould be reveng'd.

[3] Id. ib. The Biſhop acquaints the King with the Contents of that Oath, and vindicates the Duke from Michael de la Pole's Invectives, at which the K. is very much incenſed.

With [3.] the Contents of which Oath, the Biſhop preſently acquainted the King, and at firſt He ſeem'd inclinable to Credit the ſame; but when Michael de la Pole began to incenſe Him againſt the Duke, the Biſhop ſmartly fell upon him, and ſaid, Sir, it does not become you to talk, but to be ſilent; you, who ſtand Condemn'd in Parliament, and are now alive only through the King's Grace and Favour: which words ſo provok'd the King, that He immediately Commanded the Biſhop out of His Preſence, bidding him be gone home to his Church; who, at his Return, inform'd the Duke what had paſſed, and how much the King was influenc'd by thoſe Wicked Councellors; ſo that it ſeem'd high time for him to provide for his own Safety, and to obviate that Deſtruction which was prepared for him. Whereupon the Duke ſeeing no hopes of a Reconciliation, through the Malice of the Favourites that had now the King ſo abſolutely in their Poſſeſſion, immediately ſent for the Earls of Arundel, Warwick, and Derby, Eldeſt Son to the Duke of Lancaſter, who all adviſing together, [4] reſolv'd to Raiſe an Army, and to ſtand upon their Guard, and ſo Treat with the King concerning the Premiſes, and eſpecially about that immoderate Favour which He ſhew'd to them that were Traytors both to Him, and the Publick, beſides the eminent hazard of the Kingdom that aroſe therefrom. But the King endeavour'd to have ſurpriz'd them ſingly, before they had united their Forces, but failing therein, the [5.] Confederate Lords with all the Souldiers they could muſter up, march'd towards London, to Biſhops-wood, Waltham, and Hackney, and at laſt joining together, made at their Rendezvous above Forty Thouſand ſtrong, at Haringay-Park above-mention'd. And it ſeems the King, and His Councellors, had already foreſeen what was like to happen, and therefore made haſt up to London, to hinder them from poſſeſſing themſelves of the City, as otherwiſe they deſigned to have done.

[4] The Confederate Lords raiſe Forces, and ſtand upon their Guard.

[5] H. K. Ib. They March up with them to Haringay-Park: The K. made haſte to London, to prevent their poſſeſſing themſelves of the City.

Anno Dom. 1387.

[1] T. W. The ſuddain Arrival of the Confederate Lords, hinders the King from going into France.

But this Arrival of the Confederate Lords broke all the Meaſures that were taken by the King, and His Favourites, and hindred Him from his Journey to Canterbury, under Pretence of paying His Devotions at the Shrine of [1.] Thomas Becket, but (as Walſingham relates) was from thence to have paſſed into France, and to deliver up Calais, and ſeveral other Important Places to the French King; which by the Fatal Council of His pernicious Flatterers, He was to Sell to that Prince, on Condition he would aſſiſt Him to ſubdue His Rebellious Nobility. But I ſay, the News of the Lords being in Arms, diverted that Voyage, and put the King into ſo great a confuſion, that He knew not what Courſe to take, ſome of thoſe about Him were for cajoling the Lords with fair Promiſes, others were for Raiſing the Londoners, and what other Forces could be procured, and immediately Fighting them; of which Opinion eſpecially was the Archbiſhop of York; but this the more Cautious and Prudent of them diſapprov'd, alledging the Diſhonour and Damage which would accrue to the King if worſted, as He was likely to be.

[2.] Id ib. The blunt Advice of a certain crazed Knight.

[2] Whilſt theſe Men could not agree what courſe to take, a Madman blunted out an Expreſſion, which if duly conſidered, might have done the King more Service than all their wiſe Debates; he was a certain Knight call'd Sir Hugh de Lynne, who had been bred in the Wars, but having by ſome accident loſt his Underſtanding, as well as his Eſtate, was maintain'd by the Charity of ſeveral of the Nobles and Retainers to the Court; the King meeting him during theſe Conſultations, and being willing to divert himſelf by hearing His rambling Diſcourſe, ask'd him jocularly, What He ſhould do with the Lords that were Aſſembled together in the before mention'd Park? To which Sir Hugh anſwer'd very gravely, Let us march forth, Sir, and fall upon them, and kill them every Mother's Son; which being done, by God's Eyes, you will have bravely deſtroy'd, the moſt Faithful Subjects you have in your Kingdom.

[3.] H. K. ib. A Proclamation made in the City, that none ſhould, preſume to aſſiſt the Confederate Lords with Arms, or any Proviſions, which has no effect.

But notwithſtanding this notable Admonition, [3] the King and his Favorites, reſolved at preſent to ſtand upon their Defence, by the Aſſiſtance of thoſe that they could raiſe in the City; but whilſt the Londoners were in amaze expecting the Event of this Affair, the day after the arrival of the Lords near London, a Proclamation was made thro' the City, that none ſhould preſume under Pain of forfeiture of their Goods and loſs of their Lives, to ſell or furniſh the Earl of Arundel with any Arms, Bows, Arrows, or other Ammunition or Proviſions; becauſe he had joyn'd with the Lords and Commons againſt the King; but why the reſt of the Lords and Duke of Gloceſter, were not alſo named in it, I cannot tell; unleſs it was becauſe they thought the Duke and the reſt of them too Popular to be particularly mention'd: But it ſeems this Proclamation had very little effect, for the ſaid Duke with the Confederate Lords above mention'd, ſeeing there was no more hopes of Governing the Kingdom, according to the late Statutes or Proviſions, were now reſolved not to ſtir, untill they had receiv'd a Satisfactory Anſwer from the King, as to the Buſineſs for which they were Aſſembled.

[4.] Id ib. Col. 2699. The Confederate Lords ſend the A. Biſhop of Canterbury, and other Biſhops and Noblemen to intercede with the King, but without any effect.

[4.] And to this end, immediately after the iſſuing of the ſaid Proclamation, they ſent the Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, the Duke of York, the Biſhops of Wincheſter and Ely, and divers other Lords to the King, deſiring that thoſe Seducers and Traytors to Him and the Kingdom, and who had given it ſo much diſturbance, by raiſing differences and rancour between Him, and His Nobility, might be puniſhed according to their deſerts, leſt the Kingdom thro' their Evil Council ſhould ſuſtain any prejudice either at Home, or Abroad; proteſting that they themſelves will in no point do or attempt any thing which ſhould be to the detriment or diſhonour of the Kingdom; but the Evil Councils of the Favourites were then ſo prevalent, that theſe reaſonable Requeſts could not at that time be comply'd with.

[1] Id. ib. Whereupon the Lords endeavour to bring over the Londoners to their Party.

Therefore [1.] when the Confederate Lords ſaw that the King was ſo far from agreeing with them, that He eſpouſed the Cauſe of the Five Favourites, as if it had been his own, and that they endeavour'd to bring over the Citizens of London to their Party, who might not underſtand the truth of the Matter, and alſo to prevent the Proclamation that had been lately made againſt the Earl of Arundel, therefore to acquaint the Citizens with the true Cauſe of their thus Aſſembling, and the Grievances that inforced it; they ſent them a Letter written by the Duke of Glouceſter, and the Earls of Arundel, and Warwick, directed to the Mayor, Aldermen, Sheriffs, and Citizens; Setting forth, That they the Lords above mention'd, were, and always would be Obedient and Loyal Subjects to the King, yet that they, the Mayor, &c. ſhould not wonder at the Cauſe of their Aſſembling in that manner, they thought good to let them know that it had been Ordain'd by the King in the laſt Parliament, that certain Lords thereunto appointed and Sworn, were to have the Governance of the King's Council and Realm, for the Honour and Profit of both, during the ſpace of one Year; which Government had been, and was then diſturbed and interrupted by Alexander Archbiſhop of York, Robert Vere Duke of Ireland, Michael de la Pole Earl of Suffolk, Robert Treſilian that falſe Juſtice, and Nicholas Brambre a falſe Knight of London, every one of them being Traytors to the King, and Kingdom, who Falſly and Traiterouſly by their wicked Advices and Conduct of the King's Perſon, had carried Him into divers remote Parts, far from His Council, to the Ruin of Him, and His Realm, and falſly Counſelled Him againſt their Oaths, to do divers things in diſheritance and diſmembring of His Crown, He being ready to loſe His Heritage beyond Sea by their means, to the great Infamy and Deſtruction of the whole Nation; and had alſo wickedly made ſeveral differences betwixt the King, and the Lords of His Council, ſo as ſome of them were in great fear and danger of their Lives, as they had lately inform'd the King, by the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, the Duke of York, the Biſhops of Wincheſter, and Ely, and divers other Lords; wherefore to Redreſs thoſe things, and puniſh theſe Traytors according to Law, they were now Aſſembled; requiring and charging the Mayor and Citizens by Vertue of their Allegiance, that they ſhould make [2.] Proclamation thro' the whole City that this was their true Intent, and no other, and that for the Honour, Profit, and Safety of the King, and all His Loyal Lieges, they would be aiding and aſſiſting with all their Power to the ſaid Lords, not Favouring or Aiding the ſaid Traytors, or any of them, as they tender'd the Honour of God, the King, and Kingdom, and the ſafety of their City, and that they neglect not this Advice, as they would avoid the Dangers that may happen in time to come; and then warned them to certifie the ſaid Lords of their Reſolutions in this Matter on Friday next, which was the Fifteenth of November.

This Letter was favourably receiv'd by moſt of the Aldermen and Citizens, except by the Mayor, and thoſe of his Party; but neither the aforeſaid Meſſage, nor this Declaration could work any alteration upon the [1.] King's Mind; for notwithſtanding all theſe Remonſtrances, thoſe pernicious Favourites, to prevent their own Ruin, ſtill ſuggeſted to the King, that whatever the Confederate Lords had attempted in the late Parliament, or intended to do in any other, was to ſupplant Him, and ſubject Him abſolutely to their Wills and Pleaſures; and therefore they ſtill inſiſted, that the only way to hinder it, was to make the French King His Friend (as I ſaid before) by delivering up Calais, and the reſt of the Places which the Engliſh held in thoſe Parts, and to get over thither Himſelf. But when the Confederate Lords had poſſeſs'd themſelves of all the Avenues about London, and that He found the Mayor could not raiſe Fifty Thouſand Men as he had promiſed for his Aſſiſtance, and that the Earl of Northumberland, and the Lord Baſſet abſolutely refuſed to engage themſelves in the Quarrel, for the latter declar'd he would not venture ſo much as a broken Pate for the Duke of Ireland; And the Earl plainly told Him, that he thought the Confederate Lords were not only His Majeſtie's Faithful Subjects, but that the whole Kingdom was ready to take their Parts; whereupon the King finding it was in a [2.] manner impoſſible for Him to get over to Calais, and from thence to the French King, as He at firſt reſolv'd; and alſo that his Party in the City proved to be inconſiderable, in compariſon of that of the Confederate Lords; and that the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, with the Earl of Northumberland, the Lord Baſſet, and others of the Nobility, were ſo far from cordially joining with Him, that the utmoſt they could do, was to perſuade Him to lay aſide all Rancor and Diſcontent againſt thoſe Confederate Lords, and to hearken to their deſires. He at laſt, tho' with much difficulty, ſeem'd wholly to comply with their Advice.

[1.] Id. ib. The King remains unalterable in His Inclinations to His Favourites, who incenſe Him againſt the Lords, and ſtill preſs His going over into France.

[2.] But not finding it poſſible for him to go over, and that the major part of the Nobility were againſt him, he at laſt complies with the Archbiſhop's Advice.

Then [3.] about the Thirteenth, or Eighteenth of November, the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and Biſhop of Ely, were ſent to the Confederate Lords, to know the utmoſt of their Demands; and being come to them, they then took a Solemn Oath upon the Croſs of the Archbiſhop, that they would never deſiſt from what they had begun, until they had obtain'd ſuch an Iſſue as ſhould be for the Profit of the whole Kingdom. And to procure this, they would venture, not only their Fortunes, but alſo their Lives. But however, at laſt they came to this Reſolve, That if the King would pleaſe to ſee them, and diſmiſs all Rancor and Diſcontent againſt them, they would come and pay their Duty to Him with the utmoſt Reverence and Reſpect, and would then declare to the King their Grievances, and the Cauſes of their Complaint, againſt thoſe Five who had been the Seducers of His Majeſty. Then the Biſhops above-mention'd, went back to the King with this Meſſage, who at laſt agreed to receive thoſe Lords, and give them a favourable Hearing; the Biſhop of Ely, and the other Mediators, having firſt given their Oaths that no Treachery nor ill Practice ſhould be uſed againſt them, but that they might come and go with ſafety; and if any ſuch were deſign'd, that they would Admoniſh

The Lords receive Intelligence, That there was an Ambuſh about the Mews, ready to fall upon them; wherefore, they would not attend the King.

moniſh them of it; a Caution that in the Event proved not unneceſſary; for on the very Day they were to have appeared, they received Intelligence that there was an Ambuſcade laid for them about the Mews; whereupon, they delay'd their coming; and the King (who had waited an Hour or two for them beyond the time appointed) enquiring into the reaſon, was told by the ſaid Biſhop, that it was becauſe He did not keep his Word; for there were ſecretly planted above a Thouſand Armed Men, to cut them off in their Paſſage. The King ſeemed extremely enraged at this Treachery, and ſwore that He was not in the leaſt privy to it, and therefore commanded the Sheriffs of London to ſearch the Mews; and if they found any Perſons there aſſembled for ſuch purpoſe, to kill them on the Spot: But in truth, the Contrivance was not there, but in a Place at Weſtminſter, where Sir Thomas Trivet, and Sir Nicholas Brambre, had for that purpoſe got together a very great number of their Faction in Arms, who upon this Diſcovery, diſperſed, and retired into London.

[1] Id. ib. T. W.

The Confederate Lords are received by the King in Weſtmiſter-hall in great ſtate.

But [1] upon the King's freſh Aſſurance of ſafe Conduct to the Lords, they ſoon after arrived in his Royal Preſence, whom they found in Weſtminſter-Hall in his Robes of State, with his Crown on his Head, and Scepter in his Hand; and when they came near the King, they ſaluted Him on their Knees: Then the King making Signs to them to come up the Steps of the Throne, they bow'd again, and at the top of them, they the third time ſaluted Him on their Knees; and then the King aroſe, and took every one by the Hand, in token of his Friendſhip, and ſat down again. After this they excuſed themſelves to the King, ſaying, That they did not think, or intend any Evil againſt his Perſon; but they told Him their chief Grievance was concerning the Five Traytors (above-mention'd,) and gave the King a full Account in Writing, of what they charged them with: He hereupon promiſed them, before all there preſent, That He would cauſe them to appear next Parliament, and ſtand to the Judgment of the Laws of the Land, and prefixed a Day for the Meeting of the Parliament.

They excuſe themſelves for what they had done, and declare againſt the Favourites, whom they deſire may appear at the next Parliament.

Walſingham is ſomewhat more particular in this Relation, and ſays, That upon their being admitted into the King's Preſence, the Biſhop of Ely, then Chancellor, made them a Speech on his Majeſty's behalf, gravely blaming them for their raiſing Forces without any ſufficient Cauſe; and withal commended the King's Goodneſs, who choſe thus graciouſly to treat with them, rather than to chaſtiſe them by Arms; which he told them his Majeſty wanted not Power eaſily to have done.

The Confederate Lords proffer to make good their Charge againſt the Favourite by Combat.

To this the Lords anſwered, That they had aſſembled together for the Good of the King and Kingdom; and for the Removal of Traytors from his Preſence and Councels, naming, particularly Robert de Vere Duke of Ireland, Alexander Nevil Arch-Biſhop of York, Michael de la Pole Earl of Suffolk, Robert Treſilian, and Nicholas Brambre, whom they averred to be Traytors, and then flung down their Gloves (according to the Cuſtom of thoſe Times) in token that they were ready to prove them to be ſuch by Battle.

The Buſineſs is referred to the Deciſion of the next Parliament, and all things to continue as they were till then.

To this the King anſwer'd, That it ſhould not be determined in that manner, but in the next Parliament, which He appointed to be on the Morrow after the Purification of the Bleſſed Virgin; where both Parties appearing, ſhould have Juſtice done them according to Law; and in

in the mean time, all of them ſhould be in the King's Protection, without injuring one another: Then having alſo reproved them for taking up Arms without his Authority, and told them how eaſily He could have quell'd them by Force, he took up his Uncle the Duke, who was all this while on his Knees; bidding the reſt alſo to riſe, and after ſome other more kind Diſcourſe, and drinking with the King, they took their Leaves of him: Two Days after (the more to appeaſe the Lords, and ſatisfy the People) he cauſed a Proclamation to be made in London, ſeemingly in Excuſe and Favour of the Duke of Gloceſter, and his Aſſociates; but indeed, only to amuſe them, and preſerve his dear Favourites from the threatned Storm; the Tenor whereof was to this Effect:

[1] H. K. Col. 2701. The King iſſues out a Proclamation, whereby the Duke of Gloceſter, and the other Lords, are declared Innocent.

The [1] King there declares to all his Faithful Subjects throughout his Kingdom, That whereas Thomas Duke of Gloceſter, Richard Earl of Arundel, Thomas Earl of Warwick, had been by certain Perſons, who little underſtood the Truth of Affairs, defam'd as Traytors to him, and his Kingdom; but having, by the higheſt deliberation and diligence weigh'd the Cauſe of ſuch Scandal, and with the Aſſiſtance of his Councel ſearch'd out the Truth, he found not any thing done or acted by them worthy of Suſpicion: wherefore he declares the ſaid defamation to be void of all Truth; and teſtifies the ſaid Duke and Earl to be of good Fame, Innocent, and not ſo much as ſuſpected of any Crime; and as far as he is able, will affirm and maintain them ſo to be, and will receive them from thence forward into his ſpecial Protection; and he is further willing to make known to all Perſons who were their defamers, viz. Alexander Arch Biſhop of York, Robert Duke of Ireland, with the other Three already mention'd, whom he alſo takes into his Protection, that they may anſwer whatever ſhall be Objected againſt them in his next Parliament; commanding that none upon any pretence whatſoever ſhall either to them or the fore-named Lords, openly or ſecretly, offer any kind of Grievance or Diſturbance, till the prefixt time of the ſaid Parliament.

[2] T. W. The Confederate Lords refuſe to ſeparate, and why?

But [2] for all theſe fair Words, the Confederate Lords knowing the King's fleeting and variable Temper, the Influence that theſe Counſellors and Favourites had over him, as well as their Malice and Perfidiouſneſs, thought it the ſafeſt Courſe not to ſeparate themſelves as yet, but with a vigilant Eye to obſerve their Motions; for the Duke of Ireland, and the reſt accuſed, would not venture to appear with the King at this Meeting, and 'twas their wiſeſt Courſe to be abſent; for 'tis believed, the King's Preſence would ſcarce have been able to have protected them; nor had they any mind to hazard themſelves on the Juſtice of the next Parliament; but rather reſolved, if they could, to ſecure themſelves by Arms. For which purpoſe, the Duke was ſome Days before gone down to raiſe Men in Cheſhire and Wales, either by the King's Commiſſion, or Connivance; and that it was more than the latter may be juſtly ſuſpected, becauſe when he had made conſiderable Levies, the King commanded Thomas Molineux, a Gentleman of great Courage and Eſtate, and Conſtable of the Caſtle of Cheſter, to accompany and ſafe conduct the ſaid Duke, with all the Forces he could make, to his Majeſty's Preſence. The Confederate Lords being advertiſed of theſe Preparations, and that they were upon their March, being about Six Thouſand Men, beſet the Ways by which the Duk was to come up to London, reſolving to fight him before he ſhould have increaſed his Power, by joyning with thoſe of his Party in the City, and ſo countenance his Actions with the Name and Preſence of the King.

And [1] accordingly, Henry, Earl of Derby, marched away before the reſt of the Lords, with great part of their Army, and met the Duke, and his new raiſed Forces, near Radcot-Bridge, at a Place called Babbelake, hard by Burford in Oxfordſhire, whom their Commander no ſooner ſaw, but he, contrary to the Advice of moſt of thoſe that were with him, prepared himſelf for flight; however, Molineux prevailed with him to joyn Battel; but it was no ſooner begun, before the Duke (who had been ſo good at raiſing Quarrels, ſhewed himſelf as mean in ending them) ſet Spurs to his Horſe, and forſook the Field; whereby his Men being diſheartned, and Sir T. Molineux ſlain on the Spot, the Earl of Derby obtained a cheap, but entire Victory, allay'd with nothing but the eſcape of the Duke; who having mounted a Fleet Horſe, deſigned to have paſſed the River at Radcot-Bridge, but finding that broken, then thought it his ſafeſt Courſe to caſt off his Armour and Sword, and to ſwim over; and ſo eſcaping, firſt got into Holland; but finding there but cold Entertainment, he went to Utrecht; and after two or three Years rambling up and down as a Traytor, died at Lovain in Brabant: But to return to the Action; his Horſe and Arms being found on the brink of the River, it raiſed a general Report at the firſt, that he was drowned; and that probably might facilitate his eſcape. Amongſt his Baggage was taken a very conſiderable Sum of Gold, and (what was of greater Value) the King's Letters, ordering his preſent repair to London, and promiſing to live and die with him againſt all Oppoſers.

[1] Id. ib. The Earl of Derby marches away before, and meets the D. of Ireland near Radcot-Bridge, who, upon their joining Battel, quits his Men, and flies.

He eſcapes with much difficulty into Holland, and dies ſome time after at Lovain.

This [2] Defeat confounded the whole Cabal of the Favourites; the Earl of Suffolk in diſguiſe flies to Calais, where his own Brother, being Governor of the Caſtle, not only refuſed to harbour him, without conſent of the Lord William Beauchamp, who commanded the Town, but alſo ſeized and delivered him into his Hands, who returned him back a Priſoner into England to the King; but He not only ſuffered him to go at large, but ſent for Beauchamp over, and for ſome time committed him Priſoner, for his too officious Diligence; and 'tis ſuppoſed the rather, becauſe he had for the King's Intereſt thwarted his Pleaſure; for on the late Bargains, and private Intrigues with France, about the ſelling of Calais, (as has been already ſaid) the French King ſent a Knight with Letters under his Privy-Signet, commanding the Lord Beauchamp to deliver up the Town to him, and one Sir John Golofre; but the Governor knowing the vaſt Importance of the Place, and believing the King was impoſed upon by wicked Council, reſolutely anſwered, That the Cuſtody and Government of the Town was committed to him, in the Preſence, and by the Authority of the King, and the Nobles of the Realm, openly and publickly, and he would not ſurrender it privately and colluſively, nor part with his Command, but in their Preſence and by their Command: And alſo he took Golofre's Letters to the French King from him, and ſecretly tranſmitted them to the Duke of Glouceſter; for which Affronts, the King waited an Opportunity to be revenged on him, and had proceeded ('tis thought) more ſeverely, but that the ſaid Beauchamp was a Perſon extremely Beloved, and the King was not at preſent in a Condition to uſe Rigour againſt him ; and therefore by the Mediation of Friends, he was quickly diſcharged. But to return to the Matter.

The reſt of the Favourites run away, and the King betakes himſelf to the Tower.

The reſt of this hated Faction, as the Arch-Biſhop of York, the Lord Chief Juſtice Treſilian, and others, ran each a ſeveral way, and were not to be heard of ; nay, the King betook himſelf to the Tower of London, and there made Proviſion for his Winter-Quarters ; his Deſigns being fruſtrated, firſt by his Minion's Raſhneſs in taking Arms, and afterwards by his Cowardice in uſing them ; and to add to his Confuſion, about the ſame time an Envoy from the French King was taken with Letters, whereby He ſent a ſafe Conduct for King Richard, the Duke of Ireland, and ſome Others, to ſuch a Number, with their Attendants, to come to Boloigne ; where He would be ready to receive them with all the Ceremony due to his Royal Dignity and their Character ; and then He was likewiſe to take Poſſeſſion of Calais, and other ſtrong Holds, for which (Walſingham ſays) He had already paid King Richard ſome part in hand, tho' it ſeems He loſt his Money.

Letters of ſafe Conduct are Intercepted from the Fr. King for King Richard, and the Duke of Ireland, &c. to come to Boloigne.

The Lords, with their Forces, march from St. Albans to London, and then ſend a Meſſage to the Mayor, and chief Magiſtrates of the City.

The Confederate Lords being now ſatisfied, that ſuch conſiderable Territories were like to be loſt Abroad, as well as freſh Extravagancies acted at Home, [1] in the beginning of the Chriſtmaſs Holy-days haſtned their March from Oxford, firſt to St. Albans, and then to London ; where, with an Army of Forty Thouſand Men, they arrived on St. Stephen's-day. As ſoon as they were come, they ſent a Meſſage to the Mayor, to know of him, and the other Magiſtrates of the City, which Party they would take : Upon this, the Mayor and Aldermen went out to the Lords, and delivered to them the Keys of the City, whilſt the Citizens furniſhed them with Victuals, and all other Proviſions. Then, after the Lords had cauſed all ſuſpicious Places to be ſearched, for fear of any Treachery, they took up their Head-quarters in the Suburbs, proteſting that they would not depart without a Perſonal Conference with the King, which at laſt He granted, when He ſaw He could no longer withſtand it ; but firſt permitted them to ſearch the Tower (where at that time He lay) to take away all Jealouſies. Then the Duke of Gloceſter and the Earls waited upon Him there ; and when ſome few cold Compliments were over, they laid before Him the Confederation againſt their Lives at Nottingham, his late Letters to the Duke of Ireland, contrary to his Royal Word and Agreement He had made at Weſtminſter, together with his diſhonourable Treaty for delivering up Calais to the French, &c. The King heard them with a formal Patience and Attention, yet with a dejected Countenance, not without intermingling ſome Tears, thereby ſeeming to confeſs, That He could neither deny nor juſtify what they complained of ; theſe warm Drops, and the Conſideration of the King's Youth and eaſy Nature, made the Lords much more relent than they would otherwiſe have done ; whereupon it was at laſt agreed, That He ſhould meet them the next Day at Weſtminſter, there to treat of the weighty and neceſſary Affairs of the Realm. But no ſooner were they gone, than ſome Abuſers of his Royal Ear ſuggeſted, that his going thither would be neither honourable nor ſafe for Him ; but in all likelihood, would expoſe his Perſon to immediate Danger and Contempt, as well as occaſion a future curbing and leſſening of his Authority ; whereupon, the King changed his Mind, and began to retract his Promiſe ;

The King conſents to a Conference with the Lords, and the Particulars of their Meeting.

The King is confounded at their Remonſtrance, and melts into Tears.

The King promiſes to meet the Lords at Weſtminſter the next Day, but failing to come thither, they ſend him a very bold Meſſage.

which incenſed the Lords to that degree, that being than fluſh'd with Opportunity and Power, they ſent him peremptory word, That if He did thus trifle with them, and would not come to Conſult the good of the Realm, they would take other meaſures; threatning no leſs than the Election of another Prince. This ſo terrified the King, that He was forced to meet them; and at [1.] laſt to conſent (tho' with ſufficient Reluctance) that all thoſe Favourites ſhould be Baniſhed for Ever; *viz. There were likewiſe actually taken into Cuſtody [2.] Sir Simon Burley, Sir Thomas Trivet, Sir Nicholas Brambre, Sir William Elinham, Sir John Beauchamp of Holt, the King's Steward, or Privy-Purſe, and of Clergy-Men, Richard Clifford, John de Lincoln, Richard Motford, Nicholas Lake, Dean of the Chappel, with John Blake, Barriſter at Law, who were all clap'd up cloſe Priſoners in ſeveral Caſtles. Then [5.] Thomas Duke of Glouceſter kneeling before the King, ſaid, He underſtood his Grace had been inform'd that he was about to Depoſe Him, and make himſelf King, and therefore proffer'd to ſtand to the Judgment of his Peers in Parliament. Upon this the King declared openly, that He did not think him Guilty, and ſo had him fully excuſed.

[5.] Ib. N. 6. The Duke of Glouceſter juſtified from any Evil Deſign againſt the King.

[1.] Ib. N. 11.

[1.] The Lords Spiritual and Temporal there preſent then claimed as their Liberty and Franchiſe, that all great Matters moved in that Parliament, and to be moved in other Parliaments in time to come, touching the Peers of the Land, ſhould be diſcuſſed, and Judged by the Courſe of Parliament, and not by the Law Civil, or by the Common Law of the Land, uſed in the Inferior Courts of the Kingdom; which Claim, Liberty, and Franchiſe, the King very graciouſly allowed, and granted in full Parliament.

[2.] Ib. N. 7. The Lords Appellants make Proteſtation, that whatever they, or thoſe of their Party had done, was for the honour of God, and ſafety of the King, and Kingdom.

[2.] Then the Five Lords Appellants (or Proſecutors of the late Criminals) viz. Thomas Duke of Glouceſter, Henry Earl of Derby, Richard Earl of Arundel, Thomas Earl of Warwick, and Thomas Earl of Nottingham, as Earl Marſhal, made open Proclamation in full Parliament, That what they had done touching their Appeal and Suit in that Parliament, and had done before, by the Aſſiſtance of the People in their Company (or of their Retinue) was done Principally to the honour of God, and in aid and ſafety of the King, and his Kingdom, and the ſecurity of all their Lives.

[3] Ib. N. 11. The Lords and Commons grant a Tenth, and half a Fifteenth, with a Proteſtation.

This [3.] done, the Lords and Commons granted half a Tenth, and half a Fifteenth, with Proteſtation, that it was done of neceſſity, and that it might be no prejudice to the Lords and Commons in time to come, becauſe it was ſo granted; and further they pray the King, that notwithſtanding this Grant ſo made, the Parliament might hold on its courſe, yet be Adjourn'd, if need were; and that all things touching the ſaid Parliament, might be done and executed, as if the Grant had not been made until the end of the Parliament, in manner accuſtomed, and then the King granted their Requeſt, as a thing He ought to do of Reaſon.

[4.] Ib. N. 12. In fine. The Lords and Commons take an Oath on the Croſs of Canterbury. Vid. the Oath in French, in Dr. Brady's Appendix. N. 106.

On [4.] Friday the twenty firſt of March, (which was the forty ſixth day of Parliament) each of the Prelates, Lords, and Commons had the Oath following Adminiſtred to them upon the Croſs of Canterbury, in full Parliament.

> You ſhall Swear that you will keep, and cauſe to be kept the good Peace, Quiet, and Tranquility of the Kingdom; and if any will do to the contrary thereof, you ſhall oppoſe and diſturb him to the utmoſt of your power. And if any People will do any thing againſt the Bodies of the Perſons of the Five Lords; that is to ſay, Thomas Duke of Glouceſter, Henry Earl of Derby, Richard Earl of Arundel and Surrey, Thomas Earl of Warwick, and Thomas Earl Marſhal, or any of them, you ſhall ſtand with them to the end of this preſent Parliament, and Maintain and Support them with all your power, to live and die with them againſt all Men; no Perſon, or any other thing excepted, Saving always your Legiance to the King, and the Prerogative of His Crown, and the Laws and Good Cuſtoms of the Kingdom.

And the King by the advice of his great Council in Parliament at the same time issued out writts to all Sheriffs, directing them to [illegible] and Gentlemen and other sufficient persons of their respective Counties, as also all [illegible] Mayors, Aldermen of Cities and Burroughs according to a Schedule thereunto annexed to make return to the Parliament which was to meet [illegible] after, the names of such as had taken the sd. oath and also of those that had not (if any such there were) under their respective seals. Rot. Claus. 11 Ric. 2. [illegible] m. 12.

[5] Rot. Parl. 11. R. 2. N. 16. They alſo grant the K. a Subſidy on Leather, and Woolfells, on condition that the Lords Appellants ſhould receive 20000 l. out of it.

[5.] Then the Lords and Commons further Granted to the King in defence of the Realm, a Subſidy upon Leather, Wooll, and Wool-fells, upon Condition that the Five Lords Appellants ſhould have out of it Twenty Thouſand Pounds, by Aſſent and Grant of the King, for their Labour and Expences before that time, for the Honour, Profit, and Safety of the King, and whole Kingdom.

[1.] The Commons alſo Pray, That no Perſon of what Eſtate ſoever, do intermeddle with the Buſineſs of the Kingdom, nor the Council of the King, but thoſe Aſſigned in this Parliament, unleſs it be by Order of the Continual Council; and Prayed alſo, That they might have Power to remove all Perſons from the King, which they thought fit to remove, and put others in their Places.

[1] Ib. N. 23. The Petition of the Commons concerning Councellors.

To which the King's Anſwer was, as to the Firſt Point of this Article the King granteth it, as to the Second, if any Lord of the Council, or other Lord of the Kingdom will inform the King, that He had about Him any Perſon, not Sufficient or Honeſt, He willeth that if it be proved, he ſhall be removed, and another more ſufficient, by Advice of Himſelf, put in his Place.

Ib. The King puts off the granting it.

[2.] Ib. Par. 2. The Lords Appellants accuſe Alexander Archbiſhop of York, &c. of High Treaſon.

I. That as falſe Traytors and Enemies to the King, and Kingdom, taking advantage of his tender Age, and the Innocency of his Perſon, they inform'd and put upon him for Truth divers falſe things of their own invention, againſt all Loyalty and good Faith, and made him entirely their own; ſo that they had his Love, firm Faith, and Credit, while He hated and ſuſpected his Loyal Lords, and Lieges, by whom He ought to have been Govern'd. That theſe falſe Traytors had encroach'd to themſelves Royal Power, by [3.] enſlaving the King, blemiſhing his Sovereignty, and leſſening his Prerogative, and Royalty, and made Him ſo Obedient to their Will, that He was Sworn to be Govern'd, Counſelled and Conducted by them; by Vertue of which Oath, they kept Him in Obedience to their falſe Imaginations, and miſchievous Deeds, contained in the following Articles.

The Articles of their Impeachment.

[3.] Disfranchiſans.

II. Alſo whereas the King is not bound to take any Oath, but on the Day of his Coronation, or for the common profit of Himſelf, and Kingdom, the aforeſaid Alexander, Robert, and Michael, falſe Traytors and Enemies to the King, and Realm, made Him to Swear, and aſſure them, that He would maintain, ſupport, and live and die with them; and alſo whereas the King ought to be of more free Condition than any other of his Kingdom, they have put Him more in Servitude, than any one, againſt his Honour, Eſtate, and Royalty, againſt their Legiance, as Traytors to Him.

III. Alſo the ſaid Robert, Michael, and Alexander, by the Aſſent and Counſel of Robert Treſilian, that falſe Juſtice, and Nicholas Brambre, falſe Knight of London, by their wicked Contrivance, would not permit the great Men of the Kingdom, nor good Counſellors, to come near the King, nor would ſuffer Him to ſpeak with them, unleſs in their Preſence and Hearing, encroaching to themſelves Royal Power, Lordſhip and Sovereignty, over the Perſon of the King, to the great Diſhonour and Peril of the King, the Crown, and his Realm.

IV. Alſo the aforeſaid Alexander, Robert Vere, Michael de la Pole, Robert Treſilian, and Nicholas de Brambre, by their falſe Wickedneſs, evilly adviſed the King, ſo that his Perſonal Preſence which He ought to make to the Great Lords and his Liege-People, and the Favours and Right, to which they requeſted his Anſwer, were not to be obtained, but at their Pleaſure and Allowance, in ſtaying the King from his Duty, and againſt his Oath, and turning the Hearts of the great Lords from Him, with deſign to eſtrange his Heart from the Peers of the Land, to have amongſt them the ſole Government of the Kingdom.

V. Alſo by the ſaid Encroachment of Robert de Vere, Duke of Ireland, and Michael de la Pole, with the Advice and Counſel of Alexander, Arch-Biſhop of York, they cauſed the King, without Aſſent of the * Kingdom, by their Abetments, without any Deſerts of the Perſons, to give divers Lordſhips, Caſtles, Towns, and Mannors, as well annexed to his Crown as others, as the whole Realm of Ireland, the Town of Okeham, and the Foreſt thereof, and the Lands which were the Lord Audley's, and other great Eſtates, to the ſaid Robert de Vere, and others, whereby they were mightily enriched, and the King become ſo poor, that He had not wherewith to ſupport, and bear the Charges of the Kingdom, unleſs by Impoſitions, Taxes, and Tributes, put upon his People, in diſheriſon of his Crown, and to the undoing of the Realm.

* i. e. Of the Parliament.

VI. Alſo by the Encroachment of the ſaid Alexander, Robert, and Michael, by the Aſſent and Advice of the aforeſaid Robert Treſilian, and Nicholas Brambre, they cauſed the King to give divers Lands, Mannors, Tenements, Rents, Offices, and Bailiwicks, to People of their Kindred, and other Perſons, of whom they received great Bribes; and alſo to make them of their Party, in their falſe Quarrels and Purpoſes; as in the Caſe of Sir Robert Manſel Clerk, John Blake, Thomas Uske, and others, to the Deſtruction of the King and Kingdom.

VII. Alſo Robert de Vere, Michael de la Pole, Alexander Arch-Biſhop of York, with the reſt of the Perſons above-named, by Aſſent and Counſel of the ſaid Nicholas Brambre, &c. encroaching to themſelves Royal Power, cauſed the King to give very great Sums of Gold and Silver, as well of his own Goods and Jewels, as the Treaſure of the Kingdom, beſides Tenths, Fifteenths, and other Taxes, granted by divers Parliaments, to be expended in Defence and Safeguard of the Kingdom, and otherwiſe, which amounted to the Sum of One Hundred Thouſand Marks, and more, to the ſaid Robert, and Others; and further, they cauſed many good Ordinances and Purpoſes made and ordained in Parliaments, as well for the Wars, as defence of the Kingdom, to be Interrupted, to the great Injury of the King and Kingdom.

VIII. Alſo by the ſaid Encroachment, and great Bribes taken by the ſaid Robert, Michael, and Alexander, divers Perſons not ſufficient or fit, had the Guard and Government of divers Lordſhips, Caſtles, and Countries, as in Guyenne, and elſewhere, as well on this ſide, as beyond the Sea; whereby the People and Countries of thoſe Territories being Loyal to the King, for the moſt part were deſtroyed, and great Dominions of late render'd into the hands and Poſſeſſion of the Enemy, without aſſent of the Realm, which were never in the hands of the Enemy ſince the Conqueſt of them; as alſo in the Marches of Scotland, and otherwhere, in Diſheriſon of the Crown, and great Injury to the Realm, as in the Caſe of Harpeden, Craddock, and others.

IX. Alſo by the Encroachment of the aforeſaid Alexander, Robert, Michael, Robert, and Nicholas, divers People have been hindred of the benefit of the Common Law of England, and put to great Delays, Loſſes and Coſts, whilſt Statutes and Judgments juſtly made upon neceſſary Cauſes in Parliament, have been reverſed, and annulled, by procurement of the ſaid Miſdoers, and Traitors; and this by reaſon of the large Bribes by them extorted, to the great prejudice of the Kingdom.

X. Alſo the Five aforeſaid, encroaching to themſelves Royal Power, as falſe Traytors to the King, and Kingdom, cauſed and Counſelled the King to grant Charters of Pardon for horrible Felonies and Treaſons, as well againſt the State of the King, as of the Party, againſt the Law and Oath of the King.

XI. Alſo, whereas the great Lordſhip and Land of Ireland, hath been beyond memory parcel of the Crown of England, and the People thereof for all that time have been the King's Lieges, without any meſne Lord, to Him, or his Royal Progenitors, and our Lord, and his Noble Progenitors, Kings of England, have in all their Charters, Writs, Letters, and Patents, and alſo under their Seals, in augmentation of their Names and Royalty, ſtiled themſelves Lords of Ireland; the aforeſaid Robert Duke of Ireland, Alexander, and Michael, &c. as falſe Traitors to the King, by the ſaid Encroachment, gave Advice, that the King, as much as was in Him, had granted that Robert de Vere ſhould be King of Ireland; and to accompliſh this wicked Purpoſe, the aforeſaid Traitors Counſelled and excited the King to ſend Letters to the Pope, to ratifie and confirm their Traiterous Intention, without the knowledge and aſſent of the Kingdom of England, or Land of Ireland, in parting the King's Legiance in reſpect to both Nations, in decreaſe of the Honourable Name of the King, and in open Diſheriſon of his Crown of England, and full deſtruction of his Loyal Lieges, and the Nation of Ireland.

XII. Alſo, whereas by the Great Charter, and other good Laws and Uſages of the Kingdom, no Man ought to be taken, put in Priſon, or to Death, without due proceſs of Law, the aforeſaid Nich. Brambre, falſe Knight of London, took by Night certain Perſons out of the Priſon of Newgate, Chaplains, and others, to the number of Twenty two, ſome Debtors, others accuſed of Felony, and ſome Approvers in the Caſe of Felony, and ſome taken and Impriſoned there upon ſuſpicion of Felony, and led them into Kent, to a Place called the Foul-Oke, and there encroaching to himſelf Royal Power, as a Traytor to the King, and without Warrant, or Proceſs of Law, cauſed all their Heads to be cut off, but one, who was appealed of Felony by an Approver, and him he ſuffer'd to go at large, at the ſame time.

XIII. Alſo the aforeſaid Alexander, Robert, Michael, Nicholas, &c. Traitors to the King, and Kingdom, took great Bribes in many Caſes in the Name of the King, for maintenance of Quarrels, or Suits, and one time took Bribes of both ſides, or Parties, as ſhall be more fully ſhewed, if need be.

XIV. Alſo theſe five cauſed ſome Lords, and others, Royal Lieges, to be put out of the King's Council, ſo as they dare not to ſpeak in Parliament, about the good Government of the King's Perſon, or Kingdom.

Anno Dom. 1388.

XV. Alſo whereas in the laſt Parliament, all the Lords, Sages, and Commons there Aſſembled, ſeeing the imminent Ruin of the King, and Kingdom, by the Perils and Miſchiefs aforeſaid, and for that the King had forſaken the Counſel of the Kingdom, and holden Himſelf altogether to the Counſel of the ſaid Five Evil-doers, and Traytors; and alſo for that the King of France with his Royal Power, was then Shipped ready to have Landed in England, to have deſtroyed the Kingdom, and Language thereof, and there was no Ordinance then made, or Care taken for the ſafety of the King, and Kingdom. They knew no other Remedy, than to ſhew the King fully how He was ill Govern'd, Led, and Counſelled by the Traytors, and Ill Doers aforeſaid; requiring Him moſt humbly, as his Loyal Lieges, for the ſafety of Him, and his whole Realm, and for avoiding the Perils aforeſaid, to remove from his Preſence the ſaid Evil Doers and Traytors, and not to do any thing after their Advice, but according to the Counſel of the Loyal and Diſcreet Sages of the Realm; and hereupon the ſaid Traitors, and Evil Doers, ſeeing the Good and Honourable Opinion of the Parliament, they to undo this good Purpoſe, by their falſe Counſel, cauſed the King to Command the Mayor of London to kill and put to death all the ſaid Lords, and Commons, except ſuch as were of their Party; to the doing whereof, theſe great Traytors, and Evil-doers ſhould have been Parties, and preſent, to the undoing of the King, and the Kingdom.

XVI. Alſo, that thoſe Five Traytors above-mention'd, when the Mayor and good People of London utterly refuſed, in the Preſence of the King, to Murther the Lords and Commons, they, by their ſaid Trayterous Accroachment, falſely Counſelled the King, and prevailed with Him to leave the Parliament for many Days; and cauſed Him to certify, That He would not come to the Parliament, nor treat with the Lords and Commons, concerning the Buſineſs of the Kingdom, for any Peril, Ruin or Miſchief whatſoever, that might happen any ways to Him, or the Realm; if He were not firſt aſſured, by the Lords and Commons, that they would not ſpeak or do in that Parliament, any thing againſt any of the Miſdoers, ſaving that they might proceed on in the Proceſs, which was then commenced againſt Sir Michael de la Pole, to the great Ruin of the King and Kingdom, and againſt the antient Ordinances and Liberties of Parliament.

XVII. Alſo, the ſaid Lords and Commons, after they underſtood, that the King's Mind (thro' the wicked Excitation and Counſel of the ſaid Five, &c. above-mention'd) was ſuch, that He would not ſuffer any thing to be commenced, perſued, or done, againſt the ſaid evil Doers, ſo that they durſt not ſpeak, or proceed againſt the King's Will. And then in Parliament was read the former Counſel and Advice of the Lords and Juſtices, with other Sages and Commons of Parliament, how the Eſtate of the King, and his Royalty, might be beſt ſaved, againſt the Perils and Miſchiefs aforeſaid; and they knew not how to find any other Remedy, than to ordain, That Twelve Loyal Lords of the Land ſhould be the King's Council for one Year; and that there ſhould be made ſuch a Commiſſion and Statute, by which they ſhould have full and ſufficient Power to Ordain, &c. according to the Effect of the ſaid Commiſſion and Statute; by both which no Man was to adviſe the King againſt them, under Forfeiture, for the firſt Offence, of his Goods and Chattels ; and for the ſecond Offence, of Life and Member ; which Ordinances, Statute and Commiſſion, being made agreeable to the Aſſent of the King, the Lords, Judges, and other Sages and Commons aſſembled in the ſaid Parliament, to preſerve to the King his Royalty and Realm : When the ſaid Traytors and Miſdoers, by their Evil, Falſe, and Trayterous Informations of the King, that the ſaid Ordinances, Statute and Commiſſion, were made to defeat his Royalty ; and that all thoſe who procured and counſelled the making of them, and thoſe who excited the King to conſent to them, were worthy to be put to Death, as Traytors to the King, XVIII. Alſo, after this, the aforeſaid Five Miſdoers and Traytors, cauſed the King to aſſemble a Council of certain Lords, Juſtices, and others, many times without the Aſſent and Preſence of the Lords of the ſaid Great Council ; and made divers Demands of them very Suſpicious, concerning divers Matters, by which the King, Lords, and Common People, were in great Trouble, with the whole Realm.

XIX. Alſo, to accompliſh the ſaid High Treaſon, the ſaid Miſdoers and Traytors, Alexander, Robert, Michael, &c. by the Aſſent and Counſel of Robert Treſilian, and Nicholas Bramlre, cauſed the King to ride thro' the Kingdom with ſome of them, into Wales, and cauſed Him to make come before Him the Lords, Knights and Eſquires, and other good People of thoſe Parts, as well of Cities and Burghs, as other Places ; and made ſome to enter into Bond, others by their Oaths, to ſtand by Him, againſt all People ; and to effect his Purpoſe ; which at that time was the Will and Purpoſe of the ſaid Miſdoers and Traytors, by their falſe Imaginations, Deceits, and Accroachments aboveſaid ; which Securities and Oaths, were againſt the good Laws and Uſages of the Land, and againſt the Oath of the King, to the great Ruin and Diſhonour of the King and Kingdom.

XX. Alſo, by Force of ſuch Bonds and Oaths, all the Realm was put into great Trouble, by the ſaid Evil-doers and Traytors, and in Peril to have ſuffer'd many intollerable Miſchiefs.

XXI. Alſo, to bring about their Trayterous Purpoſes, the ſaid Five cauſed the King to go into ſeveral other Parts of the Kingdom for ſome time, whereby the Lords aſſigned by the ſaid Ordinances, Statute and Commiſſion, could not adviſe with Him about the Buſineſs of the Kingdom ; ſo as the Purport and Effect of the Ordinances, Statute and Commiſſion, were Defeated, to the great Ruin of the King and Kingdom.

XXII. Alſo, the ſaid Robert de Vere Duke of Ireland, by the Counſel and Abetment of the other Four Traytors, accroaching to Himſelf Royal Power, without the King's Commiſſion, or other ſufficient or uſual Warrant, made Himſelf Chief-Juſtice of Cheſter, and by Himſelf and Deputies held all manner of Pleas, as well Common as of the Crown, and gave Judgments upon them, and made Execution thereof ; and alſo cauſed many Original and Judicial Writs to be Sealed with the Great Seal uſed in thoſe Parts ; and alſo by ſuch Accroachment of Royal Power, He cauſed to riſe with him a great part of the People of that Country ; Some by Threats, Others by Impriſonments of their Bodies ; Some by Seizing of their Lands, Others by many Anno Dom. 1388. diſhoneſt Ways, by Colour of the ſaid Office; and all this to make War upon, and deſtroy the Loyal Lords, and other the King's Liege Subjects, to the undoing of the King and whole Realm.

XXIII. Alſo, the ſaid Traytors, Robert de Vere, Alexander, Michael, &c. by the Counſel and Abetment of Robert Treſilian, and Nicholas Brambre, accroaching to themſelves Royal Power, cauſed to be delivered the ſaid John de Blois, Heir of Bretagn, who was Priſoner, and Security to the King and Kingdom, without Aſſent of Parliament, or the King's Great Council, and without any due Warrant, to the great ſtrengthning of the Adverſary of France, the Ruin of the King and Realm, and againſt the Statutes and Ordinances aforeſaid, made in the laſt Parliament.

XXIV. Alſo, the ſaid Five Traytors cauſed the King to have a great Retinue of late of divers People, to whom He gave Badges, which was not done in antient Time, by any King his Progenitors, that they might have Power to perform their falſe Treaſon aforeſaid.

XXV. Alſo, the aforeſaid Five Miſdoers and Traytors, in full Accompliſhment of all their Treaſons aforeſaid, and to make the King give Credit to them and their Counſel, and hold them more Loyal and greater Sages, than others of the Kingdom; and the more to colour their falſe Treaſons, cauſed the King to make come before Him, in ſeveral Places of the Kingdom, divers Juſtices and Lawyers; namely, Robert Treſilian, Robert Belknap, John Cary, John Holt, Roger Fulthorp, William Burgh, his Juſtices, and John de Loketon, Serjeant at Law, and with them John Blake, who were asked in the preſence of the King, by the ſaid Miſdoers, Whether the foreſaid Ordinances, Statute and Commiſſion were made in derogation of his Royalty and Prerogative, or not? With divers other Queſtions, to all which they Anſwered in manner following. Then follow the Queries that were before propoſed to the Judges at Nottingham, which ſince they are already recited, I ſhall here omit, and proceed to the Twenty Sixth Article againſt the Five Perſons above-mention'd, being to this effect.

XXVI. Theſe Five Evil-doers and Traitors, are alſo further Accuſed, that they drew away the Heart and Good Will of the King from the ſaid Lords, and others, who had agreed to make the ſaid Commiſſion and Ordinances in the laſt Parliament, and He thereupon accounted them Enemies, and Traytors; and being ſure the ſaid Juſtices favour'd their Deſigns, contriv'd that thoſe Lords, and others, ſhould be Arreſted, Indicted and Attainted by falſe Inqueſts of Treaſon, and put to Death, and they, and their Iſſue Diſherited; and theſe falſe Arreſts, Indictments, and Attainders, were to be made in London, or Middleſex; and for that Purpoſe they had procured a Falſe and Wicked Perſon, called Thomas Husk, to be Under Sheriff of Middleſex, who by their Aſſent, Procurement, and Command, undertook the ſaid falſe Indictments and Attainders ſhould be made and accompliſh'd. And for the more compleat effecting of their Treaſon, they cauſed the King to ſend his Letters of Credence by one John Rypon a falſe Clerk, and one of their Crew, to the Mayor of London, to Arreſt the Duke of Glouceſter, and others therein named, and by force of thoſe Letters, one John Blake carried to the Mayor a Bill of Information againſt them, by which they were to be Indicted, and Attainted; the effect of which

Anno Dom. 1388.

Bill was, That it ſeemed for the better, that certain of the Lords, Knights, and Commons of the laſt Parliament, which were Notoriouſly Impeachable, ſhould be privately Indicted in London, and Middleſex, of Conſpiracy, and Confederacy, for that they at a certain Day mention'd, Falſly and Traiterouſly had Conſpired and Confederated between themſelves, to make in the ſame Parliament, a Statute and Commiſſion againſt the Royalty of our Lord the King, and in derogation of His Crown, and procured the ſame Statute there afterwards, at a certain Day to be paſſed; and alſo had procured, nay conſtrain'd our Lord the King, to Aſſent againſt his Will to have it made: And they Traiterouſly, againſt their Allegiance, hinder'd the King from uſing His Royalty, to the great Diſteriſon of Him, and Derogation to His Crown, againſt their Allegiance, Swearing to maintain each other in this matter.

And further, the ſaid Evil-doers, and Traytors ſet a Watch to give notice of the Duke of Lancaſter's Landing in England, that he might be Arreſted upon his arrival.

XXVII. Alſo the above-named Five Evil-doers, and Traytors, after having informed the King that He ſhould believe that the ſaid Statute, Ordinances, and Commiſſion, were made in derogation of his Royalty and Prerogative, they ſtrongly poſſeſſed him that all thoſe who made, or cauſed to be made the ſaid Statute, Ordinances, and Commiſſion, had thereby a purpoſe to degrade, and finally to depoſe Him, and that they would not give over that purpoſe, until they had perfected it; for which Cauſe the King held them as Enemies, and Traytors.

XXVIII. Alſo, after this Falſe and Traiterous Information, when the Five aforeſaid had procured the King to hold the Loyal Lords as Enemies and Traytors, the ſaid Miſdoers, and Traytors, Adviſed Him by every way poſſible, as well by the Power of his own People, as by the Power of His Enemies of France, and others, to deſtroy and put to Death the ſaid Lords, and all others who aſſented to the making of the ſaid Statute, Ordinances, and Commiſſion, and that it might be done ſo privately, as none might know of it till it was done.

XXIX. Alſo, to accompliſh the High Treaſon aforeſaid, Alexander, &c. Robert de Vere, &c. and Michael, &c. by their Advice, cauſed the King to ſend his Letters of Credence to his Adverſary the King of France; ſome by one Nicholas Southwell, a Groom of his Chamber, and others, by other Perſons of ſmall Account, as well Strangers, as Engliſh, Requeſting and Praying the King of France, that He would with all his Power and Advice be Aiding and Aſſiſting Him to deſtroy and put to Death the ſaid Lords, and other Engliſh, which the King held to be his Enemies, and Traytors, as above, to the great diſturbance and diſſatisfaction of the whole Realm.

XXX. Alſo the Three laſt named Perſons encroaching to themſelves Royal Power, cauſed the King to Promiſe the King of France by his Letters Patents, and Meſſages, that for ſuch his Aid and Power to accompliſh the ſame, He would Give and Surrender unto him the Town and Caſtle of Calais, and all other Caſtles and Fortreſſes in the Marſhes or Confines of Picardy, and Artois, with the Caſtles and Towns of Cherburgh, and Breſt, to the great Diſhonour, Trouble, and Ruin of the King, and Kingdom.

XXXI. Alſo, after the laſt named Three were ſure of having Aid and Aſſiſtance from the King of France, by Inſtigation and Contrivance of the ſaid Traytors, a Conference was to have been in the Marſhes of Calais; about a Truce for Five Years between the Two Nations; at which Conference both Kings were to be preſent, as likewiſe the Engliſh Lords, whom the King then held to be his Traytors; and there Thomas Duke of Glouceſter, Conſtable of England, Richard Earl of Arundel and Surrey, and Thomas Earl of Warwick, with divers others, were to have been put to Death by Treachery.

XXXII. Alſo, for performance of this High Treaſon, the laſt named Three, cauſed the King to ſend for ſafe Conducts to the King of France, ſome for Himſelf, and for the Duke of Ireland, and others for John Saliſbury, and John Lancaſter, Knights, with other People with them, who were to go into France, to put in Execution this wicked Purpoſe and Treaſon; which ſafe Conducts were ready to be produced.

XXXIII. Alſo, the foreſaid Nicholas Brambre, falſe Knight of London, by the Aſſent and Advice of the ſaid Alexander &c. Robert de Vere &c. Michael, &c and Robert Treſilian Falſe Juſtice, encroaching to themſelves Royal Power (as before) ſome of them went perſonally into London, and without the Aſſent and Knowledge of the King, there openly in his Name made all the Crafts or Trades of that City to be Sworn, to hold and perform divers Matters not Lawful, as is contain'd in the ſaid Oath, upon Record in Chancery: And amongſt other things, that they ſhould keep and maintain the King's Will and Purpoſe to their Power, againſt all ſuch as were, or ſhould be Rebels againſt the King's Perſon, or His Royalty, and that they ſhould be ready to live and die with Him, in deſtruction of all ſuch, who did or ſhould deſign Treaſon againſt the King in any manner; and that they ſhould be ready, and come ſpeedily to their Mayor for the time being, or that afterwards ſhould be, when and at what hour they ſhould be required, to reſiſt ſo long as they lived, all ſuch as did, or ſhould deſign any thing againſt the King in any of the Points above-ſaid; at which time the King, by Evil Information of the ſaid Miſdoers, and Traytors, and by the falſe Anſwers of the Juſtices, firmly held the ſaid Lords, and others, who contrived the ſaid Statute, Ordinances, and Commiſſion, to be Rebels, Enemies, and Traytors, which falſe Information was then unknown to the People of London; and alſo by obſcure words contained in the ſaid Oath, the intent of the Miſdoers, and Traytors being to engage the People of London to raiſe their Power to deſtroy the ſaid Loyal Lords, and others.

XXXIV. Alſo, the ſaid Nicholas, Alexander, Robert de Vere, and Michael, as Traytors to the King, and Kingdom, encroaching to themſelves Royal Power, did of their own Authority, without Warrant from the King, or His Great Council, cauſe to be Proclaimed thro' the City of London, that none of the King's Lieges ſhould Aid or Comfort Richard Earl of Arundel and Surrey, a Peer of the Land, and one of the Lords of the King's Great Council, during the Commiſſion, nor ſhould ſell him Armour, Victuals, or other things neceſſary, but ſhould avoid all of his Party as Rebels, upon pain of being proceeded againſt as Rebels, and on Forfeiture of all they were worth; ſhewing Letters Patent from the King, for making ſuch Proclamation, being to the Deſtruction of the King's Liege Subjects.

Alſo

XXXV. Alſo the ſaid Nicholas Brambre, by Aſſent and Counſel of the ſaid Alexander, Robert de Vere, and Michael, cauſed it to be Proclaimed in the City of London, That no Perſon ſhould be ſo hardy as to preſume to ſpeak any ill of the ſaid Miſdoers, and Traytors, upon pain of Forfeiting to the King whatever they were worth.

XXXVI. Alſo the ſaid Five Traytors to the King, and Kingdom, cauſed the King to make certain Perſons to be Sheriffs thro' the Kingdom, named and recommended to Him by the ſaid Evil Doers, and Traytors, to the intent that they might get ſuch Perſons as they ſhould name, return'd for Knights of the Shire to ſerve in Parliament, to the undoing of the Loyal Lords, and Commons, and alſo the good Laws and Cuſtoms of the Kingdom.

XXXVII. Alſo the ſaid Five Miſdoers, and Traytors, during the time of Protection, to hinder the Appeal againſt them, falſly Counſelled, and prevailed with the King to Command by His Letters divers Knights, and Eſquires, Sheriffs, and other Miniſters of ſeveral Counties, to Levy and Aſſemble all the Power they could to join with the Duke of Ireland againſt the Lords Appellants, to make ſudden War upon, and deſtroy them.

XXXVIII. Alſo during the time of the ſaid Protection of the ſaid Robert de Vere, Michael &c. Alexander &c. Nicholas, &c. they cauſed the King by His Letters, to ſignifie to the Duke of Ireland, that they were all Appealed of Treaſon, by Thomas Duke of Glouceſter, Conſtable of England, Richard Earl of Arundel and Surrey, and Thomas Earl of Warwick, and how He had given them day until the next Parliament; and how He had taken into His ſpecial Protection both Parties, with all their Goods, and Chattels; and it was further contain'd in the King's Letters, that if the Duke of Ireland ſhould have ſufficient Power, he ſhould not ceaſe to March on with all his Force to come to Him; and ſoon after they cauſed the King to write to the ſaid Duke, that he ſhould take the Field with all the Force he could get together, and that he would meet Him with all his Troops, and that He would adventure his Royal Perſon with him, and that He was in great danger, as alſo the whole Nation, if He was not relieved by him; and this the Duke ought to declare to all the People with him, and that the King would pay the Wages and Coſts of the ſaid Duke, and all the People Aſſembled with him. By Vertue of which Letters, and the Wicked and Traiterous Inſtigations, as well of the Duke, and his Adherents, and all the other Miſdoers, and Traytors, he raiſed a great number of Men at Arms, and Archers, as well in the Counties of Lancaſter, and Cheſter, as in Wales, and other Places of the Kingdom, to deſtroy and put to death the ſaid Loyal Lords, and all others who had Aſſented to the making of the Statute, Ordinances, and Commiſſion, in defence of the King, and His Kingdom.

XXXIX. Alſo the ſaid Robert de Vere, Duke of Ireland, Falſe Traytor to the King, and Kingdom, Aſſembled a great Power of Men at Arms, and Archers, in Lancaſhire, Cheſhire, Wales, and many other Places, to the intent to have Traiterouſly deſtroyed with all his Power the ſaid Lords, Thomas Duke of Glouceſter, Conſtable of England, Henry Earl of Derby, Richard Earl of Arundel and Surrey, Thomas Earl of Warwick, and Thomas Earl Marſhal, with divers others the King's Lieges, to the undoing and ruin of the King, and the whole Kingdom; and ſo Rode or Marched with a great Force of Men at Arms, and Archers, from the Country of Cheſter, to Radcot-Bridge, accroaching to himſelf Royal Power, and diſplaying the King's Banner in his Army, againſt the State of the King, and His Crown.

[2.] The Perſons Appeal'd not appearing, their Default is Recorded, and Judgment is demanded againſt them.

This Impeachment was Exhibited on Monday the Third of February, being the firſt Day of the Parliament, when the Lords Appellants alſo affirmed they were ready to prove every Article of it, as ſhould be awarded in Parliament, to the Honour of God, and the Advantage and Profit of the King, and the whole Realm. [1.] Whereupon all the Perſons Appeal'd, were by Command of the King, and Lords, Solemnly Summon'd in the Great Hall at Weſtminſter, as alſo at the Gate of the ſaid Palace, to come in and Anſwer the ſaid Appellants ; But their non-appearance, the ſaid Duke and Lords Appellants pray upon that, their [2.] Default might be Recorded. Then upon the ſaid Appellant's alledging that the accuſed had full notice of the ſaid Appeal, and the King and Lords being ſatisfied it was ſo, by reaſon they did not appear, their Default was Recorded accordingly; whereupon the ſaid Duke and Earls Appellants prayed the King and Lords that they might be Adjudged and Convicted of the Treaſons contain'd in the ſaid Appeal ; then the King and Lords took time to conſider and examine the Articles, after which they would give ſuch Judgment in this Caſe, as ſhould be to the Honour of God, the Advantage and Profit of the King, and the whole Kingdom. Then the King Commanded the ſaid Lords to Examine the Articles ſeverally, which they did with great Labour and Diligence, until Thurſday the Thirteenth of February.

Cauſes only to be Tried in Parliament, and by whom.

[3.] During this Interval, the Juſtices, Serjeants, and other Sages of the Law, both of the Realm, and of the Law Civil, were Charged by the King to give their faithful Advice to the Lords of Parliament, how they ought to proceed in the above-ſaid Appeal. Then the ſaid Juſtices, Serjeants, and Sages of both Laws, having taken theſe Matters into their Deliberation, Anſwer'd the ſaid Lords of Parliament, that they had ſeen and well underſtood the Tenor of the ſaid Appeal, and affirm'd that it was not made nor brought according as the one Law or other requir'd ; upon which, the ſaid Lords of Parliament having taken Deliberation, and Advice, it was by the Aſſent of the King, with their common accord declared, That in ſo high a Crime as is laid in this Appeal, and which touches the Perſon of the King, and ‘ the Eſtates of this Realm, and is perpetrated by Perſons who are ‘ Peers thereof, together with others, the Cauſe cannot be tried elſe- ‘ where, but in Parliament, nor by any other Law, or Court, except ‘ that of Parliament, and that it belongs to the Lords of Parliament, ‘ and to their free Choice and Liberty, by antient Cuſtom of Parlia- ‘ ment, to be Judges in ſuch Caſes, and to judge of them by the ‘ Aſſent of the King; and thus it ſhall be done in this Caſe, by Award ‘ of Parliament, becauſe the Realm of England is not, nor ever was ‘ (neither is it the Intent of the King, and Lords of Parliament that it ‘ ſhall ever be) Rul'd or Govern'd by the Law Civil, and therefore it ‘ is not their Intent, otherwiſe to proceed in ſo High a Caſe as this ‘ Appeal, which cannot be Tryed or Determin'd any where elſe than ‘ in Parliament, ſince the Proceſs or Order uſed in Inferior Courts 'is only as they are intruſted with the Execution of the Antient Laws 'and Cuſtoms of the Realm, and the Ordinances and Eſtabliſhments 'of Parliament, and it was the Judgment of the Lords of Parliament, 'by Aſſent of the King, that this Appeal was well and duly brought, 'and the Proceſs upon the ſame was good and effectual, according 'to the Laws and Courſe of Parliament, and by which they will 'Award and Judge it.

Ib.

Upon this, the Appellants again moved the King and Lords to Record their Default; and that Nicholas Brambre (who was the only Perſon in Cuſtody, might be brought to Anſwer. Then the other Perſons Appeal'd were again Summon'd to come in and make Anſwer, but they did not appear; nevertheleſs the King and Lords took time to deliberate till the next day, being the fifth of February, at which time, the ſaid Appellants again Prayed that the Default of the Appealed might be Recorded, which was done accordingly.

[illegible]

The Archbiſhop's Proteſtation.

[1.] Ib. N. 9. See it at large in Dr. Brady's Append. N. 9.

After which, the [1.] Archbiſhop of Canterbury, in behalf of himſelf, and all other the Suffragan Biſhops, with the Abbots, Priors, and other Prelates, holding of the King by Barony, made Proteſtation, and deliver'd it in Writing, for the ſaving of their Right of Peerage, and Sitting and Voting in Parliament, notwithſtanding they could not now be there, by reaſon of certain Matters then in agitation, at which by the Sacred Canons, they could not be Perſonally preſent. The like Proteſtation was made by the Biſhops of Dureſm, and Carliſle, mutatis mutandis; which Proteſtation being at the Inſtance of the Archbiſhop, and other Prelates, Read in full Parliament, was by the Command of the King, and Aſſent of the Lords Temporal, Enrolled in the Rolls of Parliament.

Ib. N. 15.

And then, on the Thirteenth of February, the King and Lords of Parliament being Met again in the White-Hall, the ſaid Appellants Prayed, that the laſt Default of the ſaid Archbiſhop, Duke, and Earl, with Robert Treſilian ſhould be Recorded. Then the Perſons accuſed being again Summon'd (the third time) and not appearing, the Lords proceeded to Judgment, and declared, that divers of the Articles therein Contain'd were Treaſon, as the Firſt, Second, Eleventh, Twelfth, Fifteenth, and Seventeenth, as alſo the Eighteenth, Twenty Ninth, Thirtieth, Thirty Firſt, Thirty Second, Thirty Seventh, Thirty Eighth, and Thirty Ninth Articles; and then upon due Information of their Conſciences, they Pronounced the ſaid Archbiſhop, Duke, and Earl, with Robert Treſilian, to be Notoriouſly Guilty of each of the ſaid Articles that concern'd them; and that they were alſo culpable in all the reſt of the Articles contain'd in the ſaid Appeal, not yet declar'd Treaſon.

Ib.

Then in preſence of the King, and Lords aſſembled, at the Day and Place aforeſaid, the ſaid Duke and Earls Appellants pray'd the King, and Lords there preſent, that the Perſons ſo appeal'd as aforeſaid, ſhould be adjudged Convicted of the High Treaſons contain'd in the ſaid Appeal. Wherefore the ſaid Lords of Parliament there preſent, as Judges of Parliament in this Caſe, by aſſent of the King, Pronounced their Sentence, and do Adjudge the ſaid Archbiſhop, Duke, and Earl, with Robert Treſilian, ſo Appealed as aforeſaid, to be Guilty and Convicted of Treaſon, and to be Drawn and Hang'd as

Traytors,

Anno Dom. Traytors, and Enemies to the King, and Kingdom, and that their 1388. Heirs ſhould be Diſinherited for ever, and their Lands, and Tenements, Goods and Chattels Forfeited to the King, and that the Temporalities of the Archbiſhop of York ſhould be taken into the King's Hands; and becauſe the like Caſe had not been ſeen in the Kingdom, concerning the Perſon of an Archbiſhop, or Biſhop, the Lords would adviſe by aſſent of the King what they ſhould beſt do, for the honour of God, and of Holy Church, and the ſafety of the Laws of the Land, about Him.

Ib. Then the Duke and Earls Appellants prayed that Sir Nicholas Brambre might be brought to Anſwer, and on Monday the Seventeenth of February the Conſtable of the Tower brought him into the Parliament, where the Articles of appeal were read before him, to which he pleaded not Guilty in any Point, and ſaid he was there ready to make good what he ſaid by his Body, as a Knight ought to do. The Lords anſwer'd, Battel did not lie in that Caſe, and that they would Examine the Articles touching the ſaid Nicholas, and take due Information by all true, neceſſary and convenient ways, that their Conſciences might be truly directed what Judgment to give in this Caſe, to the honour of God, the advantage and profit of the King, and His Kingdom, and as they would anſwer it before God, according to the Courſe and Law of Parliament.

Ib. During this Examination, on Wedneſday the Nineteenth of February, Sir Robert Treſilian was taken (being Conceal'd in an Apothecarie's Houſe in Pallace-yard) and brought into Parliament; who being asked if he had any thing to ſay which had happen'd ſince Judgment had paſſed upon him, why Execution ſhould not be done? and He having nothing to ſay, it was Commanded that he ſhould be carried to the Tower, and from thence drawn upon a Hurdle thro' the City of London, to the Gallows at Tyburn, and there to hang by the Neck, and that the Execution ſhould be done upon him by the Marſhal of England, taking to his aſſiſtance the Mayor, Sheriffs and Aldermen of London; and he was Executed the ſame Day accordingly.

Ib. On the Morrow, which was the Twentieth Day of February, Sir Nicholas Brambre was brought into Parliament, and the Lords upon diligent Examination, due Proof and Information, found him alſo Guilty of High Treaſon, and they awarded by aſſent of the King, that as a Traytor, and open Enemy to the King, and Kingdom, he ſhould be Drawn, and Hang'd, his Heirs for ever Diſherited, and his Lands and Tenements, Goods and Chattels Forfeited to the King, and he was Executed on the ſame Day accordingly, and in the ſame manner as was Sir Robert Treſilian.

Ib. It was then Reſolv'd to be the Intention of all the Lords of Parliament, Spiritual, and Temporal, as well the Lords Appellants, as all others, and by them agreed, That conſidering the tender Age of the King before that time, and the Innocency of His Royal Perſon, nothing contained in the Appeal, nor in any Article thereof, nor in the Judgment given, ſhould be accounted any Fault or Diſhoneſty in His Perſon, in any manner, for the Cauſes above-ſaid, nor ſhould turn in prejudice of His Perſon by any Contrivance, or Interpretation whatever; but that the falſe Treaſon and Default above-ſaid, ſhould be Charged upon the Appealed and that the Judgments given againſt them ſhould have full Force and Vertue, notwithſtanding any thing could be ſaid, or alledged to the contrary.

Ib.

Upon Monday the Second Day of March next following, Sir Robert Belknap, late Chief Juſtice of the Common Bench, Sir Roger Fulthorp, Sir John Holt, and Sir William Burgh, late his Companions of the ſame Bench; Sir John Cary, late Chief Baron of the Exchequer, and John Lockton, late Serjeant to the King, were accuſed and impeach'd by the Commons in Parliament, for putting their Hands and Seals to the Queſtions and Anſwers given at Nottingham as aforeſaid, by the Procurement of the ſaid Appealed and Convicted Perſons of Treaſon, to cover and affirm their High-Treaſons, &c. a Copy whereof was Exhibited and Read before them, and they were anſwered, as was ſurmiſed by the Commons in the ſaid Copy; to which the Appealed replyed, They could not gainſay, but that the Queſtions were ſuch as were then asked them, but the Anſwers were not ſuch as they put their Seals to.

Ib.

But Sir Robert Belknap Pleaded in Particular, That the Archbiſhop of York, in his Chamber at Windſor, told him that he had deviſed and drawn up the Commiſſion and Statute, whereby the Government was wholly taken out of the King's Hands, and that he therefore hated him above all Men, and that if he found not ſome way to make void the ſaid Statute and Commiſſion, he ſhould be Slain as a Traytor. He anſwer'd, That the Intention of the Lords, and ſuch as aſſiſted at the making of them, was, that they ſhould be for the Honour and good Government of the State of the King, and Kingdom; That he twice parted from the King diſſatisfied, and was in doubt of his Life, and ſaid theſe Anſwers proceeded not from his good will, but were made againſt his Mind, and were the effects of the Threats of the Archbiſhop of York, Duke of Ireland, and Earl of Suffolk: and that he was Sworn, and Commanded in the preſence of the King, upon pain of Death, to conceal this Matter, as the Council of the King, and prayed for the Love of God he might have a gracious and merciful Judgment.

Ib.

Sir John Holt alledged the ſame matter of Excuſe, and made the ſame Prayer, ſo did Sir William Burgh, and Sir John Cary; who all made the ſame Excuſe, and made the ſame Requeſts, as did alſo Sir Roger Fulthorp, and John Locton Serjeant at Law.

[1.] Ib. The Anſwer of the Commons, to the Excuſes of the Judges.

To [1.] all which the Commons Anſwer'd, They were taken and holden for Sages in the Law, and the King's Will was, that they ſhould have anſwer'd the Queſtions as the Law was, and not otherwiſe, as they did, with Deſign and under Colour of Law, to Murther and Deſtroy the Lords, and Loyal Lieges, who were aiding and aſſiſting in making the Commiſſion and Statute in the laſt Parliament, for the good Government of the State of the King, and Kingdom; and therefore the Commons pray'd they may Adjudged, Convicted, and Attainted as Traytors.

[2] Ib. The Judgment of the Lords upon the ſaid Offenders.

[2.] Upon which, the Lords Temporal took time, by good Deliberation to Examine the Matter and Circumſtances of it; and for that they were preſent at the making of the ſaid Statute and Commiſſion, which they knew were contrived for the Honour of God, and for the good Government of the State of the King, and whole Kingdom; and that it was the King's Will they ſhould not have otherwiſe anſwer'd them than according to Law, and had anſwer'd as before; they were by the Lords Temporal, by the aſſent of the King, adjudged to be Drawn and Hanged as Traytors, their Heirs Diſherited, and their Lands and Tenements, Goods and Chattels to be Forfeited to the King.

[1] Ib. The Impeachment of John Blake, and Thomas Uſk, two Counſellors at Law.

On [1.] Tueſday March the Third, John Blake, and Thomas Uſk were brought into Parliament; and firſt John Blake was Impeached by the Commons, That being retained of Council for the King, he drew up the Queſtions, to which the Juſtices made Anſwer, and contrived with the Perſons Appealed, that the Lords, and other the King's Loyal Lieges that cauſed the ſaid Commiſſion and Statute to be made in the laſt Parliament, ſhould be Indicted in London and Middleſex for Treaſon; and that they ſhould be Arreſted, and Traiterouſly and Wickedly Murthered, and that he was Aiding and Adviſing in the Treaſons aforeſaid, with the Appealed already Executed.

Then Thomas Uſk was Accuſed, for procuring himſelf to be made Under Sheriff of Middleſex, to the end to cauſe the ſaid Lords, and Loyal Lieges to be Arreſted and Indicted, as had been ſaid before, and was Aiding and Counſelling the Appealed in the Treaſons aforeſaid.

[2.] Ib. They excuſe themſelves as having acted by the King's Command.

[2.] John Blake Anſwer'd, That he was retain'd of Counſel for the King by his Command, and Sworn to keep ſecret his Advice, and whatever he did, it was by the King's Command, whom he ought to obey; and Thomas Uſke gave the ſame Anſwer. Whereupon the Lords Temporal took Deliberation until the Morrow, being the fourth of March, when the ſaid John and Thomas were again brought into Parliament; and good Advice and Deliberation having been taken by the Lords, they Pronounced them Guilty of the Things whereof they were Accuſed. And whereas they alledged for their Excuſe the King's Command, it made the Crime the greater, for that they knew well that the Perſons Appealed and Condemned, had encroached to themſelves Royal Power, as is ſaid before, and it was Their Command, and not the King's; then the Lords awarded, by aſſent of the King, that they ſhould both be Hanged and Drawn as Traytors, and open Enemies to the King, and Kingdom, and their Heirs Diſherited for ever, and their Lands, and Tenements, Goods and Chattels Forfeited to the King, and they were Executed the ſame Day.

The Judgment of the Lords upon them.

[3.] Ib. The Lords give Sentence of Death upon all the late Judges.

On [3.] Friday the Sixth of March, Sir Robert Belknap, Sir Roger Fulthorp, Sir John Holt, Sir William Burgh, Sir John Cary, and John Locton, were brought into the Parliament, and the Lords were ſatiſfied that they were at the making of the ſaid Commiſſion and Statute in the laſt Parliament; and Sir John Cary knew well they were made to the Honour of God, and the good Government of the State of the King, and the whole Kingdom, and ſo on, as in the other Proceſſes; and then they had Judgment again paſſed upon them as before. And at that very time came in the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and all the Biſhops of both Provinces, and prayed the Lords Temporal, [4.] that the Execution as to their Lives might be Reſpited, ſo that they might obtain their Lives of the King: Who thereupon Ordered Execution ſhould be ſtayed, and granted them their Lives. But as to the other part of their Sentence, that was to remain in Force, and their Bodies to be in Priſon during the King's Pleaſure; until by Advice of the Lords He ſhould direct otherwiſe concerning them.

[1.] Ib. The Biſhop of Chicheſter is Impeach'd.

On [1.] the ſame Friday, Thomas Biſhop of Chicheſter was Impeached and Accuſed by the Commons, That he was preſent at the Places and Times when the ſaid Queſtions were put to the Juſtices, &c. and the Anſwers made, and excited them by Threats to Anſwer as they did, and knew the falſe Purpoſes and Treaſons deſigned by the Traytors adjudged, and aided and aſſiſted them, and would not make diſcovery to any of the Lords, that cauſed the ſaid Commiſſion to be made laſt Parliament, whereby Remedy might have been had for the Safety of the King, and Kingdom. [2.] To which the Biſhop Anſwer'd, That of his own free will, he had not excited them to do or ſay any thing; and further ſaid, they were not excited or charged to ſay any thing but what the Law was; and touching the Concealment of the Treaſon, he had made ſuch aſſurance as he could not diſcover. And ſaid further, that the Traitors were about the King, and had ſuch Power over Him before, that he had not ſo great Intereſt in the King, as to prevent thoſe Miſchiefs that now came upon him. [3.] The Commons Reply'd, He had upon the Matter confeſs'd himſelf Guilty, and prayed he might be Attainted. Upon this Anſwer of the Biſhop, the Replication of the Commons, and all Circumſtances of the Accuſation, the Lords took time to give ſuch Judgment, as might be for the Honour of God, and Profit of the King, and Kingdom.

[2.] His Defence.

[3.] The Commons Reply to it. The Lords take time to give Judgment.

In [4.] the mean while, on the Twelfth of March following, Simon Burley, John Beauchamp of Holt, John Salisbury, and James Barners Knights, being brought into Parliament, they were at the Inſtance of the Commons Impeached.

[4.] Ib. Sir Simon Burley and other Knights Impeached.

The [5.] Articles Exhibited againſt them were Sixteen; the Firſt Article in the Appeal, was the Firſt Article in the former Impeachment. In the Second Article they were accuſed as Traytors, and Enemies of the Kingdom, for that they knew of all the Treaſons in the Appeal mentioned, and that they were aiding, aſſiſting, counſelling, and aſſenting to all the Traytors Attainted; and that Simon Burley, and John Beauchamp were Principal Actors in all the ſaid Treaſons. In the Eighth Article they were accuſed for Conſpiring and Deſigning with the Five Perſons Appealed, to deſtroy and put to death thoſe who were aſſenting to the making of the ſaid Commiſſion and Statute in the laſt Parliament; the reſt are of leſs moment, but all relating to the Articles of the Appeal, to which they all Pleaded Not Guilty. The Commons Reply'd they were Guilty, and the Lords took time to Examine and Conſider the Impeachment. Upon this, and the Biſhop of Chicheſter's Impeachment, the Lords Temporal adjourned until Friday the Twentieth of March, on which day, the whole Parliament was adjourned until the Monday next after, or on the Morrow of the Quindene of Eaſter, or Thirteenth of April; on which Monday, the Lords Temporal took further time to deliberate upon theſe Matters until the Fifth of May. When [6.] Sir Simon Burley being brought into the Parliament, was by the Lords, after due and ſufficient Examination, and Information, found Guilty of Treaſon. And one of the Articles for which he was Condemned (beſides thoſe above-mention'd) is very Remarkable, and I ſhall here ſet it down, Tranſlated into Engliſh, from the Record.

[5.] Ib. The Articles of their Impeachment.

[6.] The Parliament is Adjourned, and the Lords take time to deliberate. He is Condemn'd to be hang'd, but is Pardon'd by the King's Grace.

Anno Dom. 1388.

Ib. N. 7. A Remarkable Article againſt Sir Simon Burley.

Item, The ſaid Simon Burley being Chamberlain to our Lord the King in His tender Age, and being obliged to Counſel Him for the beſt, to the Advantage of Him, and His Realm, he the ſaid Simon by his Wicked Contrivance and Procurement, Adviſed the King to entertain in His Houſhold great Numbers of Aliens, Bohemians, and others, and to give them large Gifts out of the Revenues and Profits of the Realm, whereby our Lord the King is greatly Impoveriſhed, and the People otherwiſe Oppreſſed. For which, as well as upon ſome of the other Articles, the Lords, with the aſſent of the King awarded, and then by aſſent of the King it was awarded, That he ſhould be Drawn and Hanged, and his Head cut off, and all his Lands and Tenements, Goods and Chattels to be Forfeited to the King. But His Majeſty Remitted his Drawing, Hanging, and Quartering, becauſe he was a Knight of the Order of the Garter, ſo his Head was only ſever'd from his Body the ſame day upon Tower-Hill. Yet the King did moſt of all regret the death of this Gentleman, as having been bred up with the Prince His Father, and being a great Favourite to the Son, had been Employ'd in divers Ambaſſies abroad. He was certainly a Man of great Perſonal Courage, but is Characterized by our Hiſtorians to have been very Inſolent and Luxurious; and from a ſmall beginning, to have raiſed a vaſt Eſtate, by the Bounty of his Maſter.

On March the Twelfth, John Beauchamp, John Saliſbury, and James Barners Knights, were brought into Parliament, and had the ſame Judgment. Beauchamp and Barners had their Drawing and Hanging Pardoned, but had their Heads ſtruck off on Tower-Hill, on the ſame Twelfth of March.

[1.] Ib. The Biſhop of Chicheſter has Judgment to loſe his Lands and Goods.

On [1.] the ſame day likewiſe was the Biſhop of Chicheſter ſent for into Parliament, where the Lords Temporal found him Guilty of Treaſon, as it was laid in the Impeachment, and by aſſent of the King, they awarded his Heirs ſhould be Diſherited, his Lands, Tenements, Goods and Chattels Forfeited to the King, and the Temporalities of his Biſhoprick ſeized into the King's hands; but as to his Perſon, the Lords would adviſe what to do, for the Honour of God, and Holy Church, and the Safety of the State of Prelacy, and of the Laws of the Land.

[2.] He, with the late Judges, are Order'd to be kept Priſoners in Ireland, and to be allowed ſufficient maintenance.

Then the Commons humbly Pray the King, for the Nouriſhing of greater Love, Peace and Quiet for the future in all parts of the Nation, that He would pleaſe to renew His Coronation-Oath, and that the Prelates might renew their Fealty, and the Lords Temporal their Homage, notwithſtanding they had done it before; which was alſo aſſented to.

Rot. Parl 11. Rich. 2. N. 48. Vid. Dr. B's. Append. N. 107 The New Oath that was now taken by the Biſhops, Lords, and Commons

You ſhall Swear that you will not Aſſent, nor Suffer, as much as in you lies, that any Judgment, Statute or Ordinance made in this preſent Parliament, ſhall in any manner be Annulled, Reverſed, or Appealed, in any time to come; and further, that you will ſupport the good Laws and Uſages of the Kingdom, and to your Power firmly keep and cauſe to be kept the good Peace, Quiet, and Tranquility of the Kingdom, without diſturbing it in any manner. So God you help, and the Holy Saints.

All Perſons Excommunicated, that ſhould act contrary to this Oath.

And the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and Prelates Excommunicated all ſuch as ſhould break the Peace and Quiet of the Realm, and do contrary to this Oath. On the next day, being Thurſday the Fourth of June, this Parliament ended; which, ſays Knyghton, was called the Unmerciful Parliament; and indeed it did juſtly enough deſerve that Title, ſince by their own Rigid and Severe Proceedings againſt the Favourites, they ſo far alienated the King's affections from his Uncle the Duke of Glouceſter, and the reſt of the Lords of that Party, that He never forgave them ſo long as He lived. And this Reſentment continued ſo deeply imprinted in his Mind, that you will find hereafter, in the Twentieth Year of His Reign, He not only got another Parliament, which made void and reverſed whatſoever had been done in this, but having firſt procured his Uncle the Duke of Glouceſter to be Murther'd, He got him therein to be Attainted, together with the Earls of Arundel and Warwick, who had been the great Enemies of His Favourite the Duke of Ireland, and the reſt of the Noblemen of that Party, as hath been already related at large.

This Oath is impos'd upon Gentlemen, and Inferior Officers.

I have no more to obſerve concerning this Parliament, but that this Oath was alſo impos'd upon all Gentlemen, and Dignified Perſons of the Clergy in all Counties in England; and upon all the Mayors, Bailiffs, and Aldermen of Cities, Burghs, and Towns, by the King's Writ, directed to the Sheriff, and one Special Commiſſioner to Adminiſter it. This bears Date June the Fourteenth, in the Eleventh Year of this King.

like in the Eaſt Marches. But ſince [1.] Froiſart has a more particular account of this laſt Action, than any of our own Hiſtorians, I ſhall from him give you the Sum of it. He ſays, That the Noblemen of Scotland taking advantage of the late Diviſions in England, Reſolved in a Council held at Aberdeen, to Invade that Kingdom in two Bodies; of which, the one being the Vantguard, was to be Commanded by the Earls of Douglas, Dunbar, and Murrey, and conſiſted of Two Thouſand Choſen Foot, and Three Hundred Lances on Horſeback. Theſe entring England privately, paſſed the River Tine above New-Caſtle, yet committed no Hoſtilities 'till they entred the Biſhoprick of Durham, and then they fell to burning and ſpoiling the Country in a moſt outrageous manner, almoſt to the Gates of that City; after which, they return'd back by New-caſtle, and Encamped before it. There were then in the Town the Lord Henry, Eldeſt Son to the Earl of Northumberland (called from his ſuddain and bold Undertakings Hot-ſpur) and Ralph Piercy his Brother, with many other Knights, and Gentlemen of the North, whoſe Names it is needleſs to relate; and tho' the Scots could not take the Town, yet they Block'd up one ſide of it; then the Engliſh under the Command of the Lord Piercy, Sallied out, and Combated with the Scots before the Barriers, and in this Action the Earl Douglaſs encountring the Lord Piercy hand to hand, had ſo far the better, as that he carried off his Lance, with the Pennon or Flag to it; at which, that Lord was ſo enrag'd, that he vow'd to recover it, before they ſhould carry it into Scotland. But when the Scotiſh Commanders ſaw there was no more to be done there, they roſe from before the Town, and Marched homeward, and in their way took and burnt the Town and Caſtle of Penclaw, and from thence went and beſieged the ſtrong Caſtle of [2.] Otterborn, which being ſeated in a Marſh, could not be taken by Storm; wherefore the Scots ſat down before it, and laid cloſe Siege to it.

[1.] Vol. III. C. 123, 124.

The Scots invade England.

[2.] This Author calls it Ottebourg, but falſly.

The [3] Lord Piercy having Intelligence of this, reſolv'd to march thither, not only to recover his Pennon, but to raiſe the Siege. And tho' the Biſhop of Durham was daily expected with the Militia of that County, yet he would not wait for his coming, but reſolv'd to March againſt the Scots with Eight Thouſand Foot, and Six Hundred Lances on Horſeback, and with them he arrived that Evening before their Camp, and fell in upon their Out-Guards with great fury, crying out a Piercy, a Piercy; but the Scots were very well prepar'd to receive them; and whilſt the Camp Servants and ordinary Soldiers receiv'd the firſt Charge, the Scotiſh Commanders, with the Nobility, and Gentry arming themſelves, marched out in the head of their Followers; and tho' the Engliſh were two to one, yet the Scots acquitted themſelves ſo Valiantly, that they not only repulſed, but quite routed the Engliſh Forces, and took above a Hundred Knights, and other Perſons of Quality Priſoners; the Chief of whom were the Lord Piercy, and his Brother. There were near Twelve Hundred Engliſh Slain upon the Place, the Scotiſh Writers ſay Eighteen Hundred, and they would have been more, had they not ſaved themſelves by Flight, and that the Enemy were too few in Number to perſue them. Yet the Scots had no great Cauſe to brag of the Victory neither, for beſides the loſs of a great many of their beſt Men, the Young and Valiant Earl Douglaſs, as he endeavour'd to pierce thro' the thickeſt of his Enemies, and preſſed on, bearing down all before him, was unfortunately Slain. Walſingham calls him the Earl of Murrey, but he is miſtaken. This Battle was Fought by Moon-light, and laſted 'till Day-break. The Scots upon this great and unexpected Succeſs, took the Caſtle they had Beſieged, and Marched home into their own Country with their Priſoners, who were not long after Ranſom'd. When the other part of the Scotiſh Army which had Invaded England by Carliſle, ~~and~~ heard of this great Victory, they thought they had done enough, and immediately alſo return'd. But it is very Remarkable, that the ſame Day the Lord Piercy Marched from New-caſtle, the Biſhop of Durham came thither with Ten Thouſand Men of that Country, and preſently Reſolv'd to March out to aſſiſt the Lord Piercy; but as they went he met with the remainder of that Army flying from the Battel. This put the Biſhop's Men into ſuch a Conſternation, that moſt of them ran away and left him. So Adviſing with Sir William Lucy, and other Commanders then with him, it was Reſolv'd they ſhould all return to New-caſtle; but had they Marched on and fell upon the Scots, now tired with the late Fight, they had certainly taken or kil'd moſt of them.

The Earl of Arundel goes out to Sea with a Fleet wch is seperated by a Storm.

But to [1.] look into France, where about the latter end of Autumn, the Earl of Arundel not only eſcaped a great danger, but obtain'd an unexpected Victory; for being again gone out to Sea, with a conſiderable Fleet, they were taken in ſo great a Storm, that his Ships were ſeparated, and he had no more left with him than Twenty Seven Sail, with which he was driven into a little Port called La Patice. This News being quickly brought to Rochel, but two Leagues off, they immediately gave the Mareſchal de Sancerre, then Commander in Chief for the King of France, Notice of it. He preſently Order'd the Rochellers to ſet out Six or Eight Gallies, and himſelf Raiſing the Siege of the Caſtle of Bouteville, Marched with all the Forces he could Raiſe, intending to burn the Engliſh Ships in the Harbour. But the Earl of Arundel having Intelligence of it, Sail'd with his Fleet, and meeting the Gallies from Rochel before the Harbour utterly Routed, and put them to Flight, and had perſued them had he not feared greater a Force to lie behind; ſo being well ſatisfied with his Succeſs, he immediately Sail'd away back to Bourdeaux, and there laid up his Fleet, and left the Mareſchal de Sancerre very much diſpleas'd with the Rockellers, for not giving him more ſpeedy notice of the Arrival of the Engliſh at La Patice; that he might have come up on them before they had gone out from thence.

The Earl of Arundel likewiſe was removed from being Admiral, tho' he had been entruſted by the Parliament; and this Charge was given to the Earl of Huntington, who now came into great Favour. About St. James-Tide, Henry Earl of Derby, Eldeſt Son to the Duke of Lancaſter, with a ſelect Company of a Thouſand Knights and Eſquires, and their Servants, went into Pruſſia, where they ſignaliz'd themſelves by ſeveral Brave and Valiant Actions againſt the Infidels, and return'd home with Honour in April following. But ſince Froiſſart, and Polydor Vargil have laid the Scene of this Action not in the North but Southern Parts of the World, I ſhall from theſe Authors give you ſome Account of this Action, which the [5.] former of them relates to have been undertaken principally by the Genoeſes, againſt the Mores, or Saracens in Barbary, in revenge of the Piracies and Incurſions they had made upon the Coaſt of Italy. In this Expedition the Italians were Aſſiſted by a great number of French and Engliſh Auxiliaries, the former under the Command of the Duke of Bourbon, the [6] latter under that of Henry Earl of Derby, Son to the Duke of Lancaſter, whom tho' Froiſſart here calls his Baſtard, yet he was certainly miſtaken, for that Duke had no baſe Son of that Name, but Henry of Beaufort, afterwards Biſhop of Wincheſter, who was bred up a Clergy-Man; but indeed no Prince of the Blood Royal was there at all; only this is certain, that the Genoeſe Fleet with the Confederate Forces Landed near Tunis, to the Number of about Thirty Thouſand, (which Place [7.] Froiſſart thro' Ignorance, or forgetfulneſs, only calls the City of Affrique) to this they laid cloſe Siege both by Sea and Land, for about Sixty Days; but the Town being well provided with Men, and all other things neceſſary for a Siege, proved too ſtrong to be taken; for after ſome Aſſaults upon it, in which the Confederates loſt a great many brave Men, and ſome of prime Quality, they found it to be all in vain, and that alſo many more periſhed by the extreme heat of the Countrey, and want of freſh Proviſions; ſo fearing leaſt the Genoeſes ſhould make a ſeparate Peace with the Mores, the Commanders

But to return Home, whilſt the Earl of Derby was thus engaged Abroad, againſt the Infidels in earneſt, King Richard employ'd Himſelf at Home in Combates in jeſt; which ſince it may give the Reader an Idea of the Romantick Humour of this Age, I ſhall from the [2.] Author laſt mention'd, give you a ſhort Account of this great Tourneament, or Juſtes (as they were then call'd) which King Richard caus'd to be Solemnly Proclaim'd in all the Courts of Chriſtendom, by certain Heralds ſent for that Purpoſe, to be held at London the Sunday after Michaelmaſs. Upon which Notice, a great many Noblemen and Gentlemen from France, Germany, and the Low-Countries prepared themſelves to come to it; and in Particular William Earl of Oſtrenant, Eldeſt Son to Albert Earl of Heynalt, Holland and Zealand, came over hither for that Purpoſe (tho' againſt the Mind of his Father) and Valeran Earl of St. Paul, King Richard's Brother-in-Law, with divers other French Lords came alſo over to this Solemnity, which began on Sunday in the Afternoon from the Tower, with a Noble Cavalcade of Sixty Ladies Richly dreſſed, who Riding upon Fine Palfreys, led every one her Knight by her ſide (all Armed) by a Chain of Silver, their Courſers being carried before by as many Eſquires of Honour, and thus they paſſed thro' Cheapſide to Smithfield, where the Juſtes were to be held. Then the Knights Mounting upon their Courſers, began the Tourneament, by running one at another with their Lances, Thirty on each ſide; after which, the King and Queen (who ſaw this Combat from Scaffolds made on purpoſe) went to the Biſhop of London's Palace, where they lay ſo long as it laſted. The next Day, the King Richly Armed, Juſted Himſelf, the Queen and her Ladies looking on; and thus theſe Juſtes continued for four Days, from Noon till Night, which was ſpent in great Entertainments, with Muſick, and Dancing, by the Queen the Ladies, and the young Nobility. On Saturday the King, with the Earls of Oſtrenant and St. Paul went to Windſor, where the former was made a Knight of the Garter; then the Feaſt being over, they all return'd home. But the King of France was ſo much diſpleas'd with the Earl of Oſtrenant for taking the King of England's Order, that he immediately Summon'd him to come to Paris to do his Homage for that Earldom, thereby to aſſure that King of his Fidelity; which the Earl not being able to refuſe, was forced to ſubmit to, ſo Sacred a thing was the Oath of that Order then eſteemed. I have nothing more to add concerning this Tourneament, but only I find in a [3.] Manuſcript Chronicle, that it was at this Solemnity that King Richard the firſt gave that Famous Badge to all his Dependants, of a Hart, with a Gold Crown and Chain hanging from his Neck.

Then the [1.] Dukes of York and Glouceſter deſired the King's Bounty of a Thouſand Pounds a Year in Lands to each of them, according to His Promiſe, to be granted in Tail ſpecial; He thereupon order'd His Juſtices to draw ſuch an Aſſurance, and Commanded that his Uncles ſhould be duly paid their Penſions in the mean while.

I [5.] find nothing elſe to have happen'd at Home worth our Noting, ſave that during the laſt Chriſtmaſs Holy-days, John de Haſtings was unfortunately killed in a Tourneament at Woodſtock, being run into the Belly by Sir John de Saint John, in the Eighteenth Year of his Age, to the great grief of the King and whole Court, being a Nobleman of promiſing hopes, and of an excellent diſpoſition: He was the laſt Earl of Pembroke of the Name of Haſtings.

[6.] Ad hunc An. The French deſire a Peace and Enterview between the two Kings.

The K. takes up Horſes and other things of the Abbies in order thereunto, yet does not go.

As to Foreign Affairs, the French now finding that they could do no good againſt England, ſeem'd more inclinable to Peace than ever; and to this end (as [6.] Walſingham relates) the Great Chamberlain of France was ſent over by that King, and his Great Men, with a Complement; and they ſo earneſtly deſired a Treaty of Peace might be ſpeedily had, that in order thereunto, They Prayed that a Friendly Enterview might be between both Kings near Calais, to which King Richard ſeemed very inclinable; and to appear the more Splendid on ſuch an Occaſion, He ſent to moſt of the Great Abbies to Furniſh Him with the beſt Horſes they had; amongſt whom, the Abbot of St. Albans ſent him one, which our Author ſays was worth Four and twenty Marks, (no ſmall Price in thoſe Days) and yet not content with this, he demanded Fifty Marks more. He had Money likewiſe from moſt of the Cities and Boroughs of England, and ſo He got divers Conſiderable Sums, the better to Equip Himſelf for this Voyage. But after all, theſe mighty Preparations came to nothing, for this Enterview did not take effect 'till ſome Years after.

To [1.] ſay ſomewhat of Eccleſiaſtical Affairs; there was this Year a Proclamation iſſued out by Order of the King and Council, requiring all ~~thoſe~~ that had any Benefices ~~in England~~, and were then beyond at ~~the Seas, or~~ in the Roman Court (it being a thing too frequent in thoſe Days, for the Pope to gratifie his Favourites and Followers with the beſt Preferments in England, tho' perhaps they were never here in their Lives,) immediately to repair ~~hither~~ home, ~~and to~~ live ~~upon their Benefices, and~~ not to ~~carry away the Treaſure out~~ of the Realm, ~~by expending their Revenues in other Nations,~~ on pain of Forfeiting all ~~their ſaid Benefices~~. This, together with the late Statutes of Proviſors and Præmunire, would have Cured theſe Miſchiefs, if the Clergy would have proved Faithful to their own Intereſt, and that of the Kingdom.

[1.] Id. ib. A Proclamation iſſued out, requiring all that had Benefices in England, and were beyond-ſea, to come over and reſide upon them.

But to ſay ſomething of Foreign Affairs, this Overture of a Peace being like to be finiſhed, [2.] he, with the French King (who at that time joined with the Antipope Benedict the Thirteenth) much diſturbed Boniface the Ninth, now Elected Pope in the room of Urban, that Deceaſed the laſt Year at Rome; wherefore the ſaid [3.] Boniface (whom the Engliſh owned as only true Pope) forthwith ſent a Nuncio to King Richard with great Complements in commendation of his Devotion, and that of his Predeceſſors towards Holy Church; but withal complaining of thoſe late Invaſions (as he was pleaſed to call them) of the Eccleſiaſtical Liberty, and urging Him both to Repeal the ſaid Laws, and by no means to make Peace with the French King, unleſs He would diſown and no longer Aſſiſt the Antipope.

[3] Pope Boniface ſends a Nuncio to the King, with the effect of his Meſſage.

The [4.] King receiv'd the Nuncio very kindly, and heard his Meſſage, but for Anſwer put him off to the next Meeting of the Parliament, which was to be in November following, and then the Buſineſs was Debated. But tho' the King, and Duke of Lancaſter ſeemed willing to gratifie the Pope, yet the Commons would by no means conſent that any ſhould go to Rome to acquire Benefices in England, only that they might not ſeem too much to ſlight his Holineſs, they yielded that it might be connived at, but not without the King's Licenſe, and that no longer than 'till the next Parliament. However, tho' they held their Pope to hard meat, they were not wanting in expreſſing their Kindneſs to the King, giving Him a half Tenth, and a half Fifteenth, which they offer'd to make whole ones, on Condition He would next Summer make an Expedition againſt the Scots.

[4.] Id ib. The King's Anſwer to the Nuncio.

About Candlemaſs this Year King Richard ſent the Lord Thomas Piercy, the Lord Clifford, and a French Knight, called Sir Robert Briquet, Ambaſſadors into France, who were very Nobly Received, and highly Treated by that King, and his whole Court. Their Buſineſs was, That King Charles would be pleas'd to name a Time and Place for the Dukes of Lancaſter and York, and other Great Men, to come into France, to Treat of a Final Peace between the two Crowns. Upon which, the King Appointed the City of Amiens to be the Place, and the middle of the enſuing March the time, that He, together with his Great Men of the Kingdom would Meet and Treat with the Engliſh Commiſſioners concerning the Concluſion of a Peace. Then [1.] the Dukes of Lancaſter and York went over to Calais, with a Magnificent Retinue, and from thence went to Amiens at the time appointed for the Treaty, where they met the King of France, and his Brother the Duke of Touraine, and his Uncles, the Dukes of Burgundy, and Berry, with moſt of the Chief Peers, and Nobility, by ſome of whom, the Engliſh Princes were Conducted to the King's Preſence; and being by him kindly Received, they fell the next day into a ſerious-Treaty about a Laſting Peace, which was chiefly Managed by the Dukes of Burgundy, and Lancaſter. The former at firſt Demanded that Calais ſhould be ſlighted and given up by the Engliſh, being firſt Demoliſhed, and the Works Razed to the Ground; and for this, the French offer'd that the King of England ſhould enjoy all He held in Aquitain, with Nine Cities more, and their Territories, free from any Reſort or Homage to France; but this was utterly refuſed by the Engliſh, who inſiſted to have all the Territories that had been taken away ſince the Treaty of Bretagny, fully Reſtor'd. So that nothing could be then Agreed on, but a Prorogation of the preſent Truce for One Year longer ×; and ſo the Aſſembly broke up, and the Dukes took their leaves of each other, and returned into England; where when they were Arrived, the King upon the Report of their Proceedings, held a Great Council with His Nobility, to conſider whether it were beſt to make Peace or not on the Conditions offer'd by the French? his Motion was not much regarded, for the time was ſtill ſpun out in further Truces, tho' nothing could be concluded as to an Abſolute and Final Peace.

This Summer affording nothing of Moment, I ſhall here Relate ſome Tranſactions, tho' not of ſo Publick a Concern. [1.] About the latter end of June, the Citizens of London fell into the King's heavy diſpleaſure, the Cauſes whereof are ſaid to be two. The Firſt, and Principal one was, for denying to Lend the King a Thouſand Pounds, which He deſired; and for abuſing a certain Lombard, who was willing to Accommodate Him with it, and (as ſome Authors ſay) the ordinary ſort of People beat and half kill'd him for his forwardneſs: But the main Occaſion was an Accident which happen'd juſt on the neck of the former, and was made a far greater Offence, than otherwiſe it need to have been; it was thus.

[1.] Id. ib. The City of London falls under the K's heavy diſpleaſure, and why.

A [2.] Baker carrying his Bread along the Streets, one of the Biſhop of London's Servants took a Loaf out of his Basket, which the Baker demanded to be reſtor'd; but the Biſhop's Man inſtead thereof, broke his Head; for which Injury the People would have ſeized him, but he fled into his Lord's Houſe. Upon this, the Conſtable went to the Houſe, and peaceably deſired that he might be ſurrender'd up to Juſtice, but the Biſhop's Servants ſhut the Gates, and made Reſiſtance. This did more and more exaſperate the Common People, inſomuch, that many threatned to make their way by Fire, and began to uſe Violence. Of which, the Mayor and Chief Officers having notice, they immediately repair'd thither, and by their Preſence and Authority ſuppreſſed the Tumult, and preſerv'd the King's Peace, ſo that the harm was but ſmall, and all this Commotion might eaſily have been paſſed over, and forgot, had not the Biſhop (whoſe ill-govern'd Servant was the beginning and cauſe of all the Broil) kindled the Fire afreſh; and 'tis ſaid, he the rather ſtirred in it, out of an old Grudge which he had againſt the Citizens becauſe they were generally looked upon to be Favourers of Wickliff's Doctrines.

[2] Caxton's Chronicle. A Quarrel between a Baker, and one of the Biſhop of London's Servants, which produces a Tumult of the Mobb.

But [3.] whatever the Motive was, a loud Complaint was made by him, and other Prelates to the King, affirming, that if upon every paultry Pretence, the Citizens ſhould be ſuffer'd thus to affront the Biſhops, without Chaſtiſement, they would endanger not only the Dignity, but the Liberty of the whole Church. The King was ſo incens'd hereat (being alſo prepar'd by former Provocations) that He was once Reſolv'd to have rais'd an Army, and Plunder'd the City, and given them the Spoil thereof. But being perſwaded by more moderate Councils, [4.] He only ſent for the Mayor, the two Sheriffs, four and twenty Aldermen, and four and twenty others of the Ableſt Citizens, to His ~~Court~~ then held at Nottingham, where the ſaid Tumult, and divers other Offences were laid ſo home to their Charge, as if they had Forfeited all their Obligations formerly given to the King. At firſt they Reſolved to Juſtifie their Innocency, and faithfully engaged to ſtand by one another, but it ſeems there was Falſhood in that Confederacy; and as it often happens in ſuch Caſes, ſome timerous Perſons hoping to curry Favour, Impeached the reſt, who again recriminated upon them, and ſo all being alike liable to be undone, they thereupon ſubmitted themſelves wholy to the King's Mercy,

Duke of Bretagne; for as he Rode one very hot and ſultry Day Armed from head to foot, his Page that carried his Lance following him, and he happening to fall aſleep, let fall the Lance upon the King's Helmet, which not only awakened, but put him into ſuch a Fury, that quite bereft him of his Senſes; inſomuch that he fell violently upon thoſe that were about him, and if he had not been prevented by being laid hold on, he had certainly kill'd them. ~~This Year~~, on the Octaves of St. Hillary, a Parliament was held at Wincheſter, [1.] in which, there was Granted to the King a Tenth by the Clergy, and a Fifteenth by the Lords and Commons for the Expences of the Dukes of Lancaſter, and Glouceſter, who were then going over into France to Treat about a Peace. As for other Foreign Affairs, [4.] the King of France had this Year a ſtrange Preſervation, tho' it caſt him again into his former Diſtemper; for as He, with four or five of His Courtiers were Dancing at a Ball, diſguiſed like Savages, and being dreſſed in Habits of died Linen, to which was faſten'd ſome Hair, or Flax, with Pitch, and Roſin, their Cloaths (by means of a Torch that fell down amongſt them) ſuddenly took fire; but whether this was done by Chance, or by the Malice of the Duke his Brother, who aſpired to the Kingdom, is uncertain, but this Accident produced very diſmal effects: And tho' the King, by the Courage of a certain Lady, was ſnatched out of the Flames, which were like to have ſeized him, yet did not his Fellow Maſquers eſcape ſo well, for before their Habits could be got off, they were miſerably burnt, and ſome ſtifled to death. Nay, this Accident had that ſad effect upon the King himſelf, that the Fright he now receiv'd, made him preſently fall into his former Frenſy, which never quite left him ſo long as He lived, and that was many Years after. But England was ſo far from taking any Advantage by this Diſorder, that a freſh Truce was this Summer Concluded with the French, and Scots, both by Sea and Land, to continue from the end of the former Truce, for Twenty four Years and an half next enſuing.

and the Earl was by the King and Lords Order'd to ask the Duke's Pardon in full Parliament, which was done accordingly.

[1.] *Ib.N.*16. The [1.] King, Lords, Knights of Honour, and Juſtices in this Parliament, Aſſented to a Peace, with France, ſo as the King did not make Liege-Homage to the French King; and ſaving alſo at all times the Liberty of his Perſon, and the Crown of England, and of his Lieges of the ſame Kingdom; and that He, and his Heirs might reſort and have recourſe to the Name, Title, and Right of the Crown and Kingdom of France, if the Peace ſhould be broken by his Adverſary and his Heirs; and alſo that ſuch Moderations and Modifications ſhould be made, that no further Confiſcation (that is, ſeizure of the Dutchy of Guyenne) might happen. ~~Yet [2.] Knyghton ſays this was only a Truce for four Years, and four Months, as well by Sea, as Land.~~

[2.] Col. 2741.

[3.] *Ib. N.*17. Then [3.] the King Charged the Commons to give their Advice in this Matter. They in a Schedule given to Him by the hands of Mr. John Buſſy their Speaker, anſwered, that the Articles of Peace between the King and his Adverſary of France were read, and in part underſtood by them, but they, conſidering that the Points therein contain'd, were too high for them to meddle with, and upon which they durſt not Treat, or give any Advice; to wit, the Homage-Liege, Sovereignty and Reſſort to the Crown of France, were willing to give their conſent (for the benefits of Peace) to whatſoever the Lords, Knights of Honour, and the Juſtices had conſented to before; ſo as the Homage ſhould be done for, and have relation to the Dutchy of Guyenne only, and in no wiſe to the Crown and Kingdom of England. What the Articles of this Peace were, doth not appear upon the Parliament-Roll.

[4.] Ad hunc An. [4.] Walſingham is more particular in the Tranſactions of this Parliament, and gives us an account of the ground of that Quarrel above-mention'd, between the Duke of Lancaſter, and Earl of Arundel, viz. That the Earl laid to the Duke's Charge, that about the Feaſt of the Exaltation of the Croſs, or middle of September, he had lain ſtill with his Forces at his Mannor of Holt in Cheſhire, whilſt that Country was up in Arms againſt him, under the leading of Nicholas Cliſton, and his Accomplices, without the Earls Acting any thing againſt them which (as his Accuſer alledged) was in their Favour; this the Earl expreſly deny'd, and ſo well defended himſelf, that he came off without any further queſtion.

[5.] Id ib. The Commons grant the K. an Aid for his Voyage into Ireland, In [5.] this Parliament alſo, the King deſigning to go over into Ireland demanded an Aid, and the Commons granted Him for three Years a Subſidy upon Wooll, Wool-fels, &c. and Three Shillings upon every Tun of Wine, and Twelve pence upon every pound of Merchandiſe, as in the eleventh Year; ſo as the ſame ſhould only be employed for the defence of the Realm. &c. And the Clergy alſo granted the King a full Tenth, if he went over thither, but if He did not, then He was to receive but half a one.

[6.] Vol. IV, Cap. 51. Note, The Year is there miſtaken by this Author, I ſhall [6.] here intermix ſome Foreign Affairs of Moment; In the beginning of May, Froiſſart informs us of what our own Hiſtorians are ſilent, that the Treaty concerning a Final Peace between the King of England and France was again renewed,* and the Dukes of Lancaſter, and Glouceſter, together with the Archbiſhop of York, and Biſhop of London, were ſent over for that purpoſe; and that they were met by the Dukes of Berry, and Burgundy, and other French Commiſſioners, at a ye ~~certain~~ Village ~~called~~ of Lenlingham, between Calais, and Boloigne. This Treaty held many days, the French making the ſame Demands, and much the ſame Offers to the Engliſh as they had done at the laſt Treaty at Amiens, and the Anſwers of the Engliſh were much to the ſame purpoſe with the former; ſo that by Reaſon thereof, nothing could be concluded as to a laſting Peace, only it was agreed, × that the Truce ſhould be again prolonged until the Feaſt of St. Michael, in the Year 1398, beſides which, there were certain Additional Articles agreed on between them, for including the Scots and other Confederates on both ſides, as alſo to prevent the Surpriſing of Towns and Caſtles on either part, by treachery; and further, that the ſtrong Town and Caſtle of Cherbourg ſhould be reſtored to the King of Navarre, upon the French Kings paying to the Engliſh, the Sum of Sixty thouſand Nobles, for which it had been mortgaged to him; and alſo the Caſtle of Breſt was to be reſtored to the Duke of Bretagne. This truce being concluded in Treaties (~~of~~ which ~~kind~~ Froiſſart well obſerves the French have always had the Advantage) the Engliſh Plenipotentiares return'd home, and gave the King a Relation of what they had done, who, being very fond of a Peace with France, was well ſatisfied with it.

[illegible] this Author is right enough as to the time of this truce, yet he is mistaken in some circumstances of it which may be rectified by our Records for in the first place this treaty [illegible] a final peace [illegible] for who [illegible] but not by all ye the persons by him named, they being one by the two Dukes above mentioned as appears by this Record without any [illegible] the King of Navarre was [illegible]

Froiſſart further relates, that the Engliſh then inſiſted that the French King ſhould renounce Clement the Anti-pope of Avignon, but the French Commiſſioners would by no means agree to that, and reſolve ſtill to continue under his obedience; and tho' this Pope died in September following, yet that did not heal the Schiſme in the Romiſh Church; for the Cardinals of that Faction agreed to chuſe Cardinal Peter, or the Cardinal de Luna, who was lately Legate in France, to be Pope in his ſtead, by the Title of Benedict the 13*th.* in oppoſition to Urban, who had been not long ſince elected at Rome by the Cardinals of the oppoſite Party; and thus the Schiſme between the two Sees of Rome and Avignon was ſtill kept on foot.

But [2.] what is moſt Remarkable, was the Deceaſe of Queen Anne, who, to the King's great grief, died this Year at His Mannor of Sheen: Her Death was ſo deep an affliction to him, that he not only ever after hated the Place, but alſo defaced it, by pulling down the Pinacles, and demoliſhing the Apartment where ſhe died. She had the Character of a Beautiful, Charitable and good humour'd Lady, but too much given to her Pleaſures; of which ſhe is ſaid to have Repented on her death-Bed.

and indeed it was time to ſend them away, for ſuch multitudes were now come hither in hopes of Preferments, that they had left the Engliſh Pale in Ireland almoſt quite deſolate and unguarded; at which the natural wild Iriſh, not yet throughly ſubdued, taking Advantage, deſtroyed or pillaged at their pleaſure the few remaining Subjects the King had there. And whereas King Edward the Third when He had ſettled His Courts of Juſtice in that Country, received from thence to his Exchequer above Thirty Thouſand Pounds per Annum; This Kingdom, by reaſon of the want of Inhabitants, was not only loſt, but on the contrary, the King forced to be out of Pocket Thirty Thouſand Marks every Year, in the neceſſary defence of his Territories; which miſchiefs effectually to Redreſs, [1.] He about the beginning of September, ſet Sail for Ireland, attended by the Duke of Glouceſter, the Earls of Marche, Nottingham, and Rutland, with a powerful Army of about Thirty Thouſand Men. Upon his Landing at Dublin, the Iriſh unable to Cope with ſo great a Force, endeavour'd for a while to weary him out with Alarms, Ambuſcades, and Skirmiſhes; but at laſt four of their Chief Princes or Kings were glad to ſubmit to King Richard, ſome of whom He kept as Hoſtages for Security, others He diſmiſſed upon Parole. The [1.] King was greatly Allarm'd with this News, and having appointed the Earl of Marche his Lieutenant of Ireland, made what haſt He could over into England, where He ſafely arriv'd in the beginning of May; and ſo ſoon as He came over, fell ſeverely upon ſome of the Nobility and Gentry, who were the Chief Favourers of theſe Lollards, making Sir Richard Story openly abjure their Opinions, and roundly told him, That if ever He ſound He relapſed again into them, he ſhould ſuffer Death, without Mercy.

But it ſeems the Lollards were not at this time the only Depreſſers of the Clergy, but my [2.] Author alſo highly complains againſt ſome of the Heads of their own Body, for William Archbiſhop of Canterbury had now procured a Bull from the Pope, Impowering him to Levy throughout all the Dioceſſes of his Province, Four Pence in the Pound of all Eccleſiaſtical Goods and Revenues, as well of thoſe Exempt, as not Exempt, and this without ſo much as pretending any good or Lawful Cauſe for the ſame. However, the Execution of this Bull being committed unto the Archbiſhop of York, and the Biſhop of London, tho' many of the inferior Clergy grumbled at it, and complain'd thereof as an unreaſonable Burthen, yet they were forc'd to ſubmit, and pay their Money. ^

[2.] Idib. The great oppreſſion of the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, upon the Clergy.

^ I cannot here omit taking notice that during kings absence in Ireland the Duke of york his Leivetenant had courage enough to issue a writ in the kings name ~~[illegible]~~ [illegible] to the sherif of Devonshire and [illegible] the Mayor and Bailifs of the City of Excester setting forth divers statutes that had been made in the times of the kings progenitors for the free election of Archbps. and Bps. and other elective dignities and benefices and that upon the supplication of the Deane and Chapter of Excester that the see being vacant by the decease of Thom. the late Bp. the King would grant licence to chuse a new Bishop. I cannot here paſs over a Matter, which tho' of no Publick Concern, yet it will give us an Account of the uncertain Fate of ſo great a Prodigy of Fortune. [3.] Robert de Vere, late Earl of Oxford, and Duke of Ireland, having eſcaped beyond Sea (as you have already heard) being Attainted by Act of Parliament, deceaſed about Three Years ſince at Lovain, in great Melancholy and Diſcontent, the King being either unable or unwilling to relieve him. But now, to make ſome amends to his Memory, He order'd his Body to be Embalm'd, and brought into [4.] England in a Coffin of Cypreſs, and carried to the Priory of Colne in Eſſex, where a Sumptuous Funeral was made for it; the King in Perſon, Attended by the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and the Counteſs Dowager of Oxford, Mother to the deceaſed, being the Chief Mourners; together with ſeveral Biſhops, and Religious Men, but by very few of the Nobility, for they had not yet digeſted their Reſentments againſt him. ^

In [1.] the ſame Council it was alſo Reſolv'd, that the Earl of Rutland, (Eldeſt Son to the Duke of York) Robert ~~the Archbiſhop of Dublin, the Biſhop of Ely, the Lords Clifford, Beaumont~~, and ~~Spenſer~~, ſhould be ſent Ambaſſadors into France, to Treat of a Marriage between the King, and the Lady Iſabel, Daughter to the King of France, ſhe being then but between Seven and Eight Years of Age. These Commiſſioners being Arriv'd there, were very well receiv'd; [2.] but the French King's Anſwer was, That He thank'd His Brother of England for His good will, yet beſides that the Lady was too young to Marry, there was an Agreement between Himſelf and the Duke of Bretaigne, that he ſhould Marry her; and therefore this Affair could not proceed further as yet, 'till the former Agreement was diſſolved; whereupon the Ambaſſadors return'd home, and gave the King an Account of it, who ſtill continued very fond of this Alliance with France; but before the end of this Year, the French King ſent into England as His Ambaſſador, a Norman Gentleman called Robert the Hermite, who pretended that he was order'd by a Viſion, and a Voice in his Voyage from the Holy-Land, that he ſhould warn the King's of England and France to make Peace. He being Arrived, the Treaty of Marriage was again renew'd, and the Ambaſſadors declar'd their Maſter's conſent to it; but theſe things could not be finally agreed on 'till the beginning of the next Year, by reaſon of the great difficulties and oppoſition that the Duke of Glouceſter made ~~in~~ to this Treaty; 'till at laſt the King inclining more to the Advice of His Uncles of Lancaſter and York, reſolv'd to conclude the Marriage with the Daughter of France, notwithſtanding all the oppoſition that was made to the contrary.

I muſt here inſert a Remarkable Tranſaction, which ſhould have been mention'd in the beginning of this Year, when indeed it happen'd, but that I would not break into the Relation of the late Truce. [3.] The Duke of Lancaſter being ſent for over from Gaſcoigne about Chriſtmaſs, immediately waited on the King, who kept that Feſtival at Eltham; where being receiv'd with more Honour than Affection, he gave the King his poſitive Reſolutions concerning that Province; that ſince the People were not willing to accept him for their Prince, and that it was not to be maintain'd againſt the French King, by his own Power and Revenues, he was therefore willing to comply with the Peoples Deſires, as well as His Majeſtie's Commands, and reſign his Title to the Dutchy of Aquitain into His Majeſty's Hands. But within a while, looking upon himſelf ſlighted at Court, he took his leave, and retir'd to the City of Lincoln, where he preſently after Married the Lady Catharine Swinford, Widow to Sir Robert Swinford, his old Miſtreſs, by whom he had already had ſeveral Children; tho' he had hitherto kept her under the Title of Governeſs to thoſe he had by his deceaſed Lady; but this Match very much diſcontented his Brother the Duke x so that he [illegible] considers these Articles will quickly see that the French notwithstanding their seeming unwillingness at first had sufficient reason to be satisfied [illegible] so much for their [illegible] and so [illegible] of England. For besides what has been already recited it was expressly provided by these Articles that the young Princess as soon as she came to an age capable should renounce all further pretences to any appennages or other successions that might fall to her within the kingdom of France and particularly any claim to that crown that might come to her or hers heirs of her body. And after the Truce [illegible] years to come it was as good a Renunciation of any [illegible] war any more for the [illegible] of the King's right to that crown.

Id ib. The King goes over to Calais, to Marry the French King's Daughter. and has an Enterview with the French King, between that and Ardres.

Nothing happened conſiderable all this Summer, after the concluſion of the Peace with France, the Kings time being almoſt wholy taken up in raiſing Money, and making great Preparations for his intended Mariage and Voyage into France: And then about the middle of October, all things being now ready, the King went down to Dover, and paſſed over to Calais with his Uncles, and a magnificent Retinue; and when He had repoſed Himſelf a few days, He went to meet the French King, who was come to Ardres for the like Purpoſe; between which Town, and Calais, a place was appointed for their Enterview, where two ſtately Pavilions were erected for their Reception. But firſt both Princes took an Oath, truly and Religiouſly to obſerve the ſtrict Laws of Amity during this Congreſs; and that neither by themſelves, nor any of their Subjects, Friends, Allies, nor any other, to their Privity, nor with their Allowance, there ſhould be continued or practiſed any Hoſtility, Surpriſe, Damage, or Diſturbance by either Party to the other. And for their further ſecurity, the Space between the two Royal Tents was Guarded on each ſide by eight hundred armed Knights, or Gentlemen, four hundred of each Nation, who being drawn up in two Lines, the Kings of England and France, having Met and Saluted each other, paſſed between them to King Richard's Pavilion, on the twenty ſeventh of October attended by the Princes of the Blood, on both ſides; four of the French Duke's being order'd to wait upon the King of England; and the Dukes of Lancaſter and Glouceſter, beſides three Earls, viz. of Derby, Rutland and Northampton, at the ſame time attending the French King.

The Enterview between the two Kings.

[2.] Id ib. A Chappel to be built on the Place of their meeting.

Then [2] after a mutual exchange of Complements between their Majeſties, it was alſo agreed, that a Chappel at both their Charges, ſhould be erected in the place of their Enterview, which ſhould be call'd the Chappel of our Lady of Peace; and on Saturday, the Feaſt of St. Simon and Jude, on another Treatie it was alſo further agreed and Solemnly Sworn to by both Kings, that the former Truce and Ceſſation of Armes for eight and twenty Years, ſhould be prolonged to thirty Years to come. But the Chief Bond of their Peace and Agreement was, that King Richard was now to Marry the French King's Daughter, and the former having Invited the latter to Dine with Him at his Pavilion, the day [3] following, being Monday, He was magnificently Treated and took the upper hand of the King: after Dinner the young Queen being brought thither was delivered to King Richard by the King her Father, and was then committed to the Care of the Dutcheſſes of Lancaſter and Glouceſter, who convey'd Her with a Noble Retinue to Calais; then after theſe two great Princes had taken their leaves of each other, with all the tokens of Reſpect and Amity, King Charles went back to Ardres, and King Richard to Calais, who from thence paſſed over [4.] into England with his young Bride in great State and Magnificence. And my Author further tells us, that beſides, the Preſents made by King Richard to the French King and his Nobles, amounted to the value of three hundred thouſand Marks, which was much more than all the Portion He received with Her.

[3.] The Marriage concluded between King Richard, and the Daughter of France, who is deliver'd to him.

But it ſeems the Duke of Glouceſter was not at all ſatisfied either with the Truce, or the Match, ſaying, That it had been more proper to recover by Arms what the King's Father and Grandfather had loſt in France, than to enter into new Alliances with that Crown, which had commonly better Succeſs in Treaties than Wars with England: And theſe private Diſcontents drew on His Ruin, which happen'd ſome time after.

About this time Breſt being deliver'd to the Duke of Bretagne, the King obſerving a mighty number of mean ſort of Fellows that had Crowded into Weſtminſter-Hall, at a great Feaſt, asked the Duke of Glouceſter who they were? he Reply'd, They are, Sir, the Soldiers, who by your Surrendring of Breſt, are ſent Home, and muſt now either Steal, or Starve; and ſo went on to Tax the King as guilty of a raſh and unadviſed Action. Hereupon in great Anger, He asked His Uncle whether he took Him for a Merchant, or a Fool, to ſell His Caſtles for Money? and ſaid further, How could I refuſe to Surrender that Town,

A Parlim[ent] in which the commons [illegible] [illegible] form Articles into a Bill [illegible] [illegible] Ladies [illegible] King [illegible]

This Year being the Twentieth of the King's Reign, begins with a Parliament; which by Writs bearing Date the Thirtieth of November laſt, was to be holden on the Feaſt of St. Vincent, or Twenty ſecond of January; which being Aſſembled accordingly, the firſt thing that occurs upon the Roll is, that the Commons fram'd certain Articles into a Bill, the intent of which was to Regulate the extravagant Expences of the King's Houſhold, and to forbid Biſhops and Ladies that had no particular Buſineſs there, from frequenting the Court. What was the Occaſion of inſerting this Clauſe into this Bill, I cannot tell; only the Deſign of it ſeems to have been, to keep the Biſhops to Reſidence at their own Dioceſſes, and not to come to Court only to ſeek new Advancements; as alſo the Ladies from coming to a Place, where they might either tempt others, or themſelves be liable of too much temptation. But the King being inform'd of the Contents of this Bill, was much incenſed, and thereupon told the Peers, That they were againſt thoſe Royalties and Liberties His Progenitors had enjoy'd, and which He was reſolv'd to uphold, and maintain; and therefore Commanded the Lords Spiritual and Temporal to let the Commons know it: And further Order'd the Duke of Lancaſter to Charge Sir John Buſſy the Speaker, upon his Allegiance, to tell Him who brought in the ſaid Bill; for that which chiefly provok'd the King, was, that it deſign'd to Regulate the Expences of His Houſhold, which was then very diſorderly.

[1.] Ib.N. 16. The Commons make their Excuſe and Submiſſion to the King, and the Form of it. Thomas Haxey Clerk, is Accuſed for bringing in the ſaid Bill.

The [1.] Commons made their Excuſe and Submiſſion to the King in manner following. On Saturday, the Morrow of the Feaſt of Candlemas, the Lords Spiritual and Temporal had a Conference with the Commons, and ſhewed them the Will and Command of the King, and then they deliver'd in the Bill to the Lords, with the Name of him that brought it to them, to wit, Thomas Haxey Clerk; which Bill was afterwards deliver'd to the Clerk of the Crown, by the Clerk of the Parliaments, according to the King's Command; and preſently after the Commons came before the King in Parliament, and there, with all the Humility and Obedience they could, ſhew'd great grief for that the King had taken ſuch a Reſentment againſt them, humbly praying Him to hear and accept their Excuſe, For that it never was their intent or will to ſpeak, ſhew, or do any thing which ſhould be an Offence or Diſpleaſure to His Majeſty, nor againſt His Royal Eſtate or Liberty, and eſpecially about this Matter touching His Perſon, and the Government of His Houſe, or about the Lords and Ladies of His Court, nor of any other Matter that touched Himſelf, knowing well that ſuch things do not belong to them, but ſolely to the King Himſelf, and His Ordering; and that their Intention was for the great Affection they bare to Him, as faithful Lieges; that the Lords might pray the King to conſider His Honourable Eſtate, and do concerning it what He pleaſed. And upon this, the Commons ſubmitted themſelves to the King's Will and Favour, humbly praying His Majeſty to have them graciouſly excuſed, being always ready to ſave His Royal Eſtate and Liberty, and to perform with Body and Goods, as Loyal Lieges are bound, what ſhall be for the Honour and Safety of His Royal Majeſty.

Anno Dom. 1397.

Whereupon the Chancellor, by Command of the King, told the Commons, that upon His Royal Benignity, and Gracious Seigniory, He had then fully excuſed them.

On [1.] Wedneſday after Candlemaſs, Thomas Haxey Clerk, was in Parliament Condemn'd to die as a Traytor; yet ſoon after his Sentence, the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and all the other Prelates came before the King in Parliament, with great humility, and made Proteſtation, that their entire and full Intention was, and always ſhould be, that His Royal Eſtate and Power ſhould be always ſaved and preſerved without diminution. [2.] And then they pray'd the King to grant them the Life of Thomas Haxey, and the Cuſtody of his Body, not as of Right belonging to them, but of His Special Grace; both which the King Granted.

[1.] Ib. Thomas Haxey is Condemn'd as a Traytor for bringing in the ſaid Bill.

[2.] Yet upon the Interceſſion of the Prelates, his Life is ſpared.

Then [3.] the King, by Aſſent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and the Commons, of His Special Grace, alſo granted to Robert Belknap, John Holt, and William Burgh, Knights, who had been Baniſhed into Ireland, that they might return into England, and Practice Law, without Impeachment, notwithſtanding the Statute made in the Eleventh Year of that King's Reign; ſaving always againſt them all the other Points contain'd in the ſaid Statute.

[3.] Ib. Robert Belknap, and the reſt of the late Judges that had been ſent into Ireland, have leave to return, and Practice the Law.

Thus the King having gain'd a Parliament to His Mind, now got to be Reverſed what had been done in a former Parliament Nine Years ago; ſo uncertain things have Parliaments been, when Managed either by Court-Intrigues, or Popular Factions. In this Parliament there [4.] was granted to the King by the Clergy half a Tenth; and the Commons, with the Aſſent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, alſo granted Him Twelvepence in the Pound of all Merchandiſe Imported, and Three Shillings per Pound for every Tun of Wine, for Three Years.

[4] Rot. Parl. 21 Rich. 2. The Clergy grant the K. half a Tenth, and the Commons 12*d per* pound on all Merchandiſe.

Having [5.] given you all that is conſiderable concerning this Parliament, I ſhall now add ſome other Matters of leſs moment, viz. That the Duke of Lancaſter procured the Iſſue he had before Mariage begot on the Lady Katherine Swynford, to be Legitimated, and made capable to Succeed to and Enjoy all Dignities, Lands and Inheritances that might deſcend from the Duke their Father; but the Crown is not mention'd in it, as appears by the Charter of Legitimation, confirm'd by an Act un-printed, which yet remains upon [6.] Record. The King alſo at the ſame time, out of His particular Grace and Favour, confirmed by the ſame Parliament, Created Thomas de Beaufort, Eldeſt of the ſaid Duke's baſe Sons, Earl of Somerſet, from whom the preſent Duke of Beaufort is deſcended, by a Natural Son of John the ſecond Earl of Somerſet. By all which Proceedings, it appears, that notwithſtanding all the Secret Intrigues of the Anti-Court Party, the King had now ſo well ſatisfied the greater part of the Nobility, and had ſo over-awed the Houſe of Commons, that they wholy ſubmitted themſelves to His good Will and Pleaſure, and granted Him whatever He demanded of them.

And [2.] ſeeing His Uncle the Duke of Glouceſter ſtood moſt in His way, He deſigned to begin with him, and deſtroy him firſt, not by Law, but by ſecret Violence, and Treachery. What moved the King to act thus Arbitrarily, is variouſly Reported. [3.] Froiſſart, and [4] Polydore Virgil relate, with ſome probability, that the Duke carrying himſelf with too great Pride and Moroſity towards the King, He ſometimes [5.] complain'd to His two Uncles, the Dukes of Lancaſter, and York, of their Brother the Duke of Glouceſter's haughty and diſobliging Carriage towards Him. They, who endeavour'd to excuſe him, and to pacifie the King, alledged, that their Brother indeed, was more hot and vehement than became him, but they durſt aſſure His Majeſty that his Heart was Dutiful and Loyal, and that this vehemency proceeded from a Zealous regard, leſt His Majeſty and Kingdom ſhould ſuffer, either in Honour, or Revenue; and therefore He had no Cauſe, to be afraid of him; with which the King ſeem'd to be ſatisfied for the preſent. But however, theſe Dukes not knowing how they might be involv'd in that diſpleaſure, which they ſtill perceiv'd He retain'd againſt their Brother, thought fit for avoiding the worſt, to retire from Court, thereby giving the Duke of Glouceſter's Enemies the greater Opportunities to incenſe the King againſt him.

[6.] T. W. Ad hunc An. The Converſation between the Earl of St. Paul, and the King, concerning the Duke of Glouceſter, and E. of Arundel.

But [6.] that which was ſuppos'd much to promote the Duke of Glouceſter's deſtruction, was, that ſome time before, the Earl of St. Paul having been ſent over Ambaſſador from France, to the King and Queen, to Congratulate Her Mariage, and Coronation; the King took an Opportunity, being alone with him, to make great Complaints of the Duke of Glouceſter, as that he had been very earneſt with Him to break the Truce with France, and renew the War with that King; and when he found he could not obtain that, he had made it his Buſineſs to ſtir up the People to Sedition, and to raiſe a Civil War at Home, ſince he could not make one Abroad. He likewiſe related, how that ſome Ten Years ſince, he had rais'd ſuch a Faction againſt Him, that he cauſed divers of His faithful Friends and Servants to be put to death, againſt His Will, and did ſtill contrive his deſtruction. To which Diſcourſe, the Earl preſently anſwer'd; That he thought ſuch great Injuries were no longer to be endur'd, but ought ſpeedily to be reveng'd, and the Miſchief to be prevented before it was too late. From this time forward, King Richard reſolv'd to deſtroy the Duke of Glouceſter, and Earl of Arundel, who had been Partner in all his Deſigns; and He only waited for a fit Opportunity to put what He had reſolv'd in Execution. [7] Froiſſart relates this Converſation much to the ſame effect; but lays the time of it not after, but a little before the King's Mariage, when he alſo came over Ambaſſador into England.

[1.] Froiſſ. Ib. Froiſſart's Account of the Plots laid to the Duke of Glouceſter.

But [1.] ſince this Author who lived at that very time, has laid ſeveral ſtrange Plots and Conſpiracies againſt the King to this Duke's Charge, I ſhall from him give a brief Account of them, and leave them to the Reader's Judgment to conſider how far he was guilty of them. This Author relates, that the Duke had much diſpleas'd the King by his ſharp and undutiful Speeches, tho' His Majeſty ſtill endeavour'd to oblige him, by all the Favours He could heap upon him; ſo that he proceeded not only to ſecret Caballs, but open Conſpiracies. And to this end, ſo ſoon as the Peace was made, thoſe Subſidies and Aids, which had been granted and agreed to in Parliament for Twenty years, being ſtill paid, he began again Artificially to inſinuate into the Citizens of London, that the War with France being now ended, they ought to be exempt from thoſe Taxes which had been laid during the War, and for which, the Court could not without injuſtice deny them ſome Redreſs. In ſhort, he puſhed the Buſineſs ſo far, that the City deputed certain Perſons to the King, to deſire Him to be diſcharged from them; wherefore it behoved the King and His Council to avoid this Miſchief; to ſhew them the King's great Neceſſities, and more than Ordinary Occaſion for Money, and how much more gently they were Taxed, than the People of other Countries; and the Duke of Lancaſter was alſo by gentle words, fain to ſhew them the unreaſonableneſs of that Requeſt; ſo that when the Duke of Glouceſter ſaw his deſign did not take effect, he went down to his Houſe at Pleſhey, there to conſider how to raiſe freſh diſturbances.

But [2.] this Accuſation ſeems very improbable; for beſides that it is but the ſame which this Author hath laid to his Charge ten Years before, and it is not likely he ſhould play the ſame Game over again; neither were the City of London, or any other Trading Towns in England then burthen'd with any other Taxes, than thoſe Duties granted upon Wines, Wools, and other Commodities, which the Buyers paid, and not the Merchants.

[3.] Id. ib.

The next Point, which this [3.] Author lays to the Duke's Charge is, that upon the Arrival of the Earl of St. Paul as Ambaſſador from France, the Duke cauſed a Rumour to be ſpread all over England, that this Nobleman was come over to Treat with the King concerning the Surrender of Calais; upon which the Duke incited another Deputation, to be ſent up, not only from London, but many other Towns of the Kingdom, to joyn with him to know of the King whether it were true, or not; and to Requeſt Him not to enter into any ſuch Treaty. This alſo ſeems a falſe Report, for none of our Hiſtorians mention any ſuch thing; tho' it is certain, the King would have made ſuch an Agreement for the delivery of Calais to the French King nine Years before, provided He would or could have aſſiſted Him againſt the Duke of Glouceſter, and the reſt of the Confederate Lords.

[4.] Froiſſ. ib. Froiſſart's Account of the Duke of Glouceſter's Propoſal to the Earl of Marche.

The [4.] next thing laid to this Duke's Charge, is, that upon a pretence of the King's Evil Government, he propoſed to Roger Mortimer Earl of Marche, (Right Heir to the Crown, if the King ſhould die without Iſſue) that in caſe he would joyn with and follow his Direction, he would place him immediately upon the Throne. But the Earl being a Man of a Peaceable and Timorous Temper, utterly refus'd it; and that the horror He conceiv'd for this Traiterous Propoſition, made him by his Uncle, was the Cauſe he retir'd into Wales, and utterly declin'd all further Correſpondence with Him. And that when the Duke ſaw himſelf thus diſappointed of his Hopes, he again renew'd his former deſigns, of privately exciting ſome of the Great Men, and Commons, againſt the King, as one wholy uncapable to Govern; and that he enter'd into a freſh Conſpiracy againſt Him, with the Earl of Arundel, and Warwick.

[1.] Ad hunc An. Fabian's Account of the Crimes laid to the charge of the Archbiſhop, Duke of Glouceſter, and Earls of Arundel, and Warwick.

[1.] Fabian in his Chronicle, relates this Conſpiracy very differently from the former, that about this time the Duke of Glouceſter had held a ſecret Council with the Archbiſhop of Canterbury and Earls of Arundel, Warwick and others at Arundel Caſtle, where after an Oath of Secrecy taken, they reſolved to raiſe a ſufficient Power to remove the Dukes of Lancaſter and York, (who were now both come over to the King's Party) from his Council and Preſence, as likewiſe divers other Councellors and Favourites; and when they had got a Parliament to their Minds, therein to make a thorough Reformation after their own way; the others mention a much worſe deſign theſe Lords had, of impriſoning the King and the above mentioned Dukes, and puting divers of his Privy Council to death, which is very unlikely.

From whence theſe Authors received theſe Informations I canno tell, for none of our Hiſtorians at that time (except Froiſſart who wa a Foreigner) mentions any ſuch Conſpiracy; and as for what He relates, it is very Strange (had it been true) that the Earl of Marche who alone could make this Diſcovery of what in private paſſed betwee the Duke his Uncle and himſelf, ſhould not have impeached him of i neither in the great Council at Nottingham, nor in the following Parliament; whereas nothing appears to be then laid to his charge, or to th Earls above mention'd; then the old buſineſs of their appearing in Arm at Haringay-Park, as hath been already related.

[2.] The whiſpers of the Earl of Huntington accelerate the Duke's ruin.

But Froiſſart I believe is ſo far in the right, that nothing mor accelerated the Ruin of this unfortunate Prince, than the conſtan Whiſpers of John Holland [2.] Earl of Huntington, the King's hal Brother, who either by reaſon of the Perſonal Enmity he had lon born to him, or out of real Love and Concern for the King's Perſon often told Him, that the Duke was hatching a Conſpiracy to depoſ Him; to which may be alſo added, that certain young Councellor about the King, fearing to be call'd to an Account, and loſe their Head as Sir Simon Burley and others had remonſtrated to Him, that his Uncl the Duke of Glouceſter had Spread abroad certain Rumors that the Kin having ſeemingly ſubmitted Himſelf to the French by the late Truce an Mariage, was not fit any longer to wear the Crown, and that it wa much to be fear'd, leaſt the Duke, joyning with the Londoners and othe Male-Contents in England, ſhould not one time or other depoſe Him.

[3.] The K. conſults with His Confidents how to deſtroy the Duke.

Whither theſe Suſpicions had any real grounds or not, it is ſufficien that they put the King under ſuch great apprehenſions, that He conſulted with thoſe Noblemen in whom He put moſt confidence, how t prevent thoſe deſigns which He ſuppoſed to be formed againſt Hi And to this end, [3.] He asked the Advice and Aſſiſtance of the Ea of Nottingham, Lord Marſhal, who ſecretly hating the Duke, help'd th

[1] Id. ib. The manner of putting that Deſign in Execution.

The [1.] Duke being now return'd to his Mannor of Pleſhy ~~(as hath been already related)~~ the King went after dinner from a Hunting Seat, called Havering the Bower, and came one Summers Evening about five of the Clock to the Duke's Houſe, as if it were to give him a Viſit, where He was receivd by him and his Dutcheſs, with all due honour and reſpect, the Duke preſently order'd ſupper to be got ready for the King, but when He had eaten a little, He Commanded the Duke to order ſome of his Horſes to be Sadled, to bear Him Company that night to London, for that he himſelf with his two other Uncles, were to hold a Council the next day, in which He deſired his Advice, what anſwer to give the Londoners to a certain Petition they had offered to Him, Upon this the Duke, not taking more then five or Six Attendants; (as not at all ſuſpecting the King's Deſign laid againſt him) preſently mounted and accompanied Him towards London, who, under pretence of avoiding the beaten Rode, becauſe of the Duſt, left the Towns, and went about by the Foreſt of Epping, ſtill talking familiarly with the Duke, as they rode along; but when they came near Stratford, where there was an Ambuſh laid to apprehend him) the King on the ſudden took occaſion to clap Spurs to His Horſe, and Ride away from him, as faſt as He could, the Duke followed him, but preſently the Earl of Nottingham (then Marſhal) with a great number of Horſemen ſallying out upon him, Arreſted him in the King's Name: So ſoon as the Duke ſaw he was betray'd, he called after the King, but it was then to no purpoſe, for they hurried him away to a Barge which convey'd him on Board a Ship, that was ready in the River for that purpoſe; and the Lord Marſhal conveyed him to Calais, where he was kept Cloſe Priſoner, till he was made away not long after, of which you will hear more in due time.

[2.] T. W. Ad hunc An. The Earls of Arundel and Warwick, and others, Arreſted for Treaſon.

The [2.] King being now reſolved to go thro' with his intended deſigns, proceeded much after the ſame manner with the reſt of the Lords and Gentlemen, who were of the Duke's Party; and to this End He ſent for the Earls of Warwick and Arundel to Court, and at firſt gave them fair words, and Gracious Promiſes; but in their return home they were Arreſted for Treaſon, and ſent to the Tower, as were alſo, not long after the Lord Cobham, and Sr. John Cheyney, with ſeveral other Gentlemen, who had bin of the ſame Faction. The Nobility, as well as the Common People being much diſturbed at theſe violent and Arbitrary proceedings, the [3.] King to quiet their minds iſſued out a ~~Declaration, wherein He ſat forth, that the Lords lately apprehended were not thus dealt with for any former Offences, but for certain new Treaſons by them Committed, which ſhould be made out in due time, tho' I do not find they ever were, for~~ I ſhall here ſet down all that remains upon [4.] Record relating to this Subject; whereby it appears, that the King, the better to ſatisfie the People's minds and ſtrengthen his Party amongſt the Nobility, thought fit to call a great Council of Peers at Nottingham, on the firſt of Auguſt, where certain Earls and Barons of the King's Party undertook to accuſe the Duke of Glouceſter, and the two other Earls above mention'd of High Treaſon; the Proceedings againſt whom I ſhall here inſert from the Rolls, as they are abridged by [5.] Dr. Brady in his laſt Volume, tho' he hath by miſtake

[1.] Ib. id. The Proceedings of the great Council at Nottingham.

On [1.] the firſt day of Auguſt, this Year at Nottingham, before the King, ſitting with His Crown on His Head in the great Hall of the Caſtle there, Edward Earl of Rutland, Thomas Earl of Kent, John Earl of Huntington, Thomas Earl of Nottingham, John Earl of Somerſet, John Earl of Salisbury, Thomas Lord Deſpenſer, and William le Scrope, the King's Chamberlain, brought a Bill of Appeal of Treaſon againſt Thomas Duke of Glouceſter, Richard Earl of Arundel, and Thomas Earl of Warwick. This Bill having been read, by Advice of the Lords, and thoſe of his Council about the King, the Lords Accuſed had a day given them to Anſwer in the [2.] next Parliament, which was to begin on the Monday after the Exaltation of Holy-Croſs, or fourteenth of September (being this Year on a Friday) ſo that the Parliament began the ſeventeenth of that Month.

[2] Rot. Clauſ. 21 Rich. 2. Part I. m. 27 Dors.

But before I proceed further with the Tranſactions of this Parliament, I ſhall take notice what our Hiſtorians obſerve of it, (and which will ſhew the Illegal and Arbitrary Proceedings againſt the Impeached Lords) that the King by certain indirect Practices, and tampering with the [3.] Sheriffs of ſeveral Counties, whom He had now made for this Purpoſe, cauſed them to Return ſuch Knights of Shires without any due Elections, as He had before named, and ſent down to them; and this is worth our Obſervation, becauſe it is the firſt Example of any King's making uſe of an Arbitrary and Illegal Power in this kind, and was afterwards made one of the Chief Articles for this King's Depoſition, and for which alſo the whole Proceedings of this Parliament were annulled and ſet aſide in the firſt Year of King Henry the Fourth. But I ſhall here inſert what happen'd before their Meeting.

In [4.] this Interval between this Great Council, and the enſuing Parliament, *the Duke of Glouceſter was privately Murther'd at Calais, ſome time after his Impriſonment, by the King's Command; the reaſon of which cruel and extraordinary Proceeding ſeems to have been, becauſe He was afraid to bring him to his Tryal in Parliament, leaſt by his Innocency, or Popularity and near Relation to the King, he ſhould have got off; but the manner of perpetrating this Murther is not commonly known, and is falſly related by Froiſſart, and other Writers, who had it only from ſome common Reports then current, that he was Strangled one day preſently after Dinner with a Towel, as he was about to waſh his hands. Tho' it is very probable what this Author relates, that the Duke fearing his Life was in danger, Confeſſed himſelf, and Received Abſolution from a Prieſt the day he was Murther'd; [5.] the true manner of which, appears from a Depoſition upon [6.] Record, of one John Hall, then a Servant to the Earl Marſhal, who was aſſiſting at this Murther, as he confeſſed before King Henry the Fourth in Parliament; that being call'd out of his Bed for that purpoſe, he went with ſeveral others to our Ladie's Church in Calais, where they all were made to take an Oath of Secrecy upon the Hoſt, that they would not diſcover any thing relating to their preſent Deſign; and that then the Duke, being convey'd from the Caſtle to a certain Hoſtel called the Prince's Inn, was carried by one

I ſhall conclude this ſad Subject with a brief [1.] Character of this Prince, and his diſpoſition; he was for his Perſon very Comely, and Majeſtick, Vertuous, Valiant, and undertaking the greateſt dangers, where he ſaw his own Honour, and the Publick Good concern'd; but being of a reſtleſs and turbulent Temper, was not much beloved by his own Brothers, much leſs by moſt of the Nobility, except ſuch as were engaged with him in the ſame Party. So on the other ſide, he was highly beloved, and honoured by the Common People, becauſe he ſtood up for their Liberties, againſt their being oppreſſed by the Great Ones; ſo that when he was taken off, the People's Spirits fail'd them for (as my [2.] Author has it) they ſuppos'd the Common Hope and Support of the Nation againſt Tyranny, expir'd with him. But this good Quality of his did him no Service, but on the contrary, haſten'd his Ruin; that being the Son of one King, and Uncle to another, it made him to be at once both feared and hated by his Enemies.

[2.] Thom: Walſingham, Ad hunc An.

[3.] Ib. id. Cap. 134. Upon the News of the Duke's death, his Brothers raiſe Forces, and march to London, where they are admitted.

I ſhall here add a Remarkable Tranſaction, which muſt have been done about this time (if it were ever done at all) which I have ſome reaſon to doubt it was not, becauſe our own Hiſtorians are wholy ſilent in it; but however, ſince it is related by [3.] Froiſſart, I ſhall here briefly mention; it is, That when the unexpected News of the Duke of Glouceſter's death was brought into England, it highly provoked not only the Common People, but divers of the Nobility, and eſpecially his Brethren the Dukes of Lancaſter, and York, who with all the ſpeed they could, haſten'd up to London with ſome Forces; which notwithſtanding all the King's Commands to the contrary, open'd their Gates to them. x²

But [5.] tho' the Londoners were then very much inclin'd to Revenge the death of the Duke of Glouceſter, and had given his Brothers entrance into the City for that Purpoſe, yet the Earl of Rutland, Son to the Duke of York, who was much in the King's Favour, uſed all his Power with his Father and Uncle to Accomodate theſe Differences (which might otherwiſe have proved Fatal to the Publick Peace) by repreſenting to them, that tho' it is true, his Uncle of Glouceſter had hard meaſure, yet what was now done, could not be remedied; and that that if they endeavour'd to Revenge it, the King of France might intereſt Himſelf in the Quarrel, and ſend over Forces to join with thoſe in England, to Support the King's Authority; ſo that the Duke of Lancaſter had ſome thoughts of ſending to his Sons-in-Law the Kings of Caſtile, and Portugal, for Aſſiſtance; yet upon the interceſſion of the Earl his Nephew, and the inſtant Requeſt of ſome Wiſe and Moderate Prelates, he was contented to come to an Agreement with the King, upon this [1.] Condition, that He ſhould for the future do nothing of Moment without the Duke's Knowledge, and Advice; but this Condition the King did not think fit long to obſerve, but gave Himſelf up to be wholy Govern'd by Evil Counſellors, as you will find hereafter.

[2] Chron. de Lambeth, Ms. The Biſhop of Exeter at the opening of the Parliament, makes a Speech for the King's Prerogative to be above Law.

This Relation, whether true or falſe, ^ I ſhall leave to the Reader's Judgment, and proceed to what is ^ more certain. [2.] The Parliament being met at Weſtminſter, according to the Summons, at the opening of it, the Biſhop of Exeter, then Lord Chancellor, made a Speech, or rather Sermon, upon a Text of Scipture, and like a true Court-Chaplain, ſhew'd that the Royal Power, or Prerogative of the King was the only true and real Power, and that thoſe who went about to take it away or reſtrain it, deſerved the ſevereſt Penalties the Law could inflict.

[3.] T. W. Sir John Buſſy is choſen Speaker. He, and Sir William Bagot, and Sir Henry Green, are the great Managers in this Parliament, to procure the former Pardons to be reverſed.

Then [3.] Sir John Buſhy (a Creature of the King's) was by His Nomination Choſen Speaker, who, together with Sir William Bagot, and Sir Henry Green, are noted for Proud, Covetous and Ambitious Perſons; they by their Artificial and Cunning Speeches in Parliament, procured the Charters of Pardon formerly granted in the eleventh of this King's Reign to be reverſed, which (ſaith my Author) was too eaſily agreed to by the Prelates, who declar'd they thought they ought to be Revoked, not conſidering that the Recalling ſuch a Grace, does chiefly reflect upon the King's Honour; for ſince Mercy is the ſtrength of the Royal Throne, whoever takes away that, deſtroys the main Foundation of it. Thus far my Author.

[4.] Vid. Stat. at large. 21 Rich. 2. Cap. 1. The Chief Acts and Proceedings in this Parliament.

I ſhall now give you the effect of the Proceedings of this Parliament, as they are enter'd on the Roll, where one of the firſt things I find to have been Enacted in it, [4.] was, that Holy Church, the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and all Cities, Burghs and Commonalities of the Realm, ſhould have and enjoy all their Liberties and Franchiſes, as they reaſonably had and enjoyed them in the time of his Noble Progenitors, Kings of England.

[5.] Rot. Parl. 21 Rich. 2. N. 9 The Commons deſire the Clergy might appoint a general Procurator to act for them, and Sir Tho. Piercy is choſen.

And [5.] for that ſeveral Judgments were heretofore undone, becauſe the Clergy were not preſent, nor conſenting to them, the Commons prayed the King that they might now appoint a General Proctor, who might have ſufficient Authority to Act for them; whereupon the two Archbiſhops, and the Clergy of both Provinces, conſtituted and appointed Sir Thomas Piercy their Procurator, as by their Inſtrument doth appear.

[6.] Vid. Stat. at large, Ib. which agrees with the Record. The Commiſſion and Statnte made in the 11th year, are repeal'd.

Then both the [6.] Commiſſion and Statute perſuant to it, made in the Eleventh Year of this King were repealed and made void, at the Prayer of the Commons, as being made Traiterouſly, by Conſtraint, and Compulſion, againſt the King's Will, His Royalty, Crown and Dignity; and it was Ordained and Eſtabliſhed by the King, with the Aſſent of the Lords and Commons, that no ſuch Commiſſion, or the like, ſhould

Then [1.] the Pardons granted to the Duke of Glouceſter, and Earls of Arundel and Warwick, in the Parliament of the eleventh Year of this King, were made void, as being got by force, againſt the King's Will; as alſo the Pardon granted to the Earl of Arundel at Windſor, in the Seventeenth Year of the King, was revoked, and annulled.

[2] *Ib. N.*14. The Proteſtation of the Commons, concerning Impeachments.

On the [2.] Twentieth of September, the Commons made Proteſtation to the King in full Parliament, that tho' they would ſhew and declare certain Matters and Articles they had then Adviſed of, and agreed amongſt themſelves, yet nevertheleſs it was, and is their intent and will, by leave of the King, to Accuſe or Impeach any Perſon or Perſons, as often as they ſhould think fit, during the time of this Parliament; and they prayed the King that He would pleaſe to accept their Proteſtation, and that it might be entred of Record on the Parliament-Roll, which the King granted, and Commanded it to be done.

[3] *Ib. N.*15. They Impeach the Archbiſhop of Canterbury of Treaſon, and the Articles of it.

Then on the ſame day before the King in full Parliament, [3.] the Commons Accuſed and Impeached Thomas Arundel, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, of High Treaſon; for that he being the Chief Officer of the King (to wit) His Chancellor, (when he was Biſhop of Ely) was Traiterouſly Aiding, Procuring and Avdiſing, in making a Commiſſion, directed to Thomas Duke of Glouceſter, Richard Earl of Arundel, and others, in the Tenth Year of His Majeſty's Reign; and made and procured himſelf, as Chief Officer of the Realm, to be put into it, to have Power with the other Commiſſioners to put it in Execution; which Commiſſion was made in prejudice of the King, and openly againſt His Royalty, Crown and Dignity; and that the ſaid Thomas put in Execution the ſaid Commiſſion.

[4.] Ibidem.

Alſo [4.] for that the ſaid Thomas Archbiſhop, in the eleventh Year of the King, procured and adviſed the Duke of Glouceſter, and the Earls of Warwick and Arundel, to take upon them Royal Power, and to Arreſt the King's Lieges, viz. Simon Burley, and James Barners, Knights, and adjudge them to death, contrary to the Will and Aſſent of the King; thereupon the ſaid Commons prayed the King, that the ſaid Thomas might be put in ſafe Cuſtody, and in an honeſt manner. And the King anſwer'd, Becauſe the Accuſation and Impeachment touched ſo high a Perſon, and a Peer of the Realm, He would be Adviſed.

[5.] *Ib. N.*16. The Commons Petition for Judgment againſt the Archbiſhop.

Then [5.] on the Twenty firſt day of September next following, the Commons prayed the King, that as they had Impeached and Accuſed the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, that he had Aſſented, or was in the Contrivance, to cauſe the Commiſſion to be made on the Nineteenth of November, in the Tenth Year of the King, and agreed to the Execution of the ſame, which was expreſly againſt His State and Dignity, that He would pleaſe to ordain ſuch Judgment againſt the Archbiſhop, as the Cauſe required. Hereupon the King Commanded to be Recorded in Parliament, that the Archbiſhop being before Him, in the preſence of certain Lords, confeſſed that he was Miſtaken, or Erred in the exerciſe of the Commiſſion, and therefore put himſelf under the King's Grace.

Thereupon,

Anno Dom. 1397.

[1.] Ibidem. The Archbiſhop declared a Traytor by the Lords, and the Procurator of the Clergy, and Sentenc'd to be Baniſh'd, and his Eſtate Forfeited.

Thereupon [1.] the King and all the Lords Temporal, and Sir Thomas Piercy, having ſufficient Power from the Prelates, and Clergy, (as appears upon Record in the ſaid Parliament) adjudged and declared the ſaid Article (which the Archbiſhop had confeſſed) to be Treaſon, and that it touched the King Himſelf, and alſo adjudged and declared him a Traytor. Upon which it was Awarded in Parliament, that he ſhould be Baniſhed out of England, his Temporalities ſeized, and his Goods and Chattels Forfeited to the King, who was alſo to appoint the time of his Exile.

[2.] *Ib.N.*17. The Archbiſhop has a time ſet for his departure.

And [2.] then the King Aſſigned him a time of Paſſage, viz. from the Eve of St. Michael, until Six Weeks next enſuing, to paſs from the Port of Dover into France; and further, that he ſhould Forfeit to the King all his Lands, Tenements, and Poſſeſſions, which he had in Fee-Simple, by Deſcent, Purchaſe, or otherwiſe, at the day of the Treaſon Committed, or after, or that any one held to his Uſe.

[3.] T. W. Vid. the 33d Article of the Parliament's Charge againſt King Richard.

The Archbiſhop is prevail'd with by the King to be abſent this Parliament, and is Condemn'd unheard.

But [3.] now to ſay ſomewhat further from our Hiſtorians, concerning the Archbiſhop's Sentence, Walſingham, with whom alſo agrees the Tower-Record, gives a more particular Account of the manner of it thus. That the King, pretending a Kindneſs for him, aſſur'd him that nothing ſhould be done, that might turn to his Prejudice. Upon this aſſurance, he (after his Confeſſion, and being privately Pardon'd) abſented himſelf from the Parliament, at the King's Command, yet notwithſtanding that, he was Condemn'd to Baniſhment, tho' abſent, and unheard; with a Clauſe, that he ſhould remain in England but Forty Days after the Sentence given; and that not long after, the King ſent privately to the Pope, and not only obtain'd the Archbiſhop's Deprivation, but alſo ~~one~~ Roger Walden the King's Treaſurer, was Nominated Archbiſhop in his room. This is the next Example of any Archbiſhop, who (after Thomas Becket) was Baniſh'd by Sentence of Parliament.

[4.] Placit. Coron. 21 Rich. 2. The reſt of the Proceedings againſt the Duke of Glouceſter, and Earls of Warwick, and Arundel.

I ſhall now go on with the reſt of the Proceedings in this Parliament againſt the Duke of Glouceſter, and the Earls of Arundel, and Warwick, as they are contained in the [4.] Pleas of the Crown, entred on the ſame Parliament-Roll; and ſhall begin with the Articles of Impeachment then brought againſt them by way of Bill from the Lords Appellants (already mention'd) This Bill, or Impeachment was (as appears by the Title) directed to the King in Parliament, and is to this effect.

I.

[5.] Placit. Coron. 21 Rich. 2. The Articles of Impeachment againſt the Lords appealed.

In the firſt Place, it [5.] ſets forth, that the Duke of Glouceſter, and Earl of Arundel, deſigning to encroach, and have the Government of Your Royal Perſon and Kingdom, with the Liberties and Dignities thereof, as well within this Kingdom, as without; when the Parliament ſat at Weſtminſter, in the Tenth Year of Your Reign, they ſent a Peer of the Land to You, who on their behalf, and by their Command, told your Majeſty, that if You would not conſent to make to them, and others whom they ſhould name, ſuch a Commiſſion, whereby they might have the Government in the manner as is above related, You ſhould be in danger of Your Life, and the Lords and Commons of Parliament would depart without Your leave; and that then You ſhould ſee in what a miſerable Condition You would be; ſo that in very fear of their Power, You then granted ſuch a Commiſſion as they deſired. Then follows the Commiſſion it ſelf, recited at large (which I here omit) Dated at Weſtminſter, the Nineteenth of November, in the Tenth Year of His Reign; by Vertue whereof, the Twelve Commiſſioners took the Government upon them.

II. [1.] Ib. Alſo [1.] the ſaid Duke and Earl of Arundel, to Accompliſh their Traiterous Purpoſes, and to have Your Royal Perſon in their Power, Ordered as they pleas'd the Government of Your whole State, with the Laws and Dignities thereof, and prevailed with Thomas Earl of Warwick, and Thomas Mortimer to join with them in their Traiterous Deſign; who by Agreement, as Traitors to the King, and Kingdom, all Met, and Aſſembled on the Thirteenth of November, in the Eleventh Year of Your Reign, at Haringay-Park in Middleſex, with a great Number of People Armed and Arrayed, and made divers of Your Liege-People in ſeveral Parts of Your Realm, to Riſe, and March with them againſt Your Royal Perſon, contrary to their Legiance, and would not come before Your Preſence, until they were ſecured by Your Oath that they might come, and return ſafely; and then they all appeared before You in Your Palace at Weſtminſter, with a great Force of Armed Men, and Traiterouſly Conſtrained You to take them into Your ſafe Protection, againſt Your Will and Pleaſure.

III. [2.] Ib. Alſo [2.] the ſaid Duke, the Earls of Arundel and Warwick, and Thomas Mortimer, continuing their Traiterous Purpoſes, by Force and Violence did take and Impriſon divers of Your Liege People, and amongſt others, Sir Simon Burley, and brought him to Your Parliament, held on the Morrow of the Purification, in the eleventh Year of Your Reign, and there ſuggeſted divers Points of High Crimes and Treaſon againſt him, and the Advice of every Lord then preſent was asked concerning the Crimes of the ſaid Simon, and afterwards the Duke and Earls would know Your Advice, and Opinion; and You Anſwer'd plainly, he was not Guilty in any Point objected againſt him. And after that, the Duke and Earls cauſed You to come into a ſecret Place at Weſtminſter, and there ſhewed You the Particulars of the Crimes aboveſaid. To whom You then Anſwer'd likewiſe, that the ſaid Simon was not Guilty in any of thoſe Points. And there they took upon them Traiterouſly to have You by Force conſent to the Judgment they had deſigned againſt him; and yet You would not conſent to any Judgment to be given againſt the ſaid Simon. Yet nevertheleſs, the ſaid Duke and Earls took upon them Royal Power, in prejudice of You, and in derogation to Your Crown, and without Your Aſſent, and contrary to Your Will, in Your Abſence, and in the Abſence of many other Peers of Parliament, without their Aſſent, and againſt their Wills, they Awarded that the ſaid Simon ſhould be Drawn, Hanged and Beheaded; and thereupon they Traiterouſly cauſed his Head to be ſtruck off, againſt Your Peace, Crown, Majeſty, and Dignity.

IV. [3.] Ib. Alſo [3.] the foreſaid Duke, Earls, and Thomas Mortimer, continuing their Malicious, Falſe and Traiterous Purpoſes and Force, at Huntington, on Thurſday after the Feaſt of St. Nicholas (or Sixth of December) in the ſaid eleventh Year, Traiterouſly agreed, and intended to have gone with their Forces to any place of the Kingdom, where they might have found Your Royal Perſon, to have ſurrendred to You their Homage-Liege, and to have depos'd You ; and this they would have done, had they not been hindred by Henry of Lancaſter Earl of Derby, and Thomas Mowbray Earl of Nottingham. And the ſaid Duke and Earls continuing their Traiterous Intention and Force, by Agreement between them, cauſed the Records in your Treaſury, of the time of Your Great Grandfather King Edward to be ſearched, how He demiſed (or quitted) His Crown ; and they ſhew'd to You in Writing the Cauſes of the demiſe of His Crown in Your Palace at Weſtminſter, in the time of Parliament, in the ſaid eleventh Year, and they ſaid Falſly and Traiterouſly that they had cauſe ſufficient to depoſe You, but for the Reverence they had for Your moſt Noble Grandfather, and Father ; and they ſaid alſo, that in hopes of your better Government, they would ſuffer You to continue in Your Roya Eſtate, and Regality.

V. Ib.

Which Treaſons ſo imagined (or contrived) done and perpetrated by the aforeſaid Duke, Earls, and Thomas Mortimer, againſt Your Royal Perſon, Eſtate, Majeſty, and Dignity, as is above declared; We the Appellants (there named) Your Loyal Lieges, have been and are ready to prove againſt the ſaid Duke, the Earls of Arundel and Warwick, and Thomas Mortimer as You, our moſt dread Lord, and this High and Honourable Court, Your Parliament, ſhall Order. Thus much for the Articles of this Appeal againſt theſe Four Noble-Men.

[1.] Ib. The Lords Appealed are ordered to be brought into Parliament. The Earl of Arundel is firſt Tryed.

And [1.] now they having been read in Parliament, the Appellant prayed the King that the Appealed might be brought before Him i Parliament, to make their Anſwer ; and accordingly, Ralph Lor Nevil, Conſtable of the Tower, there preſent, had Orders to bring be-fore the Parliament Richard Earl of Arundel, then his Priſoner, and he did ſo on the One and twentieth of September, on the Fourth da of the Parliament, and then by Command of the King, and th Peers, the Duke of Lancaſter being Lord Steward of England, tol him, that he was Appealed of divers High Treaſons ; and the Appea having been read to him, his Anſwer was [2.] That he had a General Pardon, in the Parliament holden in the eleventh Year of the King's Reign, as alſo a Charter of Pardon made to him within Six Years la paſt, and prayed the Allowance of them. To whom it was ſaid b the Duke of Lancaſter, by Command of the King, and with Advice of al the Peers of Parliament, that the Pardon granted in that eleventh Yea was made by Conſtraint upon the King, by the ſaid Duke, Earls, an others of their Party, accroaching to themſelves Royal Power, in prejudice of the King, His Royal Eſtate, Crown and Dignity ; and tha the Charter of Pardon was made in deceit of the King, and expreſſ againſt Him, and His Royal Dignity ; wherefore the ſaid Pardon an Charter by Aſſent of the King, and all Eſtates of Parliament, upon th Requeſt of the Commons, had been in this Parliament Repealed and made void. And then the Earl was asked if he would ſay any thin more ; and Sir Walter Clopton, Chief Juſtice of the King's-Bench, b the King's Command, declared to him the Law, and the Puniſhmen he muſt undergo, if he Pleaded nothing elſe ; and told him, if he di not Plead further, he would be Convict and Attainted of all the Matters objected againſt him. Yet notwithſtanding this, and the Repea of the Charter and Pardon, he demanded the Allowance of them; whereupon the Appellants in their proper Perſons, prayed the King that it would pleaſe Him to give [1.] Judgment upon him, as Convict of all the Points on which he was Appealed.

Whereupon [2.] the Duke of Lancaſter, by Command of the King, and all the Lords Temporal, and Sir Thomas Piercy, having Power ſufficient from the Prelates and Clergy (as appears by Record in this Parliament) Adjudged the ſaid Earl of Arundel Guilty and Convict of all the Points of which he was Appealed, and Adjudged him a Traytor to the King and Realm, and that he ſhould be Drawn, Hanged, Beheaded, and Quartered: And becauſe the Treaſons were ſo high, as to have gone about to ſurrender their Liege-Homage, and Depoſe the King, and the Levying of War having been ſo Notorious, the ſaid Duke of Lancaſter, by Command of the King, the Lords Temporal, and Sir Thomas Piercy, having Power as above, by Aſſent of the King, Awarded, that all the Caſtles, Mannors, Lands, Tenements, Reverſions, Fees, and every other Mannor of Inheritance, as well in Fee-Tail, as Fee-Simple, which were the ſaid Earl of Arundel's on the Nineteenth of November, in the Tenth Year of the King, or afterwards; and alſo all the Lands and Tenements, of which other Perſons were infeoffed to his Uſe the ſaid Nineteenth of November, or afterwards, with all his Goods and Chattels ſhould be Forfeited to the King, and His Heirs; yet He Graciouſly remitted that part of his Judgment, of being Drawn, Hang'd, and Quartered. Then (to ſhew ſome Equity, as well as Rigour) the King and Lords, both Spiritual and Temporal, declared that it was not their intention that the Lands and Tenements, Fees, or any other Inheritance, of which the ſaid Earl ſtood infeoffed, to the Uſe of another, by reaſon of this Judgment, ſhould in any manner be Forfeited.

[2.] Ib. The Lords Temporal, and Procurator of the Clergy, adjudge the ſaid Earl guilty of the Articles of which he was accuſed, and paſs Sentence upon him as a Traytor.

Then [3.] on the ſame day that the Earl of Arundel was brought into Parliament, and Tryed and Convicted, the King directed His Warrant to Thomas Earl Marſhal, Captain of the Town of Calais, and to his Lieutenant, ſignifying that he ſhould bring over ~~the Body~~ of Thomas Duke of Glouceſter with all the ſpeed he could, to anſwer to divers Articles of Treaſon in Parliament objected againſt him by the Appellants; according to the Law and Cuſtom uſed in England, and further, to receive what ſhould be Order'd by the King, and His Council, concerning him in Parliament. This was dated at Weſtminſter the Twenty firſt of September, in the One and Twentieth Year of His Reign, by the King and Council in Parliament.

[3.] Ib. The King orders the Duke of Glouceſter to be brought over from Calais.

* Rot: Claus 21. R 2. p. 1. m 22. RS. Col: p. 15.

The [4.] Anſwer or Return of the Earl Marſhal to this Warrant was, That he could not bring the ſaid Duke before the King and His Council in that preſent Parliament, for that being in his Cuſtody in the King's Priſon at Calais, he died there. This Return was made September the 24th.

[4.] Ib. The E. Marſhal returns that the Duke is dead.

Ib.

Wherefore upon Reading of this Warrant, and Return in Parliament, the Appellants in their proper Perſons prayed the King that the ſaid Duke of Glouceſter might be declared a [5.] Traytor, and Enemy to Him, as having Levied War in the Kingdom againſt His Perſon, contrary to his Allegiance, and that all his Lands, Tenements, Goods and Chattels, as they ought in this Caſe, notwithſtanding his death, might be Forfeit. Then alſo the Commons of this Parliament prayed the King and Lords, that it being notoriouſly known to the King, and all the Eſtates of the preſent Parliament, and to all the Kingdom, that the ſaid Duke, and others of his Party Aſſembled at Haringay in the County of Middleſex, with a great Number of People Armed and Arrayed to make War againſt the King, contrary to their Allegiance, and came with ſuch Force into the preſence of the King, which was to Levy War againſt their Liege-Lord, that he might thereupon be adjudged a Traytor, and that his Lands, Tenements, Goods and Chattels might be Forfeit, notwithſtanding his death, as they ought in this Caſe. Upon this all the Lords Temporal, and the ſaid Sir Thomas Piercy, thro' the Power as aboveſaid, having been fully Examined, declared, that the ſaid Crime and Treaſon were notoriouſly known to them, and the whole Kingdom; wherefore all the Lords Temporal, and the ſaid Sir Thomas Piercy, by aſſent of the King, declared him guilty of Levying of War, as a Traytor, and adjudged all his Caſtles, Mannors, Lands, &c. which He was Poſſeſſed of on the Thirteenth of November, in the eleventh year of this Reign, as in the Earl of Arundel's Judgment to be Forfeit to the King and His Heirs, and that none of his Iſſue, or Heirs of his Body, or their Iſſue, or Heirs in time to come, ſhould ever bear the Royal Arms of England entire, nor with difference, or in other manner whatſoever, nor ſhould Inherit the Crown of England.

He is declar'd guilty of Treaſon.

[1.] Ib. The Appellants pray the King that if there were any confeſſion of the Perſon Appealed, it might be brought into Parliament.

Upon [1.] the 25th of September, the ſaid Appellants in full Parliament, prayed the King, that if there were any thing upon Record, whether by Confeſſion of any Perſon Appealed, or other Perſon whatſoever, touching their Appeal, that it might be openly known, and declared in full Parliament; then by Command of the King, and Advice of all the Lords Temporal, a Commiſſion bearing date the 17th of Auguſt laſt paſt, directed to Sir William Rickhill, one of the Juſtices of the Common Bench, together with a Confeſſion made before him by Thomas late Duke of Glouceſter, by Vertue of the aboveſaid Commiſſion, with the return of that Commiſſion, were then Read, which follow in theſe words in Engliſh.

Wheraupon Sir William Rickhill gives in this Confeſſion made before him by the late D. of Glouceſter.

This is the Anſwer of William Rickhill to the Commiſſion of his Liege Lord the King. Thomas Duke of Glouceſter, be the Name of Thomas Woodſtock, the Zear of the King Richard Twenty one, in the Caſtle of Cales, by Vertue of a Commiſſion of the King, as it is more plainly declared in the ſame, directed to William Rickhill Juſtice, hath * I know and Confeſſed to fore the ſame William all the Matters and Points I wrote (that is, wrot) in this great Roll annexed to this Schedule, the which Schedule and great Roll both Sealed under the Seal of the aforeſaid William, and all the Matters and Points I know (that is declared) and Confeſſed by the foreſaid Duke in the Caſtle of Caleys, the foreſaid Duke be his own Hand fully and plainly I wrote, and delivered it to the ſame William Rickhill touching this Matter it was I doe (i. e. was done) in the preſence of the foreſaid John, and John, and in none other manner.

Ib. The Confeſſion it ſelf.

I Thomas of Woodſtock, the Zear of my Lord the King twenty one, be the Vertue of a Commiſſion of my Lord the King, the ſame Zear directed to William Rickhill Juſtice, the which is comprehendedmore painly in the foreſaid Commiſſion, knowleche that I was one with ſterynge of other Men, to Aſſent to the making of a Commiſſion, in the which Commiſſion I among other, reſtrained my Lord of His Freedom, and took upon me among other, Power * Real, truly not knowing ne witting, that time that I did againſt His Eſtate, nor His Royaltie, as I did after, and do now; and foraſmuch as I knew afterward that I had done wrong, and take upon me more than me ought to do, I ſubmitted me to my Lord, and cried him Mercy and Grace, and yet do as truly and as meekly as any Man may, and put me high and low in His Mercy and Grace, as He hath always been full of Mercy and Grace to all other.

* i. e. Regal

Alſo, in that time, that I came Armed into my Lord's preſence, and into his Palace, howſoever that I did it for drede of my Life, I knowleche for certain, that I did Evil, and againſt His Regalte, and His Eſtate, wherefore I ſubmit me lowly and meekly to His Mercy, and to His Grace.

*Alſo, in that I took my Lord's * Letters of His Meſſages, and opened them againſt his leave, I knowleche that I did Evil, wherefore I put me lowly in His Grace.*

* Viz. At Radcot-Bridge.

Alſo, in that, that I Sclaundred my Lord, I knowlech, that I did Evil and wickedly, in that, that I ſpake to him in Sclaunderous wiſe, in Audience of other Folk; bot by the way, that my Soul ſhall too, I meant none Evil therein, nevertheleſs I wot and knowleche that I did Evil and Unkindly, wherefore I ſubmit me high and low in His Grace.

Alſo, in that I among other, communed and asked of certain Clercs, whither that we might give up our Homage for dread of our Lives or not, and whether that we were aſſentid thereto for to do it, trewly and by my troth, Ine have now none full mind thereof (that is, he did not remember it) but I trowe rather yes, then nay, wherefore I ſubmit me high and low evermore in his Grace.

Alſo, in that, that I was in place, there it was Communed, and ſpoken in manner of Depoſal of my Liege Lord, truly I knowlech well, that we were aſſentid thereto for two Days or three, and then we for to have done our Homage and our Othes, and put Him as Highly in his Eſtate as ever He was; but forſouth (that is ſooth) there I knowlech that I did untruly, and unkindly as to Him, that is my Liege-Lord, and hath been ſo good and kind Lord to me, wherefore I beſeech to Him notwithſtanding myn unkindneſs evermore of His Mercy and of His Grace, as lowly as any Creature may beſeech it unto his Liege-Lord.

And as of any new thing or Ordenance, that ever I ſhould have witting or known, ordained or aſſentid, privy or appert, that ſhould have been againſt my Lord's Eſtate, or his Luſt (that is, Will) or any that longeth about Him, ſyth that Day, I Swore unto Him at Langely, on God's Body truly, and by that Oath that I there made, I never knew of gathering againſt Him, ne none other that longeth unto Him.

And as touching theſe Points, that I have made Confeſſion of to Sir William Rickhill Juſtice, in the which I wot well, that I have offended my Lord unkindly and untruly, as I have ſaid before, how that I have in all theſe Points offended Him, and done againſt Him, trewly and as I will Anſwer before God it was my meaning and my weaning (that is, thinking) to do the beſt for His Perſon and for His Eſtate; nevertheleſs I wot well, and know well nowe, that my Deeds and my workings were againſt my Intent; but by the way that my Soul ſhall too, of theſe Points and of all other the which that I have done of negligence and

And therefore I beſeech my Liege and Sovereign Lord the King, that He will of His Grace and Benignity accept me to His Mercy and His Grace, as I that put my Life, my Body, and my Goods, wholly at his Will, as lowly as meekly as any Creature can do or may do to his Liege Lord; beſeeching to His High Lordſhip, that He will for the Paſſion of Him that ſuffered for all Mankind, and the Compaſſion that He had for his Mother on the Croſſe, and the Pity that He had of Mary Magdalen, that He will vouchſafe for to have Compaſſion and Pitty, and to accept me to His Mercy, and to His Grace, as He that hath ever been full of Mercy and of Grace to all His Lieges, and to all other that have nought been ſo nigh unto Him as I have been, though I been unworthy.

Ib. At the deſire of the Appellants, Sir William Rickhill declares the manner of his taking the ſaid Duke's Confeſſion.

After this Return to the ſaid Commiſſion, and the late Duke's Confeſſion had been read, the Appellants prayed, that the ſaid William Rickhill, well approved for his Loyalty and Diſcretion, might be Commanded by the King upon his Ligeance, to declare the Truth touching this Commiſſion; who in the preſence of the King, the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons in Parliament, ſaid, and declared, that about eight of the Clock before Noon, he came within the Caſtle of Caleys to the Duke of Glouceſter, being then in good Memory, and out of Priſon, and ſhew'd him the Commiſſion, and the Cauſe of his coming to him, in the preſence of John Lancaſter, and John Lovetoft, and prayed him that what he had to ſay, he would put down in Writing, and then departed. Then returning to him about Nine of the Clock, in the Afternoon the ſame day, the Duke read in Writing the ſaid Confeſſion with his own Mouth, and gave the ſame to William Rickhill with his own Hand. 'And further, William Rickhill 'ſaid to the Duke, if there were any thing more touching this Matter, 'he would ſpeak it in ſatisfaction to the King, for the knowledge of 'the whole Truth of the Matter; whereupon the Duke ſaid, he had 'forgot one thing that then came into his Memory, to wit, that he ſaid to the King, That if He would be King, He muſt not intercede for Sir Simon Burley to ſave him from Death; and prayed William Rickhill he would ſhew this to the King by word of Mouth.

This Duke's Character.

I ſuppoſe this Confeſſion was made but a few days before the Duke was Stifled to death at Calais, as you have already heard; for when they had extorted this Confeſſion from him, they thought it ſufficient thereupon to Attaint him of High Treaſon in Parliament, as now was done.

The Duke was one that ſtood up highly for the Liberties and Rights of the People, for which he was very much beloved by them; tho' it cannot be denied, but that he was one of too high and Turbulent a Temper, by which he ſo exaſperated the King his Nephew, that it gave occaſion to thoſe who hated the Duke, to contrive his Ruin, to which alſo the King too readily aſſented. But to proceed with the Record, and Proceſs againſt the reſt of theſe Noblemen.

Ib. The Earl of Warwick is brought in and tried for the ſame Crimes.

On Friday the 28*th* of September, the Conſtable of the Tower brought into the Parliament Thomas Earl of Warwick, who was preſently told by the Duke of Lancaſter, Steward of England, by Command from the King, and all the Lords Temporal, that he was Appealed by Edward Earl of Rutland, and the other Appellants there named, of divers High Treaſons, which were comprehended in two only Articles, Viz. That of Aſſembling with Force and Armed Men at Harringay, &c. and that Charge about Sir Simon Burley, and were drawn up in the ſame words, as in the Earl of Arundel's Caſe. To all which he Anſwer'd, That he well underſtood Thoſe Treaſons and Wicked Deeds, and that he was [1.] Guilty of them, and put himſelf into the King's Grace. Wherefore the Duke of Lancaſter, by Command of the King, all the Lords Temporal, and Sir Thomas Piercy, having Power as aforeſaid, Pronounced the very ſame Judgment againſt him in all things, as he had done againſt the Earl of Arundel; which the King moved with Pity, to the Reverence and Honour of God, at the Prayer of the Appellants, the Commons of Parliament, and the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, Remitted and Pardoned the ſaid Judgment, and [2.] granted him his Life; and his Sentence was, That he ſhould remain Priſoner in the Iſle of Man, as long as he lived; upon Condition, that if any means were made to the King, or His Heirs, for any further Favour, or if he ſhould make his Eſcape, then the Judgment ſhould be put in Execution, and the King's Grace ſhould be void.

[1.] The Earl confeſſing himſelf guilty, the ſame Judgment is given upon him, as upon the Earl of Arundel.

[2.] Yet the King grants him his Life, and he is order'd to perpetual Impriſonment in the Iſle of Man.

Then [3.] the Commons before the King in Parliament, affirmed all the ſaid Appeals to be good and Lawful; and further the Appellants Impeached Thomas Mortimer of The Treaſons compriſed in the ſame Appeal; but he being then in Ireland, fled unto the Mountains to the Iriſh Rebels. A Proclamation was thereupon order'd in Parliament to be made throughout Ireland, that he ſhould be brought into England within Three Months, to Anſwer to the Impeachment of the Commons, or elſe be declared a Traytor, and all his Mannors, Caſtles, Lands, Tenements, &c. which he was poſſeſſed of on the 13th of November, in the eleventh Year of the King, together with all his Goods and Chattels, ſhould be Forfeited to the King. Then the Appellants had time given them until the next Meeting of the Parliament, which was now Adjourned to the Quinden of St. Hillary, or 27th of January, to meet at Shrewsbury; but there the ſaid [4.] Thomas Mortimer not appearing, the Duke of Lancaſter, and all the Lords Temporal, and William le Scrope Earl of Wiltſhire, having ſufficient Power from the Prelates and Clergy, as appeared by Record in Parliament, by Aſſent of the King, gave Judgment againſt him, according to the Tenor of the ſaid Proclamation.

[3.] Ib. Thomas Mortimer is likewiſe Impeached, but being fled into Ireland, is Summon'd to appear within 3 Months.

[4.] Ib. N. But not Appearing, he is Attainted.

This I thought fit to inſert here, that I may not break the Thrid of this Relation, tho' it properly belongs to the Tranſactions at Shrewsbury, in the beginning of the next Year.

But before I proceed further, to Report what was done in the next Seſſion of this Parliament, at the Place laſt mention'd, I ſhall from the ſame Parliamen-tRoll give you the remainder of the Tranſactions of this preſent Seſſion at Weſtminſter.

After theſe ſevere Proceedings, [5.] the Commons interceded with the King for His Favour towards the Lords and Biſhops who were Named Commiſſioners in the former Commiſſion, in the Tenth Year of His Reign; but neither procured it, conſented to it, nor acted in the the Execution of it; Three whereof were yet alive, to wit, the Duke of York, the Biſhop of Winchester, and Richard le Scrope Knight; and Four dead, viz. William late Archbiſhop of Canterbury, Alexander late Archbiſhop of York, Thomas late Biſhop of Exeter, and Nicholas late Abbot of Waltham, whoſe Loyalty and Innocency was acknowledged in Parliament, and the Declaration thereof was made a Statute by the King, with the Advice and Aſſent of the Lords, at the Prayer of the Commons.

[1.] Ib. N. 27. They likewiſe intercede for the Earls of Derby and Nottingham, as having not conſented to the Treaſons of the Perſons Attainted.

They [1.] further humbly beſeeched the King that He would pleaſe to Conſider, how at the time when Thomas Duke of Glouceſter, Richard Earl of Arundel, and Thomas Earl of Warwick, did riſe in Arms againſt their Allegiance to the King; the ſaid Duke and Earls would have come and ſeized the Perſon of the King, with intent to have killed a great Number of His Lieges, and would have accompliſhed their wicked Purpoſe and Intent, if they had not been diſturbed by thoſe Honourable Perſons of the King's Blood, Henry of Lancaſter, Earl of Derby, and Thomas de Mowbray Earl of Nottingham, conceiving and underſtanding the Actions of the Duke and Earls to be Notoriouſly againſt their Allegiance, and the Eſtate of the King; and being willing to do their Duty to Him, departed from their Company, and came to the Preſence of the King; therefore that it would pleaſe Him, that ſince the Commons had ſpecially recommended the Perſons of the Earl of Derby and Nottingham to His Favour, openly to declare in this Parliament the Eſtate, Name, and good Fame, and the Loyal Behaviour of them the ſaid Earls. [2.] Whereupon the King ſitting in His Royal Throne in Parliament, anſwer'd, That this Matter was better known to Him than any other, and then witneſſed and declared the good Behaviour, Loyalty and Fame of the ſaid two Earls, and held them for His Loyal Subjects, and that they ſhould be reported and taken for ſuch throughout the Realm, and that they ſhould be excuſed without any Impeachment, Moleſtation, or Grievance, for the Cauſe aforeſaid, in any time to come. And further, that the King by Aſſent and Advice of all the Lords in Parliament, and at the Prayer of the Commons, Ordained and Eſtabliſhed, that this Declaration and Grant ſhould have the Force of, and be holden for a Statute; [3] and that all Judgments, Ordinances, Declarations, and Eſtabliſhments made in this Parliament, ſhall have the Force of Statutes.

[2.] Whereupon the K. in Parliament declares the ſaid Earls to be Innocent, and this Declaration is paſſed into a Statute.

[3.] Ib. N. 32. All Judgments given in this Parliament, to have the Force of Statutes.

[4.] Ib. A great Advancement of ſeveral Earls to the Titles of Dukes, and divers Lords made Earls.

As [4.] for other Tranſactions of leſs moment, we find that on Michaelmaſs-day, being Saturday, the King Created Henry Earl of Derby, Duke of Hereford, Edward Earl of Roteland, Duke of Albemarle, Thomas Holland Earl of Kent, Duke of Surrey, John Hollan Earl of Huntington, Duke of Exeter, (who were His Half-Brothers and Thomas Mowbray Earl of Nottingham, Duke of Norfolk; then the ſame day, John Beaufort was made Earl of Somerſet, and Created Marqueſs of Dorſet, Thomas Lord de Spencer Earl of Gloceſter, Ralp Nevil Earl of Weſtmoreland, Thomas Piercy Earl of Worceſter, and William le Scrope Earl of Wiltſhire: which was done the more cloſely to engage them to the King's Intereſt, and Arbitrary Deſigns. [5.] S the Parliament being Adjourned to the 27th of January, at Shrewſbury all things 'till then were to remain in the ſame State and Condition.

[5.] Ib. N. 36.

But to give you an account of ſome other Tranſactions of Moment after the Parliament was riſen.

Anno Dom. 1397.

Then [1.] the next day, being Sunday, the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, after Maſs was Celebrated in the Abbey-Church at Weſtminſter, before the Shrine of St. Edward, made Oath in the preſence of the King. And the then Prelates, that is to ſay, all the Biſhops there preſent, with ſeveral Mitred Abbots and Priors (for the Names of whom, I referr you to the Roll) took likewiſe the ſame Oath in the Form following.

[1.] Ib. N. 37. The Biſhops and Lords take an Oath to obſerve all the Statutes of this Parliament.

Ib. N. 38. The Form of the Oath taken by the Lords Spiritual, &c.

YOu ſhall Swear, that well and truly you ſhall hold, ſuſtain and maintain, without Fraud or Deceit, all the Statutes, Eſtabliſhments, Ordinances, or Judgments made or given in this Parliament, without doing any thing to the contrary of either of them, or the Dependencies on, or Parcel of them; nor that you will ever Repeal, Revoke, make Void, Reverſe, or Annull, nor ever ſuffer them to be Repealed, Revoked, Caſſated, made Void, Reverſed, or Annulled, ſo long as you live, ſaving to the King, His Royalty, Liberty, and the Right of His Crown.

So [2.] ſoon as they had thus Sworn, the Lords Temporal, viz. Seven Dukes, Eight Earls, and One and Twenty Barons (for whoſe Names likewiſe I refer you to the Record) alſo took the Oath in the Form following.

[2.] Ib.N. 39.

Ib. N. 40. The Form of the Oath taken by the Temporal Lords.

YOu ſhall Swear, that in the time to come, you ſhall never ſuffer any Man living to do any thing contrary to the Statutes, Eſtabliſhments, Ordinances and Judgments made or given in this preſent Parliament, nor to any Dependencies on, or Parcel of them; and if any one ſhall do ſo, and be duly Convicted, you ſhall uſe your entire Power and Diligence, without Fraud and Deceit, to Proſecute him before the King, and His Heirs, Kings of England, and cauſe him to have Execution as an High and Falſe Traytor to the King, and Kingdom; Saving to the King His Regalie, or Royalty, Liberty and Right of His Crown.

Then [3.] the King asked the Knights of Shires there preſent, (for it ſeems they were not yet gone home) Whether they would hold and keep the ſame Oath? who promiſed with one Voice they would, holding up their Hands on high, as a ſign of their Agreement to the ſaid Oaths.

[4.] Ib. N. 41.

And [4.] immediately after, Sir Thomas Piercy took the ſame Oath the Lords Temporal had made, for, and in the Name of the whole Clergy, as their Procurator-General, and by Authority above-ſaid. This done, the King, Prelates, and Lords Temporal, went from the Shrine of St. Edward, and came before the High Altar of the Church, and there for the better Eſtabliſhment and Affirmance of theſe things, the Prelates and Ordinaries of the Provinces of Canterbury and York, with one aſſent did pronounce the Sentence of the Greater Excommunication againſt all and every of the Subjects of both Provinces, that openly or privately, by Deed, Counſel, or Advice, ſhould contravene or do againſt any of the foreſaid Premiſes, the King's Royalty and Prerogative in all things ſaved.

But I ſhall now (before I diſmiſs the Tranſactions of this Seſſion of Parliament) give you a further Account of the Execution of the Earl of [1.] Arundel, who ſuffer'd the ſame day on which he received his Sentence; that part of it, concerning his being Drawn, Hang'd and Quarter'd, was remitted by the King, becauſe of his Quality; ſo his Head was ſtruck off near the Tower.

[1.] T. W. An account of the Execution of the Earl of Arundel.

[2.] His Character.

This [2.] Earl in all his Tryal, Condemnation and Execution was obſerved to ſhew a great deal of Reſolution, without the leaſt Symptom either of Guilt or Fear; but ſeeing the Earls of Nottingham and Kent (of whom the firſt was his Son-in-Law, and the ſecond His Nephew) to be very well pleaſed at his Execution, he calmly ſaid thus to them: Truly it might have became you, at leaſt, rather to have been Abſent; but the time will come e'er long, that as many ſhall marvel at your Misfortune, as they do now at mine.

But Froiſſart, I know not from what falſe information, makes the Earls of Warwick and Arundel to have been Beheaded by the King's ſole Command, without any Legal Proceſs; and that the Earl of Nottingham not only tyed a Cloath before the eyes of the latter, but alſo Executed him himſelf; a Fact, which our Hiſtorians are wholly ſilent in, and which indeed ſeems too Cruel and Barbarous to be done by any Man of Quality, much leſs by a Son-in-Law. But it is very probable what the ſame Author there further Relates, that the King was preſent at his Execution; tho' it was certainly an Act unworthy His Royal Dignity, and ſavoured too much of Perſonal Hatred and Revenge, &c. to feed his eyes with ſuch a diſmal Spectacle.

[3.] The Stories that were raiſed after his Death.

This Earl being a great Aſſertor of the People's Liberties, was highly beloved by the Commons. And [3.] Walſingham affirms, that the King was afterwards Haunted with an Apparition, or Imagination of his Ghoſt at leaſt, for He no ſooner cloſed His eyes to Sleep, but ſtrait He fancied Arundel ſtood before Him. And the more to diſturb Him, a Miracle was Reported, That his Head of it ſelf was grown to his Body; and this was aſſerted with ſo much Confidence, that the King cauſed his Tomb to be opened, to diſprove the Fiction. And underſtanding that ſtill the People went on Pilgrimage thither, as to the Shrine of a Saint, or Martyr, He cauſed the Auguſtin Fryars in London, amongſt whom he was Buried, to take down his Eſcutcheons, and abſcond his Grave, by laying a new Pavement over it.

[4.] Id ib. The ſubmiſſive Carriage of the Earl of Warwick ſav'd his Life.

But the [4.] ſame Author tells us, That Thomas Beauchamp Earl of Warwick, upon his Arraignment, did not carry himſelf with ſo much Courage and Reſolution, but confeſſed with Tears that he had been a Traytor in joyning with the Duke of Glouceſter, and the other Lords, by Acting againſt the King's Pleaſure. Wherefore the King out of Pity Pardon'd his Life, and he was Condemn'd to perpetual Impriſonment in the Iſle of Man, as has been already related. But as for the Lord Cobham, he was alſo Baniſh'd, tho' there was no new Matter againſt him, but only that he had been appointed by Parliament to be one of the Commiſſioners of Inſpection before-mention'd, in the Tenth Year of this Reign.

After [1.] theſe things were thus diſpatched, this Parliament being now made for the King's Purpoſe, was not Diſſolved (as Parliaments then uſually were) when the Buſineſs was over, but was further Prorogued, as has been already obſerved.

[1.] The Parliament made to the King's purpoſe.

In [2.] the beginning of this Year, on the 27*th* of January, the Parliament (according to the late Prorogation) met at Shrewsbury, which Place is ſuppos'd to have been pitch'd upon by the King, as being remote from London, and on the Borders of Wales, (a Country wholy devoted to Him) and ſo moſt proper for the carrying on the preſent Deſigns of the Court.

Anno Dom. 1398.

[2.] The Parliament meets at Shrewsbury, and the reaſon of their ſitting there.

On the Day of their Re-aſſembling, the [3.] Chancellor put them in mind that this Parliament was firſt Summon'd to Weſtminſter, for the Honour of God, and that Holy-Church might enjoy all Her Liberties and Franchiſes; and that all the Lords, Knights, Citizens, and Burgeſſes, might have and enjoy all their Liberties, and Franchiſes, as they reaſonably enjoy'd and uſed them in former times: Alſo that there might not be more Governours in the Kingdom than One; and that the Laws might be duly obey'd, and executed, as was more fully contain'd in the ſetting forth and declaring the Cauſe of this Parliament.

Rot. Parl. 21. Rich. 2. *N.*44.

[3.] The Chancellor declares the Cauſes of their meeting.

Alſo [4.] the Chancellor ſhewed to the Commons, that the King would be Inform'd by them how the Charge ſhould be born for the Defence of England, Ireland, Guyenne, the Marches of Calais, and alſo thoſe of Scotland, in caſe they kept not the Truce made for Four Years, which was to end at Michaelmaſs next coming.

[4.] Ib.

Then [5.] the Lords Appellants in this Parliament, viz. Edward Duke of Albemarl, Thomas Duke of Surrey, John Duke of Exeter, John Marqueſs of Dorſet, John Earl of Salisbury, Thomas Earl of Glouceſter, and William Earl of Wiltſhire, ſet forth to the King, that certain Lords lately Convict and Attainted, viz. the Duke of Glouceſter, the Earls of Arundel and Warwick, by Coertion and Compulſion had made Him Summon a Parliament at Weſtminſter, on the Morrow after Candlemaſs, in the eleventh Year of His Reign; and then were particularly recited all the Queſtions and Anſwers formerly put to, and made by Sir Robert Treſilian Chief Juſtice, with the other Judges, and King's Serjeant at Nottingham (as are already recited) in the ſaid eleventh Year; and then by the Aſſent of the King, the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and at the Requeſt of the Commons, the ſaid Anſwers were confirmed to be good in Law, and the whole Proceedings of the Parliament held in His eleventh Year, declared to be null and void.

[5.] *Ib. N.*47. The Lords Appellants deſire that all the Proceedings againſt the Anſwers of the Judges in the 11*th* Year, ſhould be declared void, which is done accordingly.

But ſince theſe Proceedings are more largely recited in the [6.] Parliament-Roll, than in the Printed Statute-Books (which are there very ſhort) I ſhall from the former, give you the whole Proceſs and manner of doing it.

[6.] *Ib. N.*44.

After [7.] the Reading the ſaid Queſtions and Anſwers, as well before the King and Lords, as Commons, all the Eſtates of Parliament were ſeverally asked what they thought of thoſe Anſwers? And they ſaid, they thought the Juſtices had made and given their Anſwers duly and Lawfully, as good and Liege People of the King ought to do; and Sir Thomas Skelton Learned in the Law, William Hankeford, and [7.] Ibidem. The Proceſs and manner of the Proceedings of the 11*th* year declared null, and void.

Anno Dom. 1398.

and William Brenchly, the Kings Serjeants, ſaid the Anſwers were good and Lawful, and that if the ſame Queſtions had been put to them, they would have given the ſame. William Thirning Chief Juſtice of the Common Bench, ſaid, the Declaration of Treaſon not declared, belonged to the Parliament; but were he a Lord or Peer of Parliament, and had been asked, he would have ſaid in the ſame manner. So likewiſe William Rikhyll a Juſtice of the Common-Pleas, and Sir Walter Clopton Chief Juſtice of the King's Bench anſwer'd and affirm'd the ſame things; wherefore the former Anſwers of the Judges in the eleventh Year were judged and held to be good and ſufficient in this Parliament.

[1.] Ibidem. The Parliament is now declared to be null and void.

Whereupon [1.] by Aſſent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, the Procurators of the Clergy, and Commons, by Advice of the Juſtices and Serjeants aforeſaid there preſent, it was Judged, Ordained and Eſtabliſhed, that the Parliament holden in the ſaid eleventh Year, ſhall be clearly annulled, and holden for none, as being done without Authority, and againſt the Will and Liberty of the King, and the Right of His Crown; and that all the Judgments, Statutes and Ordinances made in the ſame, with all things depending upon them, ſhall be revoked, and annulled, reverſed, and repealed, and holden for none; and that all Lands, Tenements, Fees, Advouſons, and other Poſſeſſions, ſeized as Forfeit by Colour of the ſaid Judgment, ſhall be reſtored and deliver'd to them, who were Condemn'd, or put out, or elſe to their Heirs, and to them that have any Cauſe of Action, or Title of Right, with all manner of Liberties or Franchiſes, as they had at any time, with Reſtitution of Goods and Chattels.

[2.] Ib. N. 51. The Speaker of the Commons deſires ſome further ſecurity for the maintaining the ordinances and Judgments of this preſent Parliament.

On [2.] Wedneſday the third day of their Meeting, John Buſſy the Speaker alledged, that before that time many Ordinances and Statutes made in divers Parliamenrs had been reverſed by diverſity of Opinions, and other Reaſons and Subtilties, and on behalf of the Commons, prayed the King, that the greateſt Security that could be given, might be taken for the not undoing the Ordinances and Judgments made in this Parliament. Whereupon the King charged all the Eſtates in Parliament to give Him their Advice, for the beſt and moſt firm Security in this Caſe. The Lords Spiritual and Temporal Anſwer'd, That they had Sworn before to hold and keep the ſaid Judgments, Eſtabliſhments, and Statutes, which they would maintain with all their power, as much as in them lay. The King alſo demanded of the Juſtices and Serjeants, if they knew any other more ſecure way for the keeping and obſerving of the ſaid Ordinances and Judgments? Who Anſwer'd, the greateſt Security that could be, was already eſtabliſh'd by Parliament; and then the Lords Temporal and Spiritual renewed their Oaths before the King in Parliament, upon the Croſs of Canterbury, and alſo the greateſt part of the Commons held up their Hands in Affirmance of the ſaid Oaths, as did likewiſe the Proctors of the Clergy, and the Knights about the King; and after Proclamation had been made in Audience of all the People, to know if they would conſent to this manner of Security? They Anſwer'd, lifting up their Hands on high, and crying with loud Voices, that it pleaſed them well, and they fully conſented thereunto.

Anno Dom. 1398.

[1.] Ib. N. 55. to N. 66.

As [1.] for Private Buſineſs in this Seſſion of Parliament, Thomas le Deſpenſer Petition'd the King in full Parliament, wherein he recites the Petitions of Hugh the Father, and Hugh the Son, (his Grandfather and Great Grandfather) made to the King in a Parliament holden at York three Weeks after Eaſter, in the Fifteenth Year of Edward II.

In which Parliament, the Exile and Diſheriſon of both thoſe Earls were annulled for theſe Reaſons. Firſt, Becauſe they were not Appealed or called to Anſwer, nor due Proceſs made againſt them according to Law. Secondly, Becauſe the Prelates, who were Peers of the Realm did not conſent to the ſaid Exile and Diſheriſon. Thirdly, Becauſe it was againſt Magna Charta that any Man ſhould be Exiled, or Tryed, or otherwiſe Deſtroyed without Judgment of his Peers. And whereas this Adnullation was afterwards made void in the 1ſt of Edward III. they pray that that Statute may be reverſed, and all the Articles and things contain'd in it, for the Reaſons aboveſaid; and it was reverſed and made void accordingly; not only for the Cauſes before expreſs'd, but alſo conſidering that the Repeal made by King Edward III. was at ſuch time as his Father Edward II. was living, being very King, and in Priſon, ſo that He could not reſiſt the ſame.

The Record of this Matter is long, and alſo the Proceedings againſt the two Spencers in the 14th and 15th of Edward II, and the Statute of the firſt of Edward III. are alſo there recited, which you may ſee in thoſe Years; but all theſe Proceedings were again reverſed in the firſt Parliament of King Henry the Fourth; ſo that there can nothing be concluded from the Precedents of theſe two Parliaments, as well as ſome others, but that they have for the moſt part Voted according to the preſent Ruling Temper of the Nation, or the Inclination of the Prince that called them.

[2] Ib. N. 67.

On [2.] Thurſday the laſt Day of the Parliament, the Duke of Hereford in full Parliament, humbly kneeled before the King, and ſpoke thus to Him. My Liege Lord, I know well that many Riots, Diſturbances and Evil Deeds have been made and done within Your Kingdom, to the Offence of You and Your Royal Eſtate, in the which I my ſelf was preſent, amongſt others, not with an ill intent or purpoſe to offend You, not knowing then it was any Fault or Offence againſt You. But Sir, ſince I now know well, and confeſs my Offences, in ſo doing, I beg Your Mercy and Pardon; whereupon the King graciouſly accepted the humble Prayer and Confeſſion of the Duke, and granted him Pardon in full Parliament, for whatever he had done in the things aboveſaid, and what he deſerved for the ſame; and further, the King promiſed him to be his good Lord, and this He declared to all the Eſtates in Parliament, how He had given him full Pardon for the Matters aforeſaid.

[3.] Ib. N. 75.

The [3.] Commons on the ſame day, by aſſent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal granted to the King the Subſidy of Wooll, Leather, and Woolfells for His Life, and one Tenth and Fifteenth, and half a Tenth and Fifteenth, which was more than ever they had given to His Grandfather.

[4.] Ib. 76.

Upon [4.] which Grants, the Commons prayed the King to beſtow three or four Thouſand Marks on thoſe that had been plunder'd at Radcot-Bridge, and to pay the Lords Appellants their Expences, which was granted.

Anno Dom. 1398.

[1.] Ib. N. 77. And [1.] then the ſame day follow'd a General Pardon for all things done before that time, which was Thurſday the laſt of January, and the laſt day of this Parliament; yet with this Proviſo, that they who rode and gathered themſelves forcibly againſt the King in the eleventh Year of His Reign, with the Lords ſince Convict and Condemned, ſhould have no benefit of the Pardon, if they ſued not forth their Charters between that and Midſummer next enſuing.

[2.] Ib. 78. After [2.] the Grant of this Pardon, the King by his own Mouth declared, That if the Lords and Commons, who in time to come ſhall ſit in Parliament, ſhall let or any ways diſturb Him in the Collection of the ſaid Impoſts on Wooll, Leather, and Woolfells, ſo granted as above, their proceedings ſhall be void.

[3.] Ib. N. 74. Vid. Stat. at large, 21 Rich. 2. C. 16. Alſo [3.] the ſame Thurſday (the laſt day of the Parliament) the Commons prayed the King, that whereas they had before them divers Petitions, as well for ſpecial Perſons, as others not Read and Anſwer'd, and alſo many other Matters and things had been moved in the preſence of the King, which for ſhortneſs of time could not be well determined, it would pleaſe Him to commit full power to certain Lords, [and Others, there named, to Examine, Anſwer and Diſpatch the Petitions, Matters and Things above-ſaid, and all Dependencies on them, to which Prayer the King Aſſented; and thereupon by Authority and Aſſent of Parliament, it was Ordain'd, that John Duke of Lancaſter, Edmund Duke of York, Edward Duke of Albemarl, Thomas Duke of Surrey, John Duke of Exeter, John Marqueſs of Dorſet, Roger Earl of Marche, John Earl of Saliſbury, Henry Earl of Northumberland, Thomas Earl of Glouceſter, Thomas Earl of Wincheſter, and William Earl of Wiltſhire, or any ſix of them; together with John B Buſſey, Henry Green, John Ruſſel, Henry Chelmſwike, Robert Tey, and John Goloſre Knights, coming for the Commons of the Kingdom to that Parliament, or any Three of them, ſhall have full power to Examine, Anſwer, and fully Determine all the ſaid Petitions, and the Contents of them; as alſo all other Matters and Things moved in the preſence of the King, and all other Dependencies upon them, not determined, as they ſhall think beſt by their Good Advice and Diſcretion in this behalf, and then the Parliament was Diſſolved. By which Act, the whole Power and Authority of the Kingdom was now devolved upon the King, Twelve Peers, and Six Commoners, and how Arbitrarily they exerciſed it, you will ſee hereafter.

I cannot but add from our [4.] Hiſtorian, that in the beginning [4.] T. W. of this Parliament, divers Noblemen were Advanced to higher Titles (as has been already related from the Record) ſo that there were now no leſs than Five New Dukes, and One Marqueſs, (the firſt of that Title) Created; which much leſſen'd the value of thoſe Titles; but the King to enable them the better to maintain their New Dignities, made a large diſtribution of the greater part of the Lands of the late Duke of Glouceſter, and of the Earls of Arundel and Warwick, to theſe new Created Dukes and Marqueſs, hoping thereby to have tied them to Him by a double Obligation of Duty and Affection; not conſidering that ſuch bought Friends are ſeldom either well ſatisfied, or ſure in time of need.

Anno Dom. 1398.

Furthermore, [1.] to gratifie the Cheſhire-Men, who had chiefly aſſiſted Him and His late Favourites, He Honour'd that Country with the Name and Dignity of a Principality, and added to the reſt of His own Titles, that of Prince of Cheſter; and then He alſo added to His Coat of Arms, the ſuppos'd Bearing of Edward the Confeſſor.

[1.] The King to gratifie the Cheſhire Men, takes the Title of Prince of Cheſter.

But tho' a General Pardon was Granted for all paſt Offences to all the King's Subjects, but clog'd with a ſtrange Clauſe of Exception, exempting Fifty Perſons in number from the benefit thereof, whoſe Names were not expreſſed, but left to the King's own Knowledge and Pleaſure; to the end, that if any of the Nobility ſhould happen any way to offend Him, He might nominate him among the number excepted, and ſo ſtill keep them within his danger; by which Reſervation, the General Pardon became as good as no Pardon at all; ſince ſcarce any Man in England could aſſure himſelf that he was included in it; and ſo this Parliament ended, tho' not the power of it,

He grants a general Pardon yet excepts fifty Persons not named.

Laſtly, to add the greater ſtrength and Reverence to the Acts and Proceedings of this Parliament, [2.] King Richard procured ſome time after the Pope's Bull, containing grievous Cenſures and Curſes upon all that ſhould preſume to break or oppoſe them, which was ſolemnly Publiſhed at Paul's Croſs, and other Places throughout England. But this, as well as the Oaths that had been taken by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, to obſerve what had been lately Ordained, ſignified nothing at all, when the General Bent and Humour of the Nation, by reaſon of the Common Grievances and Oppreſſions, made them run another way, as you will find hereafter.

[2.] Id ib.

But for the preſent, all things ſeem'd to concur with the King's Deſigns, the Heads of the Party who had ſo long oppos'd Him being cut off, and the [3.] Nobility thereby either terrified, or Bribed by Honours or Eſtates, and the Commons unable to expreſs their Reſentments otherwiſe than in Sighs, Murmurs, and Complaints, the King's Great Officers of State, nay His very Parliaments being now Model'd according to His pleaſure, ſo that no King ſince the Conqueſt having been more Abſolute than He was now, He no doubt ſuppoſed Himſelf in a Condition moſt Secure and Happy; but there is an over-ruling Providence that blaſts the moſt deep laid Projects and Deſigns, when not founded on the ſure Grounds of Equity, and the Publick Good, as the Event will declare; and we ſhall find in a little time, how this King by unexpected Means, and unlikely Inſtruments, was embroil'd more than ever, and left ſo deſtitute of Power, and Friends, as to be forced, without ſtriking one Blow, to Surrender His Crown; and (which was yet more grievous to a Generous Mind) to acknowledge Himſelf both unworthy and unfit to wear it any longer.

[3.] The ſad Condition of the Nation by reaſon of the Arbitrary Power of the King, who now thought Himſelf ſecure.

But to ſhew you the grounds and occaſions of this great Revolution, it proceeded from a [4.] Quarrel that aroſe before the Parliament broke up, between the Dukes of Hereford, and Norfolk, from the former's accuſing of the latter of certain words ſpoken between them two againſt the King's Perſon, and Government; for which, I refer you to the [5.] Pleas of the Crown in Parliament this Year, wherein are recited all the Circumſtances relating to this great Affair, and the Proceedings thereupon, Viz.

[4.] The great Revolution of the King's Affairs, that proceeded from the Quarrel between the Dukes of Hereford, and Norfolk.

Anno Dom. 1398.

[1.] The whole Proceedings in this Affair related from the Record.

That [1.] on Wedneſday the 30*th* of January, (being the day before the Parliament ended, Henry of Lancaſter, Duke of Hereford came before the King with a Schedule in his hand, and ſaid thus: That he had already come by His Command into His preſence at Haywode, where he had informed Him that Thomas Mowbray Duke of Norfolk, had ſpoken many diſhoneſt words in ſlander of His Royal Perſon, and that they were ſpoken to him the Duke, and that then the King Charged him upon his Allegiance, that he ſhould truly repeat the words as they were ſpoken. Upon this, the Duke of Hereford, not thro' Malice, or any other Cauſe, but only to obey the King's Command, as he was bound, had now ſet down in Writing the words which the Duke of Norfolk ſpake to him, as before he had conceived and born them in his memory, and were in this Schedule, which he deliver'd to the King, with Proteſtation to add to or diminiſh therefrom at all times, and when he pleaſed, as it ſhould be needful, Saving always the Subſtance of the preſent Schedule, which was to this effect.

That in the Month of December, in the Twenty firſt Year of Your Reign, the Duke of Hereford Travelling between Brainford, and London, met the Duke of Norfolk with a great Train, and Diſcourſed with him of divers Matters, amongſt which, he told him, they were all ready to be undone, and the Duke of Hereford demanded why? he anſwer'd, for the Fact at [2.] Radcot-Bridge; the Duke of Hereford ſaid, how can that be? for the King hath ſhewn us Favour, and declared us in Parliament to have been Good and Loyal towards Him. The Duke of Norfolk anſwer'd, notwithſtanding that, it will be done to us, as has been done to others before, for He will vacate this Record. The Duke of Hereford Reply'd, this would be a great wonder, ſince the King had ſaid it before all the People, that He ſhould afterwards make it be Anulled. And further, the Duke of Norfolk *ſaid, this was a marvellous World, and unſafe, for I know well, ſaid he, that if * my Lord, your Father and You had been taken, or killed, when you came to* Windſor, after the Parliament was up; that the Dukes of Albemarl, and Exeter, the Earl of Worceſter, and himſelf, were agreed never to undo any Lord without juſt and reaſonable Cauſe, and that the malice of this Fact was in the Duke of Surrey, with the Earls of Wiltſhire, and Saliſbury, drawing to them the Earl of Glouceſter, who had Sworn to undo Six other Lords, that is to ſay, the Dukes of Lancaſter, Hereford, Albemarl, and Exeter, with the Marqueſs of Dorſet, and himſelf. He alſo ſaid, they purpoſed to Reverſe the Judgment of Earl Thomas of Lancaſter, and hereby we and many others ſhould be Diſinherited. The Duke of Hereford ſaid, God forbid, for it would be a great wonder if the King ſhould Aſſent to this, for it was with a Chearful Countenance, that He promiſed to be a good Lord to them, and others, and alſo that he knew He had Sworn it by St. Edward; and the Duke of Norfolk anſwer'd, He had done the ſame to him many times, and Sworn by the Body of God, and that for all this He was never the more to be truſted; and further ſaid to the Duke of Hereford, that the King was about to draw the Earl of Marche and others to the ſame Agreement and Purpoſe of the ſaid Four Lords to deſtroy the reſt aforeſaid. The Duke of Hereford Reply'd, if it be ſo, we can never truſt them. The Duke of Norfolk return'd, for certain

Anno Dom. 1398.

This [1.] Schedule being Read before the King, and Lords, on Thurſday the 31*ſt* of January, (and laſt day of the Parliament) it was then Ordain'd by Him, with the Aſſent of all the Eſtates in Parliament, that the Matters therein comprized, ſhould be determined, and ended, by the good Advice and Diſcretion of the King, and the Commiſſioners already aſſigned by Authority of Parliament, to wit, the Dukes of Lancaſter, York, Albemarl, Surrey, and Exeter; the Marqueſs of Dorſet, the Earl of Marche, Sarum, Northumberland, and Glouceſter, or Six of them, with the Earls of Worceſter, and Wiltſhire, as Procurators of the Clergy, or one of them; John Buſſy, Henry Grene, John Ruſſel, Robert Tey, Richard Chelmeſwyck and John Golofree, Knights of the Parliament, or any Four, or Three of them.

[1.] The Schedule being read before the K. add the Lords, the Matter is refer'd to thoſe to whom the Power of the Parliament was committed.

By which Narrative from the Record, that Error of Polydore Virgil may be confuted, who makes the Duke of Norfolk to have firſt accuſed the Duke of Hereford, when it was the direct contrary way.✗

✗ as appears ~~upon~~ by a [illegible] [illegible] on the [illegible] Rolls. ~~whereby~~ where by a Writ directed to the Sheriffs of London and Middlesex [illegible] [illegible] Shrewsbury the 4th of Feb. they [illegible] commanded to make proclamation that Thomas Duke of Norfolk appear before the King within 15 days after the sd. proclamation made there to answer to such treasons ~~as than~~ and other misprisions as whereof he stands impeached by [illegible] of ~~Derby~~ Hereford, & to make returne of the sd. Proclamation into Chancery. Rot: Claus. 21. R. 2. m. 20 d. [illegible] p. 92.

But to return again to the Record, after the Parliament was ended, both the Dukes appeared before the King at Oſwaldſtrie on the 22*d* of February, when a further day was Aſſign'd to meet them at Windſor, viz. on Sunday the 28*th* of April. In [2.] the mean while, it was adviſ'd and agreed by the King, and all the Lords and Knights aboveſaid, on the 19*th* of March, that the determination of this Difference ſhould be according to the Law of Chivalry, if other ſufficient Evidence or Proofs could not be found for the ending of it by ordinary courſe of Law; but no further Proofs being produced by either of the Parties, who now appeared on the Day prefixed, at the Place laſt mention'd, to receive the King's Judgment therein. Hereupon, according to the late Reſolution at Owaldſtrie, He Ordain'd, that ſince other ſufficient Proofs could not be found for determining this Difference; &c. it ſhould be decided by ſingle Combat at Coventry. So on Monday the 29*th* of the ſaid Month of April, they both appearing again before the King, Battle or Duel was appointed between them, according to the Advice and Opinion of the Dukes, Earls, Barons, Bannerets, &c. there in great numbers Aſſembled for this Cauſe, together with all thoſe that had the Authority of Parliament committed to them, where the former Judgment of the King, and His Council, was again confirmed.

[2.] For want of other Proofs, the King orders that the deciſion of this Quarrel, ſhall be by Combat.

But [3.] to leave the Record for a time, it may not be an unpleaſant digreſſion to the Reader to relate the Chief Circumſtances of this Combat between theſe two powerful Peers, ſince it will ſhew us the great State and Formality that was then uſed in that Antient way of Tryal by Battle. The King and all the Lords being now arrived at Coventry, each of the Lords who were to be the Combatants, being Attended with a Splendid and Numerous Retinue, appeared on the Day appointed; the Duke of Albemarl was pro Tempore made High-Conſtable, and the Duke of Surrey Lord-Marſhal, who came to the Liſts moſt Honourably waited on by many Followers in Rich Liveries, ſuitable to the Greatneſs of their Qualities, each of their Servants carrying Tipſtaves for clearing the Field. There the Duke of Hereford

Also that I find happend before the intended combate was, that both these Dukes were ordered to be committed prisoners, Hereford in Windsor Castle and to be safely kept by the Constable, as appears by the Kings writ to him for yt purpose. as Challenger, firſt Mounted on a White Courſer, in Capariſons of Green and Blew Velvet, Embroider'd thick with Swans and Antelopes, Armed Cap-a-pee, with his Sword drawn, approached the Liſts, of whom, the Marſhal, demanding who he was, receiv'd this Anſwer. I am Henry of Lancaſter Duke of Hereford, that am come hither to my Devoir, againſt Thomas Mowbray Duke of Norfolk, as a falſe Traytor to God, the King, the Realm, and me; and then taking his Oath that this Quarrel was true and juſt, deſired Leave to enter the Liſts; which being granted, he put up his Sword, pulled down his Beaver, Sign'd himſelf on the Forehead with the Croſs, took his Spear, and paſſing the Barriers, diſmounted, and ſat down in a Chair of Green Velvet, placed in a Travers of Green and Blew Velvet at one end of the Liſts.

Then King Richard enter'd the Field with great Pomp, accompanied with the Earl of St. Paul, who came out of France on purpoſe to be a Spectator of this Combat; and attended with moſt of the Nobles of England, and a Guard of Ten Thouſand Men in Arms, to prevent any ſudden Tumult or Diſorder. His Majeſty being Seated in a Chair of State, one of the Kings at Arms made Proclamation, that none but ſuch as were appointed to Marſhal the Field, ſhould touch any part of the Liſts upon pain of death; which being ended, another Herauld Proclaim'd, Behold Here Henry of Lancaſter Duke of Hereford, Appellant, who is entred into the Liſts, to do his Devoir againſt Thomas Mowbray Duke of Norfolk, upon pain of being counted Falſe and Recreant.

Immediately upon this, appeared the Duke of Norfolk, bravely Mounted, his Horſe Barbed with Crimſon Velvet, Embroyder'd with Lyons of Silver, and Mulbery-Trees proper, and having taken the like Oath before the Conſtable, and Marſhal, that his Quarrel was Right and Juſt, he entered the Field, crying aloud, God Aid the Right; and then lighting from his Horſe, plac'd himſelf in a Chair of Crimſon Velvet, oppoſite to his Antagoniſt, at the other end of the Liſts; the Marſhal viewed their Spears, to ſee that they were of equal length, and then he deliver'd one of them to the Duke of Hereford, and ſent the other by a Knight to the Duke of Norfolk. This done, Proclamation was made for them to prepare for the Combat. Upon which, the Dukes inſtantly mounted their Horſes, cloſed their Beavers, caſting their Spears into their Reſts, and then the Trumpets ſounding, the Duke of Hereford Spur'd his Horſe forward, but before he of Norfolk could advance, the King caſt down His Warder, and the [1.] Heralds cried, ſtay, ſtay. Then the King cauſing their Spears to be taken from them, they returned to their Chairs, whilſt He retired to Council, to Debate what was fit to be done in ſo weighty a Cauſe. Where after two Hours Debate, their Doom was agreed upon without Fighting; and one Sir John Bouray, by the King's Command, after Silence was made, read their Sentence, which was thus. That foraſmuch as the Dukes Appellant, and Defendant, had Honourably appear'd in the Liſt-Royal, and were not only ready, but forward to entertain the Combat, therefore it being an Affair of great Conſequence, for avoiding the effuſion of Chriſtian Blood, the King by the Advice of His Council had decreed, that Henry Duke of Hereford ſhould within

[1.] The King ſtops the Combate, and taking the Matter into his own hands, orders them both to be Baniſh'd.

Fifteen days depart the Realm, not to return within the ſpace of Ten Years, on pain of death, without the King's Special Licenſe. And after a Second Proclamation, Sentence of Baniſhment was alſo read againſt the Duke of Norfolk, but with theſe ſeveral Aggravations. Firſt, That the ſame was for Life; Secondly, That the Cauſe thereof was expreſſed to be, for having uttered Seditious Words, whereof he could not clear himſelf; and Thirdly, it was added, as part of his further Puniſhment, that the King ſhould receive the Revenues of His Lands, until He were ſatisfied all ſuch Sums of Money, as the ſaid Duke had taken out of the King's Coffers, on pretence of Paying the Gariſon of Calais.

Then [1.] another Proclamation was made, that no Perſon from thenceforth ſhould preſume to Petition or Intercede with the King on the behalf of either of the ſaid Dukes, to alter this Sentence, on pain of His Majeſtie's high diſpleaſure; which being ſo declared, the King called them both before Him, and took of them a Solemn Oath, that they ſhould never Converſe together beyond the Seas, nor willingly come into each other's Company. This is the Account our Hiſtorians give of the Iſſue of this Affair.

[1.] No Perſon to intercede with the King in their Favour.

But the [2.] Record above cited is very ſhort in the Relation of it; and only ſets forth, that the King of His eſpecial Grace, and as his Rightful and Sovereign Lord, took the Battel into his own hands, and by full Advice, Authority and Aſſent of Parliament (that is, of the Committee of Lords and Commons, to whom their Power was then devolved) Ordain'd and Adjudged for the Peace and Tranquility of Him, His Kingdom, and Subjects, and to eſchew Debates and Troubles, particularly between the ſaid Dukes, their Friends, and Well-willers, that the Duke of Hereford ſhould leave the Kingdom for Ten Years, and be gone within eight days after the Feaſt of St. Edward the Confeſſor, or 13*th* of October, upon pain of incurring Treaſon by Authority of Parliament. It was alſo Ordain'd by the ſaid Authority, that the Duke of Hereford ſhould not come into the Company of Thomas Duke of Norfolk, nor of Thomas Arundel late Archbiſhop, nor ſend nor cauſe to be ſent, nor receive nor cauſe to be received, any Meſſage, or other thing to or from either of them.

[2.] Placit. Coron. in Parl. Ib.

Then follows alſo the reſt of the Proceedings againſt the Duke of Norfolk, whereby we may judge of the [3.] Reaſons why the Sentence was more ſevere upon him than the Duke of Hereford, (tho' certainly one of theſe Judgments muſt have been unjuſt) for it was then declared to the ſaid Duke, That foraſmuch as on the 29*th* of April, at Windſor, in the Twenty firſt Year of the King, he had Confeſſed certain Points of the Appeal or Schedule aboveſaid, which he had denied at Oſwaldſtre on the 23*d* of February before, which were very likely to have bred great Troubles in the Realm, therefore the King deſiring as a Juſt and Rightful Lord, to Puniſh all ſuch as were the Authors of ſuch Troubles and Debates; and alſo willing to avoid the Occaſions of them, Adjudged and Ordained by the ſame Advice, Authority and Aſſent of Parliament, that Thomas Mowbray Duke of Norfolk ſhould avoid His Realm for term of Life, and that he ſhould depart out of the Kingdom by the 20*th* of October next coming, and remain either in Bohemia, Germany, Hungary, or in ſome other parts of Chriſtendom, upon pain to incur Treaſon by Authority aforeſaid. [1.] He was alſo upon the like Penalty not to come into the Company of the Duke of Hereford, or of Thomas Arundel (late Archbiſhop of Canterbury) nor hold any Correſpondence with him; which is expreſſed in the ſame manner as the Prohibition to the Duke of Hereford, already mention'd.

[2.] Ib. If either of the Dukes procure any thing to be done againſt the late Ordinances of Parliament, they are to be guilty of Treaſon.

And [2.] it was further Ordained by Authority of Parliament, as aboveſaid, that if either of the Dukes, or any other, do procure any thing to be done againſt the leaſt Point in the Ordinance, or what was done on the 16*th* of September, ſhall incur the pain of Treaſon, as if it had been done againſt any Ordinance of the Parliament began at Weſtminſter, and Adjourned to Shrewsbury; or if they, or any other for them, ſhould ſeek for any manner of Pardon, or Licenſe to return home, they were to incur the ſame Pain, by the ſame Authority.

[3.] Ib. The King, Lords, and the Commiſſioners of the Parliament, make new Ordinances for the obſervation of thoſe already made.

[4.] Vid. Stat. at large, 21 Rich. 2. Chap. 16, 17, 18, 19, 20.

Then [3.] follows in the ſame Record, the reſt of the Proceedings of this Committee of Parliament, which were very High and Arbitrary, viz. That on Tueſday the Morrow after the Feaſt of St. Edward, being the 14*th* of October next following, the King, with the Dukes of Lancaſter, York, Albemarl, Surrey, and Exeter; the Marqueſs of Dorſet, the Earls of Marche, Saliſbury, and Glouceſter; John Buſſy, Henry Green, and John Ruſſel Knights, being again Aſſembled, by Vertue and Authority to them committed in Parliament at Shrewsbury, made certain [4.] Ordinances and Statutes, Five whereof are Printed in the Statutes at Large, the laſt whereof relating only to our purpoſe, and varying ſomewhat from the Roll, I have here added to it what was wanting, viz. That the King on the Thurſday laſt mention'd, by the ſame Aſſent of the Lords, and Knights of Counties, ſo Aſſigned by the ſame Authority of Parliament, doth Ordain that every Perſon that procureth or endeavours to Repeal or Reverſe any of the Statutes or Ordinances made by the King, with the Aſſent of the ſaid Lords and Knights ſo Aſſigned as aboveſaid, and that being duly proved in Parliament, ſhall be Adjudged, and have Execution as a Traytor to the Kingdom, in like manner as they which perſue or procure to be Repealed the Statutes and Ordinances made during the time of the ſaid Parliament.

After this Proviſion was made for the ſure keeping of the Statutes and Ordinances Enacted by the King, with the Aſſent of the Lords and Knights Aſſigned by Power and Authority of Parliament, the Oath of the Biſhops, when they received their Temporalities, as alſo of the Temporal Lords, when they had Livery of their Lands and Tenements, were enlarged, with theſe Additions. That of the Biſhops was as follows.

Ib. N. 85. All Biſhops when they ſhall receive their Temporalites, and Lords, when they have Livery of their Lands, are enjoyn'd to take an Oath to obſerve all the Statutes of the laſt Parliament.

You ſhall Swear, that well and truly you ſhall hold, maintain, and ſtand to, without Fraud or Deceit, all the Statutes, Eſtabliſhments, Ordinances, or Judgments made and rendred in the Parliament Summon'd and Begun at Weſtminſter, on the Monday next after the Exaltation of Holy Croſs, in the Year of the Reign of our Lord King Richard II. after the Conqueſt Twenty One, and from thence Adjourned to Shrewsbury, to the Quindene or Fifteenth Day after

St. Hillary then next coming, and there ended. And alſo all the Statutes and Ordinances made after the ſaid Parliament by the King, and Lords, and Knights of Shires, coming for the Commons to that Parliament, without going or doing to the contrary of any of them, or the Dependants on, or Parcel of them; nor that you will ever Repeal, Revoke, make Void, Reverſe, or Annull, nor ever ſuffer them to be Repealed, Revoked, Caſſated, made Void, Reverſed, or Annulled, ſo long as you live, ſaving to the King, His Regalty, Liberty, and Right of His Crown.

Anno Dom. 1398.

To the Oath of the Temporal Lords, was this further Addition, Viz.

Ib. N. 87. An Addition to the Oath taken by the Temporal Lords.

You ſhall Swear, that you will never ſuffer in time to come, any Man living to do any thing contrary to any of the Statutes, Eſtabliſhments, Ordinances and Judgments aboveſaid, nor any Dependents on, or Part of them. And if any one ſhall ſo do, and be thereof duly Convict, you ſhall uſe your utmoſt Power and Diligence, without Fraud or Deceit, to Proſecute him before the King, and His Heirs, Kings of England, and cauſe him to have Execution, as an High Traytor to the King, and Kingdom; Saving to the King His Regaltie, Liberty and Right of His Crown.

I have no more at preſent to add concerning the Two Unfortunate Great Men above-mention'd, but only that the Duke of Norfolk not long after in great grief and diſcontent went into Germany, and from thence to Venice, where in a ſhort time he died, unlamented by any either at Home or Abroad, leaving the Character of a Cruel, Falſe and Unconſtant Perſon.

And [1.] it is very obſervable, that the Sentence of his Baniſhment was Pronounced on the very day Twelvemonth on which the Duke of Glouceſter had by his Order been Murthred at Calais; ſo juſt ſometimes is the Divine Vengeance, not only in Revenging ill Actions, but cauſing the Puniſhment to be attended with ſuch Circumſtances as may make the World take notice of it.

[1.] T. W. An obſervable Judgment upon him.

The Duke of Hereford, at his taking leave of the King at Eltham, behav'd himſelf ſo Reſpectfully, and bore his Sentence with ſo much Unconcernedneſs, that His Majeſty was then pleaſed to declare, He would abate Four Years of his Exile; yet could not that pacifie the Murmurs of the People, who could not be perſwaded that there was any juſt Cauſe for his being Baniſh'd at all; Exclaiming, That it was againſt the Law of Arms, the Cuſtom of the Realm, and all Juſtice, that he ſhould be Exil'd, who had ſo Honourably offer'd to maintain his Appeal, according to the Law of the Field. So he left the Kingdom, and directed his Courſe to Paris, where he was kindly received by the French King, and found ſuch Favour in that Court, that he was preſently offered in Mariage the only Daughter (then a Widdow) of the Duke of Berry, that King's Uncle; but King Richard having notice thereof, thereof, uſed all the means he could to put a ſtop to that Affair. And to that end, He ſent the Earl of Salisbury His Ambaſſador to the French Court, who, by repreſenting the Duke of Hereford as a Perſon Guilty of Trayterous Deſigns againſt his Prince, ſo that He would never permit him to return, wrought ſo much upon the Frenh King, and His Uncles and Brothers, that they reſolved the Match ſhould proceed no further, and thereupon they made the Duke acquainted with it, who highly reſented the Affront and Injury King Richard had done him; but this did not fall out 'till the next Year after the death of the Duke of Lancaſter, tho' not to break the thrid of the Story, I relate it here. But we ſhall now return to England.

As to the Scotiſh Affairs, At Handenſtank upon the Borders, on the 26*th* of October this Year, Commiſſioners for both Nations met; for Scotland, Sir William Bortwick, Sir John of Remorgny Knights, and Adam Forſter Eſquire: For England, John Buſſy, and Henry Green Knights, William Ferriby Clerk, and Lawrence Drew Eſquire; their Buſineſs was to take care of the Releaſe and Exchange of ſuch Priſoners that had been taken on both ſides ſince the Truce of Leulingham, in the Year 1389, and to Regulate the Practices of the Borders on both ſides, and ſecure them from Rapine, Thefts, Robberies, Burnings, and taking and carrying away Priſoners into either Country during the time of the ~~late~~ Twenty Eight Year's Truce between England, France, and Scotland, which was effectually done in Eleven Articles; The Inſtrument it ſelf under the Seals of the Scotiſh Commiſſioners, in their old Dialect, remains with the Under-Chamberlains in the Exchequer, in a little Box, Tit-led Scotia on the outſide.

See the Instrument in R[illegible] Col. p. 34.

I find nothing else to have happened this year but that all the Parliament had [illegible] Pardons ~~[illegible]~~ passed in the Parliament of 21st of this King, yet he was now so [illegible] to [illegible] give promise of [illegible] action [illegible] ~~[illegible]~~ [illegible] Persons that had been concerned with the Duke of Glocester and the Earls of Arundel and Warwick for their [illegible] rising with [illegible] and for all Insurrections, murthers, burnings &c [illegible] at Haringey by reason of their adherence [illegible] provided the sd. Persons took out charters of their [illegible] before the Feast of All Saints next ensuing, as appears by a writ to the Sheriff of Stafford shire bearing date [illegible] Rot: Cl: 22. R. vide [illegible] Col. p. [illegible] but the Fees of these Charters being very chargeable the common sort were not able to take them out. So that they still lay open to the [illegible] secution, as several Counties actually were within a few months after.

[1.] T. W. A Prodigy of a River near Bedford, that became dry on the ſudden.

This Year our [1.] Hiſtorian begins with a ſtrange and unuſual Prodigy, of a deep River, running between the Villages of Suelleſton, and Harewood, near Bedford, that ſtopt its Courſe on the day of our Lord's Circumciſion, and for the ſpace of Three Miles remain'd dry, without any Viſible or Natural Cauſe to be given for it, as I can find. This was afterwards Interpreted as a Prognoſtick of that General Defection of almoſt the whole Kingdom from King Richard, which happen'd before the end of this Year.

About Candlemaſs following, John Duke of Lancaſter, the King's Uncle, deceaſed, and was Buried in the Cathedral Church of St. Paul's, where his Tomb remain'd, (tho' ſomewhat defac'd) 'till the ruin of that Church by the late General Conflagration in the Year, 1666.

[2.] The Deceaſe of the Duke of Lancaſter, with his Character.

The [2.] Character given of this Prince by our Hiſtorians, ſpeaks him to have been a Man Prudent and Wary in his Actions, an Approver of Safe Councils on good Reaſons, rather than Fortunate Exploits with Hazard: One that was neither Negligent, nor Ambitious of Glory, and therefore deported himſelf towards the King his Nephew, in Terms Honourable, and Reſpective enough for a Moderate Prince, but not ſo much as the immoderate deſire of Arbitrary Power in the King his Nephew, joyn'd with depraved Manners of the Court, might require. But it was evident how Compliant this Prince in his declining Years was forced to be; when in this, the very laſt Year of his Life, He was made to joyn with the declared Enemies of his Family, in that unjuſt Sentence paſſed upon the Duke of Hereford his Son, who immediately upon the death of his Father, ought to have Inherited, ired, not only his Title, but alſo his vaſt Eſtate, had not the King, jealous of ſuch great Power in ſo near a Relation, ſo juſtly and highly provoked, taken care, tho' with greater injuſtice, to prevent it.

Anno Domi. 1399.

For [1.] on the 8*th* of March, the Commiſſioners, or rather Junto, that had the Authority of Parliament, met again at Weſtminſter, where they declared, that Henry Duke of Hereford, after the Judgment given againſt him at Coventry, had procured Letters Patents from the King, that he during his Abſence, might by his Attorney, Sue and have Livery of any Lands deſcended to him, and have his Homage reſpited 'till his Return; which Letters Patents were declared to be againſt Law. Whereupon the King, by Advice and Aſſent of the ſaid Committee of Parliament, Revoked thoſe Letters Patents, as alſo the like made to the Duke of Norfolk.

[1.] Placit. Parl. 21 Rich. 2 ut ſupra.

Nor [2.] was the King and Committee above mention'd contented with what they had done againſt the now Duke of Lancaſter, but Proceeded moſt ſeverely againſt one Henry Bowet Clerk, who had proſecuted this Buſineſs on his Behalf. For on the 23*d* of April following, they being then Aſſembled at Windſor, he was brought before them, where it being ſhewn to the King, that the ſaid Bowet had been the Contriver and Manager of that Petition, upon which the ſaid Letters Patents had been granted; therefore he was alſo by the ſaid Committee, which had the Authority of Parliament, adjudged a Traytor, and to be Drawn, Hanged, Headed, and Quartered; and all his Lands and Tenements, Goods and Chattels to be Forfeited. But becauſe he was the King's Chaplain, He Pardon'd the Execution of the Judgment, and Granted him his Life, with this Proviſo, That he ſhould be Baniſh'd England for ever; than which Judgment, nothing could be more Arbitrary and Unjuſt, ſince the King being backed by this Committee, now took upon Him to declare an Innocent Act, performed by a Lawful Attorney, on the behalf of one that had a juſt Right, to be High Treaſon, which was no Crime at Common Law, nor by any Statute. But as the new Duke of Lancaſter could not but highly reſent this Arbitrary Proceeding, ſo there not long after happened an Accident, which gave him an Opportunity ſufficiently to revenge it: But of this you ſhall hear more by and by.

[2.] Ib. They likewiſe declare the Duke's Attorney who had obtain'd thoſe Letters Patents, guilty of Treaſon.

In the mean while, the [3.] Laws and Liberties of England lay in a dangerous and expiring Condition; for the King having thus diſpatched the Duke of Gloceſter, and the reſt of the Noblemen that oppos'd Him, and being now rid of His Uncle the Duke of Lancaſter by Death, and of his Son by Baniſhment; His only remaining Uncle the Duke of York, being an eaſie and quiet Prince, more addicted to his Pleaſures than Publick Buſineſs, and being alſo much Govern'd by his Son the Duke of Albemarl, he was ſo far from oppoſing, that he rather ſeem'd to Countenance the King's late Actions, by Voting with the preſent ſtanding Committee of Parliament. So that the King now looking upon Himſelf as Hors-du-page, and free from any Controul, abandon'd Himſelf to Sloth, and lay plung'd in the ſoſt but deſtructive Charms of Pleaſure; by whoſe Example, many of the Nobility gave themſelves to Eaſe and Luxury, whereby Cowardice and Effeminacy crept in, and Shipwreck was made both of Manhood, and Reputation.

[3.] The dangerous Condition of the Liberties of England, thro' the King's Arbitrary Government.

Anno Dom. 1399.

[1.] T. W. The ſad Condition of Affairs both at Home, and Abroad.

As [1.] for the Publick Affairs both at Home and Abroad, they were in a Condition ſuitable to ſuch Managers; for we learn from the Writers of thoſe Times, that they had been long Biaſſed, rather by Private Reſpects, than Publick Intereſt; which made the Nation decline both in Riches, and Honour. So that all things being out of order, the Commonweal ſeem'd running apace into inevitable Ruin; for the Northern Countries were by frequent Plunderings, and ill-kept Truces, wholy Impoveriſh'd by the Scots, who had taken ſeveral Important Poſts, and waſted all thoſe Parts with Slaughter and Devaſtations. Upon the Seas the Merchant's Ships were often Surprized by the French; and the King's Hereditary Dominions in France, reduced to a narrow compaſs, many Strong Holds having been loſt by Negligence, or ſold by Treachery. For tho' Forces were often ſent over for their defence, yet it was either in ſuch ſmall Quantities, or at unſeaſonable Times, and ſo ill Accommodated, or under ſuch indiſcreet Conduct, that they were occaſions rather of Loſs, than Profit; Affairs being managed by ſuch, as neither Nature had deſigned, nor Education prepared, nor Experience qualified for Politicians; but Corrupt or Ignorant Miniſters by Flatteries and baſe Arts Swayed in the King's Affections, and diſpos'd of all things at their Will and Pleaſure; keeping Him as it were beſieged, from any better Advice; the Profits and Revenues of the Crown, nay, of the whole Kingdom, was let to Farm to certain Favourites, who cruelly racked and oppreſſed the Subjects.

[2.] Id ib. Great Sums of Money extorted by Loans, without any Payment.

And [2.] as an Inſtance of this, great Sums of Money were by new found and unwonted Means, every day rather extorted than borrowed from all ſorts of People, whereof no Advantage accrew'd to the Kingdom, only the King's Private Pleaſures were maintain'd at an Extravagant Rate, and unworthy Favourites Advanced. To which we may add, that the King was ſo exceeding Liberal, or rather Prodigal, that He was forced to Borrow and Extort Money from many Perſons to ſupply this vain laviſh Humour; undoing many without Cauſe, to enrich a few without deſert. Over and above Tenths and Fifteenths, and other uſual Taxes, which were ſometimes gathered twice in a Year, other ſtrange Impoſitions were deviſed and put in Practice; for He had often Extorted great Sums from the People, under the Colour of Benevolence, beſides what was borrowed upon Privy-Seals; ſo that no Man of Ability could eſcape thoſe Loans, tho' of theſe, ſeldom any re-payment was made.

[3.] Id ib. Cron. de Lambeth. The King Charges 17 Counties with Treaſon, for aſſiſting the Duke of Glouceſter.

But to add to all former Oppreſſions, [3.] the King had not long before Charged no leſs than Seventeen whole Counties with High-Treaſon, for taking part againſt Him with the Duke of Glouceſter, and the reſt of the Lords of his Party, above Ten Years ſince, when they came to Haringay-Park: And tho' all thoſe Actions had been Pardon'd by Act of Parliament, yet He now threatned to ſpoil and deſtroy them, as Publick Enemies, unleſs they would entirely ſubmit themſelves to His Pleaſure. And having thus terrified them, He ſent certain Commiſſioners, both of the Biſhops and Lords Temporal, to all the Clergy, Noblemen and Gentlemen of the ſaid ſeveral Shires, to let them know His heavy diſpleaſure; and that without due acknowledgment of their Offence, and ſubmiſſion to His Will, He could not receive them into His Grace. Whereby being thus grievouſly threatned, they were prevail'd upon to own themſelves Offenders under eir Hands and Seals, by Sealing certain Blank Charters, according the will of the King's Council that drew them. And no ſooner as this obtain'd, but they lying at the King's Mercy, were for-d to pay great Sums of Money for the Redemption of their Lives d Eſtates; whereby many of them were ſo Impoveriſh'd, that they ere not able to ſubſiſt; thus all ſorts of People were made to ſuffer. ut the King had either forgot, or perhaps was ignorant of that Sen-nce, Timeat ille, quem omnes timent. And further ſtill, even to make onſcience it ſelf acceſſary to Slavery, New Oaths were Impos'd, not arranted by Law. For the Sheriffs of all the Counties through the ingdom were alſo forced to take an Unuſual Oath, to wit, that they ould obey all the King's Commands, whether under the Broad Seal, rivy-Seal, or Signet; and that if they knew any Perſon in their re-ective Baylywicks, that had ſpoke any thing to the ſcandal or diſ-race of the King, they ſhould ſeize all ſuch, and put them in Priſon, what Degree or Condition ſoever they were; by which means divers ell-meaning Men, being accuſed for Words, and brought before the onſtable, and Marſhal, were forced to confeſs themſelves Guilty, or ſe to undertake the Combat or Battel againſt their Accuſers, who ere Young Luſty Fellows, when the Accuſed were perhaps Aged and eak.

The King bearing ſo heavy a hand over His People, it was no won-er if they proved without Duty or Affection towards Him, when He ood moſt in need of them; for He was indeed a Prince of no great dgment, and no good Concealer either of His Vices, or His Paſ-ons, ſuppoſing there was no more required in a King, than to ap-ear Terrible to His People; whereby He became ſo generally hated, at it drove a great many to Rebell on the firſt Opportunity, as be-g reſolved rather to run the hazard of a ſpeedy Ruin, than to lan-uiſh under a miſerable Slavery.

This cauſed ſeveral of the [1.] diſcontented Nobility and Gentry make ſome Private Overtures to the Duke of Lancaſter, (being then France) deſiring his ſpeedy return into England; Remonſtrating that s well for the Publick Good of the Realm, as for their own particular afeties and Intereſt, they muſt uſe Force to redeem and reſcue them-lves from theſe intollerable Oppreſſions; and therefore Solliciting im that he would but become the Head, and they would furniſh e Body of an Army, and that a Powerful one too, whenever he ould Land; promiſing to adventure their Lives and Fortunes in this uarrel; yet ſo, that the Danger ſhould be common to them all, but e Glory and Advantage ſhould be chiefly his own.

Several of the diſcontented Nobility privately Invite the Duke of Lancaſter to come home to redreſs their Grievances.

The Duke received theſe Addreſſes at firſt with great Precaution, and ſeeming indifference, as if he were loth to hearken to their Pro-ſals; but whilſt he remain'd in this uncertainty what Courſe to take, was wrought upon, and at length ſettled in his [2.] Reſolutions, the Perſuaſions of Thomas Archbiſhop of Canterbury, who about is time came to him in the diſguiſe of a Fryar, and ſatisfied him, at King Richard was ſo hated by the People of England, that they ould take the firſt Opportunity to join with any one that would ouſe their Intereſt againſt Him.

[2.] The Duke is encouraged to undertake it, by the perſuaſions of the Archbiſhop of Canterbury.

This is the Sum of [1.] Froiſſart's Relation concerning this Tranſ action, but that the Archbiſhop of Canterbury was ſent (as this Autho relates) to the Duke from England, by the General Conſent of all th Eſtates of the Kingdom, is certainly a great Error in that Autho that Archbiſhop having been Baniſh'd by Parliament above a Year ag and never returned ſince; neither could there be any Parliamenta Aſſembly held for that Purpoſe during the King's Abſence in Irela all the diſcontented Party being ſo cloſely obſerved by the Duke Tork, then Chief Governor of the Realm, and others the King's Mi ſter's, that no body durſt openly ſhew their diſlike of the preſent G vernment, 'till the Duke of Lancaſter's Landing here.

Yet this much all Author's agree in, that the Scene of theſe Tranſ actions was at Paris, where Froiſſart ſuppoſes that the Archbi ſhop^ met the Duke privately at his Lodgings; and this Auth hath given us the ſeveral Speeches that were made on this occaſio for the Reality of which, tho' I will not paſs my word, yet it is ve likely that their Conſultations terminated in a Reſult, that the Du ſhould adventure Himſelf over into England, and try his Fortune, up the firſt convenient Opportunity, which ſoon preſented it ſelf the mo invitingly that could be imagined. But to return to our own Affairs.

The Earl of Marche is ſlain by the Iriſh; whereupon the King raiſes an Army to revenge his death.

The [2.] Earl of Marche, who had been appointed by t King to be His Lieutenant in Ireland, expoſing his Perſon too a venturouſly, was Slain in the beginning of this Year by the W Iriſh, which ſo exaſperated King Richard, that He reſolved in Perſ to Revenge his death. In Order to which, He raiſed a great Arm but not without a vaſt Charge, and grievous Oppreſſion of His Su jects, not only in raiſing Money by unlawful Means, but taking up C riages, Victuals, and other Neceſſaries, without Paying for the which Arbitrary, raſh and unadviſed Practices, render'd Himſelf a His Government ſtill more and more uneaſie to His People. [3.] Th about Whitſontide, the King^ took Shipping for Ireland, accompani with the Dukes of Albemarl,^ and Exeter, and divers of the Nobl amongſt whom was the Abbot of Weſtminſter, now a Principal Fa rite; but His Forces moſtly conſiſted of Cheſhire-men, on wh He chiefly confided. He alſo took with Him the Sons of the Duke Glouceſter, and Lancaſter, under pretence of teaching them the Ru 10 ments of War; but indeed rather to ſecure them as Hoſtages, to p vent any Attempts that might be made by thoſe of their Party in H abſence. He alſo carried over with Him the Chief Reliques, with Pl and Jewels of the Crown that were in His Treaſury; as if He had d ſign'd (as in the event it effectually proved) to have taken a final lea at once, of both His Kingdom and Dignity here in England.

Majeſty to conſider how little neceſſary ~~they~~ it would be for the Iriſh Service, and indeed dangerous to the whole Realm, to draw Men from ſuch remote Places, in regard those Rebels were neither ſo many, nor ſo mighty, but that the King had already ſufficient Forces to reduce them to Obedience, and to diſfurniſh the Northern Parts of their Strength, would but give an Opportunity to the Scots to Invade us; and therefore beg'd His Majeſty, that He would be pleaſed in ſuch a juncture to excuſe him from attending. This Anſwer the King interpreted as an Affront to His Authority, and therefore in an unadviſed Heat, Proclaims the Earl, and all that ſhould take part with him, Traytors, and orders all their Lands and Goods to be ſeized to His Uſe. The Earl reſenting this diſgrace, and forced (as it were by Neceſſity) does then in earneſt make good the Information, by ſtanding upon his Guard, or rather in a poſture of open Hoſtility.

In the mean while, [1.] the King Landed at Waterford, and immediately after His Arrival, marched from Dublin againſt the Iriſh of Ulſter, and got many little Victories in ſeveral Rencounters He had with them; in all which, the King is ſaid to behave Himſelf with great Courage and Reſolution. And theſe Petty Iriſh Princes were ſo terrified with the Force of His Arms, that they ſent Meſſengers to Him to beg His Pardon, and ſue for Peace, which they at length obtain'd, tho' with ſome difficulty. But theſe inconſiderable Triumphs coſt King Richard dear in the Sequel; for whilſt He is thus engaged, and abſent from His diſcontented Kingdom of England, the Duke of Lancaſter thinks it the moſt proper time to put in Execution what he and others his Confederates had been ſo long Conſulting of. Wherefore after the diſpatching ſome of his truſty Friends over, to get thoſe he had here to provide Arms, with all other Neceſſaries againſt his Arrival, he Addreſſes himſelf to the French King with a Complement, that he intended to pay a Viſit to his Kinſman the Duke of Bretagne, and therefore deſired His Majeſtie's Letters of ſafe Conduct; which being granted, he there very privately levied a few Soldiers, with whom, having hired Three Ships of the Duke of Bretagne, he put to [2.] Sea for England, accompanied by the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and his Nephew, Heir to Richard late Earl of Arundel, the Lord Cobham, Sir Thomas Erpington, and Sir Thomas Ramſtone, Knights, with ſome other Gentlemen, his whole Retinue not conſiſting of above Eighty Perſons; ſo that 'tis hard to judge which was the greateſt Wonder, that he durſt attempt, or that he did ſucceed in his Deſign with ſo inconſiderable a Company. But his Confidence was not ſo much in thoſe he brought with him, as in the ſtrength he hoped to find here, relying altogether on the Favour and Aſſiſtance of the Common People, and Gentry, whom he knew to be generally diſcontented, and eager to change their preſent Governors, for any that would but promiſe them to make their Condition more eaſie for the future.

[1.] Annal. Hib. The King Marches againſt the Iriſh, and at laſt forces them to ſubmit, and beg pardon.

[2.] The D. of Lancaſter makes Preparations in the mean while to come over into England. He takes Shipping with a ſmall Company.

Yet the Duke was too Wiſe and Cautious to puſh things beyond all poſſibility of a Retreat; and therefore did not preſently Land, but lay [3.] Cruiſing up and down, ſometimes appearing on one Coaſt, and ſometimes on another, that he might the better diſcover how the Inclinations of the People ſtood towards him, and what Forces were ready either to receive or reſiſt him. But at laſt being ſatisfied with what what he obſerved, he put on Shoar without any oppoſition, about the beginning of July, at Ravenſpurre in Yorkſhire, with no more than Twenty Lances, tho' he might have had a greater Force from the Duke of Bretagne; ſo much did he confide in the Juſtice of His Cauſe, and the Favour of the People. Yet he did not then make any Pretenſions to the Crown, but only gave out that he came to regain the Dutchy of Lancaſter, and the reſt of his Lawful Inheritance, which all the Nation knew was wrongfully detain'd from him, and ſo hoped they were the more ready to pity and favour him in a Cauſe wherein he had received ſo palpable an Injury from the King.

His [1.] Arrival was no ſooner known, but there repair'd to him the Lords Willoughby, Roſs, Darcy, and Beaumont; and ſhortly after at Doncaſter, the Earl of Northumberland, and his Son Sir Henry Piercy, with the Earl of Weſtmorland, and great numbers of the Gentry and Common People went in to him.

Intelligence hereof was ſoon convey'd to the Duke of York, the King's Uncle, and his Lieutenant during his abſence, who thereupon calls together the Biſhop of Cheſter, the Lord Chancellor Scrope, the Earl of Wiltſhire Lord Treaſurer, Sir John Buſſy, Sir Henry Green, Sir William Bagot, and Sir John Ruſſel, Chief Councellors, and Confidents of King Richard, to Adviſe what was to be done in this dangerous Exigence of Affairs. Amongſt theſe (whether deſignedly by ſome, or ignorantly by others I cannot ſay, but ſurely moſt perniciouſly for King Richard's Intereſt,) it was concluded to abandon London, and appoint the General Rendezvous for Raiſing Forces againſt the Duke to be at St. Albans. But when the Common People out of ſundry Counties were drawn thither to be Muſter'd, they openly declar'd they would not act any thing to the prejudice of the ſaid Duke, who they affirm'd was unjuſtly expelled his Country, and unlawfully kept from his Inheritance.

[2.] Id ib. Upon this the Earl of Wiltſhire, with the reſt of the King's Favorites flie to Briſtol.

This [2.] Refuſal of the Commons to Serve the King, was certainly the Ruin of His Affairs; whereupon the Earl of Wiltſhire, Sir John Buſhy, Sir William Bagot, and Sir Henry Green, preſently forſook the Duke of York, and fled to Briſtol, intending to paſs over into Ireland to the King: and it was time for them to ply to their Heels, for theſe Four were thoſe, who had taken the Revenues of the whole Kingdom to Farm; and on that ſcore, and other Grievances and Oppreſſions which they had committed, were become ſo odious to the People, that their very Preſence turned away many of the Subjects hearts from their Sovereign, it being their Hatred againſt them, rather than any averſion to the King's Perſon, that cauſed this General Revolt.

The Duke of York ſeeing their Flight, and the Humour of the Generality favouring Lancaſter, and loth to run the Adventure of an improbable Reſiſtance, gave over the Cauſe, and laid down his Arms; and thereupon the reſt of the Nobility either openly declar'd for the Duke, or ſecretly held Correſpondence with him, reſolving to Swim with this violent Current, rather than at their own Perils to ſtem an impetuous Tide, which bore down all before it.

For no Snow-Ball could encreaſe faſter by rolling, than the Duke of Lancaſter's Forces were augmented by his March; inſomuch that they were quickly grown to Sixty Thouſand Strong; with whoſe Aſſiſtance he reſolv'd to puſh on his good Fortune, and ſo haſtned with his Forces to London, that Poſſeſſing himſelf thereof, (being the Chief City of the Kingdom for Strength and Riches) he might beſt make the Seat of War there, and be the eaſieſt accommodated both with Proviſions, and Ammunition; but in his whole March he met with no Oppoſition, nor Hoſtility, but all along Gentlemen of the beſt Quality, out of Affection, Fear, or Hope of Reward, reſorted to his Camp, and wherever he ſtayed, Rich Preſents were made him, and his Army ſupplied with all Neceſſaries, even to ſuperfluity; and particularly at [1.] London, he was received as in Triumph, with Stately Shows, Solemn Proceſſions of the Clergy, and loud Acclamations and Huzzaes of the People.

[1.] He is received with great Joy by the City.

But he was more regardful of his Affairs than to ſtay long there, and therefore having fixed the Citizens firm to his Intereſt, and knowing all the danger that could now threaten him, muſt be from King Richard's ſpeedy Return out of Ireland; to obviate that, and overtake the Fugitive Favourites, [2.] who were fled to Briſtol, he with haſty Marches perſued them thither, and finding the Caſtle Fortified againſt him, he aſſaults it ſo briskly, that in Four days time he forced it to a Surrender upon diſcretion; and taking therein the Earl of Wiltſhire Lord Treaſurer, Sir John Buſſy, and Sir Henry Green, he the very next day Sacrificed them to the importunate Rage of the incenſed People, cauſing them all three to be forthwith Beheaded. But as for Sir William Bagot, he was got to Cheſter, and from thence paſſing over into Ireland, not only eſcaped the preſent Vengeance, but brought the King who was then at Dublin, the firſt News of this General Revolt, and the great danger He was in. But to proceed with the preſent Relation: This Execution of the King's Favourites and Chief Miniſters, if it were not Juſt, was certainly very Politick; for partly becauſe it was ſo grateful to the People, and partly becauſe it excluded all hopes of Pardon, it became a great engagement to all the Duke's Followers, to adhere more firmly to him for the future.

[2.] T. W. He makes no ſtay there, but marches to Briſtol againſt the Favorites, who are forced to Surrender it to him, and are preſently Executed.

The Duke had now been ſix Weeks in England, and the whole Nation in effect ſubmitted to him; during all which time, there was no News of King Richard; whether it were by reaſon of contrary Winds that hindred His coming over, as ſome write, or that on the firſt Advice He ſlighted it, according to the humour of ſome weak Spirits, who contemn Dangers remote, but are aſtoniſhed at their nearer approach; however at laſt, when He ſaw in what an hazardous Condition His Affairs ſtood, He cauſed the Sons of the Dukes of Lancaſter and Glouceſter to be Impriſoned in the Caſtle of Trim, and determined forthwith for England. But the Duke of Aumarle, His Principal Counſellor, perſuaded Him to ſtay 'till His Preparations were ready; which Fatal Council, as it was King Richard's ill Deſtiny to follow, ſo it proved His Ruin: yet He preſently ſent over the Earl of Saliſbury to raiſe an Army in Wales and Cheſhire againſt His Return, which He ſolemnly Promiſed ſhould be within ſix days at furtheſt. The Earl ſo well employed his Care and Pains, that he had ſoon got together Forty Thouſand Men; But the ſix days and more being elapſed, and the King not appearing, made them murmur, and ſuſpect that He was dead, or come to ſome diſaſter. But the Earl ſtill perſuaded them have Patience ſome few days longer, which being likewiſe expired, an no Tidings of Him, they then in great diſcontent broke up, and re red to their reſpective Habitations.

[1.] T. W. The K. lands at Milford-Haven, and finding his Army diſbanded, knows not what to do.

At length Eighteen days after [1.] he had ſent away the Ear the King took Shipping, attended with the Dukes of Aumarle, E eter and Surrey, the Biſhops of London, Exeter, and Carliſle, and ſom others of the Nobility, and Landed at Milford-Haven, having abo Him a competent Number of Cheſhire Men, whom He brought ov with Him, and from thence went on to Caermarthen, where He ſtai ſome time to conſider what Courſe it were beſt for him to take; bu when he underſtood that the other Forces He expected to join him we Disbanded, and gone Home, and that moſt of His Caſtles and Town had Surrender'd to the Duke of Lancaſter, and the Londoner eſpouſed his Intereſt; that the greateſt number of the Nobility, an Commons almoſt in General took part with him, and eſpecially tha His Principal Councellors had loſt their Heads at Briſtol, He was ſ far from retaining the Magnanimity of a King, that He almoſt ceaſe to be a Man, and abandon'd Himſelf to [2.] Deſpair, perplex'd wit uncertainties where to ſtay, or whither to go; being deſtitute bot of Reſolution, and good Advice from Others in ſuch amazing Difficulties, whereunto weak and uncertain Councils are ſtill obnoxious for whilſt ſome Adviſed Him to march further into the Land befor the reſt of thoſe Friends He had left fell from Him, alledging, tha Fortune favours bold Attempts; and in all Places He ſhould find ſome who out of Duty, or Affection, or for Pay, would follow His Standard, which would be illuſtrated with the Majeſty of His Perſon, and Guarded with the Right of His Cauſe; Others perſuaded Him to g back into Ireland, or get over to his Father-in-Law of France, and thence to return when the Storm was over, and Himſelf better ſtrengthned. But the King rejected both theſe Councils, and taking a middle Courſe (which in Extreams of that kind is the worſt) reſolved to ſtay in Wales, to ſee to what head this humour would riſe, whilſt the few Soldiers He had brought over with Him, endeavour'd to encourage Him to venture a Battel, vowing they would live and die with him. But this could not at all raiſe his drooping Spirits, for in [3.] the Night he ſtole away from his Forces, and with the Dukes of Exeter, and Surrey, the Biſhop of Carliſle, Sir Stephen Scrope, and half a ſcore more, went incognito croſs the Country to the Caſtle of Conway, where he was no ſooner arriv'd, but the Lord Thomas Piercy, Steward of his *H*ouſhold, ſeeing his Maſter's Affairs in that deplorate State, or elſe in revenge for Proclaiming of his Brother the Earl of Northumberland a Traytor (as before was mention'd) did openly in the *H*all of the Caſtle, before all the King's Servants, break his White-Staff of Office, and forthwith repair to the Duke of Lancaſter; and moſt of the Royal Retinue by his Example, diſperſed and ſhifted every one for himſelf. Such uncertain Attendants are the common ſort of Courtiers, who like Flies, leave the object that hath nouriſh'd them, upon the firſt Storm.

[2.] He is diſtracted by different Councils.

[3.] Chron. de Lambeth. Pol. Virgil. The King ſteals from his Forces, and goes to the Caſtle of Conway.

But it is time to look back and ſee what the Duke of Lancaſter has been doing, ſince his coming to Briſtol; where, upon Intelligence of King Richard's Arrival, he left his Uncle the Duke of York (who had now join'd him) and Marched at the head of his Troops to Glouceſter, and from thence to Roſs, and ſo to Hereford, and there came in to him the Biſhop of that See, and Sir Edmund Mortimer. On the Sunday following he went to Leymſter, and there the Lord Charleton of Powis came to him; from thence he marched to Ludlow, and the next day to Shrewsbury, and thither came to him Sir Robert and Sir John Leigh, and other Perſons of Quality, being ſent from Cheſter to offer him their Service; as did alſo the Lord Scales, and the Lord Bardolph out of Ireland.

From [1.] Shrewsbury he went on to Cheſter, where he diſpatch'd an Expreſs into Ireland to fetch over his own Son and Heir, and likewiſe the young Duke of Glouceſter, both whom King Richard had left in Cuſtody there; and it ſeems their Keepers durſt no longer detain them, after the Duke Commanded them from thence; for his Son ſoon after arrived here, but the other young Nobleman not coming with his Couſin, was unfortunately caſt away at Sea. But now let us return to Matters of greater Importance.

[1.] Ib. The Duke comes to Cheſter.

As ſoon as King Richard arrived at the Caſtle of Conway, John Holland Duke of [2.] Exeter, his half Brother, offer'd to go to the Duke of Lancaſter to Cheſter, to Treat with him on the King's behalf, and ſee whether he might ſafely deliver himſelf into his Power or not; and the day after, the Duke of Surrey thought fit likewiſe to ask the King's Licenſe to go to the Duke to make his own Peace, as alſo to intercede for the King, who preſently gave him leave to go thither; but when he arrived, he was ſo far from making any Intereſt with the Duke, that he committed him cloſe Priſoner to Cheſter-Caſtle; but as for the Duke of Exeter, he found a milder Treatment, being only detain'd a Priſoner at large; yet ſo, that he could not return again to King Richard, as he had promiſed.

[2.] The Dukes of Exeter and Surrey go to the D. to Treat on the King's behalf, but are confin'd.

Walſingham gives an Account of the coming in of both theſe Dukes to the Duke of Lancaſter; but makes as if they had done it on purpoſe to deſert King Richard; whereas by this Relation, which I found in a Manuſcript in the Library at Lambeth, written by a French Gentleman who attended on King Richard into Ireland, and afterwards Accompanied him 'till he deliver'd himſelf to the Duke of Lancaſter. It appears that the coming in of thoſe two Noblemen was upon very good grounds; and ſince this French Writer was preſent with King Richard during the whole Tranſaction between him and the Duke of Lancaſter, and is alſo more full in the particular Circumſtances and Reaſons of the King's ſo eaſily ſurrendring himſelf into the Duke's Power (as he did ſhortly after) then Froiſſart, who is as much miſtaken in this Relation of theſe Tranſactions, as our own Writers are too ſhort in them.

I ſhall therefore proceed with this Gentleman's Relation; who further ſays, That as ſoon as the Duke of Lancaſter was aſſur'd that the King was arriv'd at Conway-Caſtle, he [3.] held a cloſe Conſultation with his two moſt intimate Councellors, the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and Earl of Northumberland, how he might get the King's Perſon into his Power, and hinder his eſcape into Ireland, or France; in either of which Kingdoms, having the Sea open, he had as yet the Liberty to ſecure himſelf; whereupon the Archbiſhop of Canterbury's Advice was, that the Earl of Northumberland, as a Perſon on whoſe Promiſes the King could moſt rely, ſhould be ſent to him, to offer him Terms of Reconciliation with his Couſin the Duke of Lancaſter, and to hinder him from any thoughts of going away with thoſe few Forces he had there in Gariſon, or to ſtand upon his defence; which Journey the Earl willingly undertook, with ſufficient Forces for his Guard.

[1.] Id. ib. The Earl of Northumberland goes to him with Propoſals of Peace, if he will ſurrender himſelf.

In [1.] the mean while the King continued at Conway-Caſtle in great Trouble and Suſpence, becauſe he heard nothing of his Brother the Duke of Exeter, during the eight days he had been gone from him. When the Earl of Northumberland was come as far as the River of Conway, and had ſet a Guard upon the Paſs, he ſent over a Herald to King Richard, to deſire his ſafe Conduct to paſs over to him, leaving his Forces behind; which the King having preſently granted, he went to him, and being admitted into the King's Preſence, his Demands on the behalf of the Duke of Lancaſter were theſe. Firſt, That a Parliament ſhould be immediately Summon'd, which being Met, the Baniſhment of the Duke of Lancaſter ſhould be Revoked, and he to be reſtor'd to all his Eſtate. Secondly, That in this Parliament the Dukes of Exeter and Surrey, with the Earl of Salisbury, and Biſhop of Carliſle ſhould be Try'd for what they had acted againſt Law; as alſo all thoſe who were guilty of Adviſing, or having any hand in the death of the Duke of Glouceſter; and that if his Majeſty would agree to theſe Propoſals, and permit them to be tranſacted and diſpatched in Parliament, he ſhould then be reſtored to his former Power, and Royal Dignity; and the Earl further aſſured the King, that the Duke of Lancaſter had Solemnly Sworn by the Body of Chriſt faithfully to accompliſh all the ſaid Particulars, and that he (the Earl) was alſo ready to do the ſame.

[2.] Id ib. The K. does not give much heed to his fair Speeches, yet is at laſt perſwaded to accept of his Propoſals.

The [2.] King at firſt gave not much heed to his Fair Speeches, and ſaid, He expected nothing but death, and that he would die like a Man, and defend himſelf as well as he could; yet hoped that his good Subjects, when they heard how much he was injur'd, would come in and aſſiſt him. But notwithſtanding all this, the Earl of Salisbury, and Biſhop of Carliſle, with other Knights and Gentlemen that were then with the King, ſeeing the deſperate Condition of his Affairs, were not willing to carry things to that Extremity; and therefore Adviſed him to rely on the Earl's Oath upon the Sacrament, on the Conditions already propoſed, which the King conſented to, and the Earl took the Oath accordingly; tho' as it appear'd he never intended to keep it. This being perform'd, the King deſir'd the Earl to go away before, and that he himſelf would follow him to Rothland-Caſtle, which the Earl agreed to; and paſſing over the Water to his Forces, that lay expecting his Return, he rode on four Miles forward, where he placed an Ambuſh behind a Rock, and lay there expecting the King's Arrival; who coming thither a few hours after, with a ſmall Retinue of about Twenty Perſons, and finding himſelf [3.] ſurrounded with ſo many Armed Men, and that he muſt be made a Priſoner, he was very much ſurprized, and ſaid he was Betray'd; but ſeeing there was no way left to eſcape, he made great Complaints to thoſe few that were about him. They were all very ſorry that ever they they had Adviſed him to put ſuch Confidence in the Earl, who nevertheleſs ſeem'd not at all concern'd; but coming up boldly to the King, with a great deal of outward Reſpect, ſaid, that his Majeſty need not be Alarmed to ſee ſo many Armed Men about him, ſince they were only for his Security, the Country being all up in Arms; and then he re-aſſured him by the ſame Oath he had already taken, that he would Conduct him ſafely to the Duke of Lancaſter, without the leaſt Injury to his Royal Perſon.

[1.] The King goes to Rothland Caſtle, and from thence to Flynt.

The [1.] King not being in a Condition to refuſe his Offer, was fain to go with him to Rothland-Caſtle, which had been already Surrender'd to the Earl by the Governour, and Gariſon, in his March towards Conway, and that without ſo much as ſtriking a ſtroke. Here the Earl took his leave of the King, to return to the Duke of Lancaſter, who continued ſtill at Cheſter.

[2.] Id. Ib. The Duke Marches with his Army from Cheſter, to Flynt-Caſtle.

The Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and other Noblemen ride on before, to prepare the King for the Duke's coming.

But [2.] ſo ſoon as he heard by the Earl that the King was come to Flint-Caſtle, he was very well pleaſed, and thereupon drew out his whole Army, in order to march thither to take the King's Perſon into his Power; ſo the day following the Duke left Cheſter, and went towards Flint with all his Forces; in the mean while King Richard had none of any Quality left with him, but the Earl of Saliſbury, and the Biſhop of Carliſle, and Sir Stephen and Sir William Fereby Brothers, to whom he made ſad Complaints of his calamitous Fortune, and too much Credulity; then after Maſs, going upon the Walls to take the Air, he from thence eſpied the Duke of Lancaſter's Army at a diſtance, marching along the Sands. Then the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, the Earl of Rutland, and the Lord Thomas Piercy, according to the Orders they had received from the Duke, rode on before to ſpeak with the King, and prepare him for his coming. Upon their Arrival, His Majeſty came down to them, and received the Archbiſhop with much reſpect, and they all fell down on their knees before him; then the King taking the Archbiſhop aſide, had a great deal of Private diſcourſe with him; but what it was, our Author does not tell us; tho' Walſingham makes no mention of this, but ſuppoſes the Archbiſhop to have accompanied the Earl of Northumberland to Conway-Caſtle, and that there the King offer'd them to Reſign His Crown, provided He might have His Life ſaved, and an Indemnity for Eight Perſons whom He ſhould Name; all which ſeems not ſo probable as what our Author relates; but to return to our Hiſtory.

[3.] Id. ib. The Earl of Northumberland comes from the Duke with another Meſſage.

When [3.] the Archbiſhop had ſetled Matters with the King, he with the reſt of the Noblemen return'd to the Duke of Lancaſter, to give him an Account what he had done; after their departure, the King went again upon the Walls, and renewed his Complaints to thoſe that were about him, until the Earl of Northumberland was ſent by the Duke (who was now very near the Caſtle) to aſſure him that he would not enter the Caſtle until after his Majeſty had Dined; then the King ſat down to dinner, and made the Biſhop and Earl, and the reſt of the Knights and Gentlemen that were there ſit down at the Table with him, thanking them that they would thus venture their Lives for his ſake. Whilſt the King was at dinner, a great many Knights and Eſquires of the Duke's Party preſſed in upon them with much rudeneſs and indecency, caſting out theat'ning Speeches, that all thoſe who were with him ſhould loſe their Heads, which put them into a terrible conſternation.

[1.] Id ib. The Author is preſented to the Duke, and kindly Treated by him.

Then [1.] after dinner the Duke of Lancaſter being arrived at the Caſtle, and having drawn up his Men in excellent Order, our Author ſays that he himſelf, with two or three more of his Companions, were Preſented to the Duke by Lancaſter his Herald, who told him that they were certain French Gentlemen, whom King Charles had ſent to attend King Richard into Ireland to ſee the Country. The Duke reply'd to them in French, that they need not be afraid, for upon his word their Lives ſhould be ſafe, provided they would keep near to him, which very much rejoyced them; ſo the Duke entred the Caſtle all in Armour, except his Head-piece, and the King, with the Earl of Salisbury, and Biſhop of Carliſle, came down from the Tower to meet him, and pulling off his Cap, began firſt in this manner.

[2.] The Meeting of the King and Duke, and what paſſed between them.

Couſin of Lancaſter you are Wellcome; then the Duke thrice bowing to the ground, Reply'd, [2.] My Lord the King, I am come ſooner than you appointed me, and the Reaſon was, becauſe the Common Fame of your People is, that You have for theſe One and Twenty Years Govern'd very ill, and Rigorouſly, of which they are not at all ſatisfied; but if it pleaſe God, I will help You to Govern them better for the time to come: to which the King only return'd, Fair Couſin, ſince it pleaſes you, it pleaſes Us too. Theſe were all the Words they had together, without adding any thing to, or taking from them; for I (ſays my Author) ſtood by and heard them.

[3.] Id. ib. The Duke takes no notice of the E. of Salisbury, and why.

Then [3.] the Duke turn'd about, and ſpoke to the Biſhop of Carliſle, and to the two Knights, but ſaid not a word to the Earl of Salisbury; yet bid one of the Knights tell him, that ſince he had diſdain'd to ſpeak to him when he was at Paris, he need not wonder if he now took as little notice of him; at which Anſwer the Earl was much caſt down, for he plainly perceived the Duke hated him mortally; then the Duke called out with an aſſuming Air to bring the King's Horſes; uponwhich they immediately brought two little Nags, not worth forty Franks, and the King mounted one of them, and the Earl the other, and ſo they left Flynt-Caſtle about Two in the Afternoon.

[4.] Id. ib. The King is brought to Cheſter, and Lodged in the Caſtle.

The [4.] King being come to Cheſter, was convey'd to the Caſtle with a great noiſe of Trumpets, the Common People following him with deriſion, and reproaches; he was there lodged in the Great-Tower, where he ſaw his Brother the Duke of Exeter, but durſt not ſay much to him; ſo the King remain'd in cloſe Cuſtody with his Friends the Earl of Salisbury, the Biſhop of Carliſle, and the two Knights abovemention'd. The Duke ſtay'd three days at Cheſter, and in the mean while held a Great Council, where they concluded that they had too many People, Thirty or Forty Thouſand Men being enough to Conduct the King to London, and ſo the reſt were diſmiſſed. ^

The King is like to have made an eſcape, but is taken.

As [5.] ſoon as they came to Litchfield the King had like to have eſcaped, by creeping out of a Window of a Tower into a Garden, where he hid himſelf, but was diſcover'd, and Villanouſly uſed, and brought back into the Tower; where he was afterwards kept by Ten or Twelve Armed Men, Watching conſtantly in the Room, to hinder the like Attempt for the future.

The ſame [1.] Author further relates, that before they came near the City of London, the Recorder, and many Knights and Eſquires went to wait on the Duke of Lancaſter, and deſired him on behalf of the Commons of London, to cut off the Heads of King Richard, and all that were taken with him; but the Duke would by no means hearken to ſuch a piece of Villany, but told them, That their Requeſt (if put in practice) would prove an everlaſting Reproach to him, and all his Adherents; but he would carry them along with him to London, and then leave them to the Judgment of the Parliament.

[1.] Id ib. The Recorder of London, and other Men of Quality meet the Duke on the way, and deſire that the King and thoſe that were taken with him might loſe their Heads, but he refuſes.

So ſoon as the Duke came to Town, he was received by all the Companies of the City in their Liveries, which made a Noble Show, the Common People making great Acclamations, crying, out Long Live the good Duke of Lancaſter, our Deliverer. Then he cauſed the King to be ſafely Conveyed to the Tower, where the Royal Lodgings were provided for Him, but the Duke himſelf went to St. Paul's Church, and there ſaid his Prayers before the High Altar; afterwards turning aſide to his Father's Tomb (which was not far off, he there kneeled, and ſhed many Tears. And when he had ſo done, he went to the Biſhop of London's Pallace, and there ſtayed ſix or ſeven days, and from thence removed to the Houſe of the Knights of St. John of Jeruſalem without the City, where he continued 'till the Parliament met: So far the Author hath Writ in Proſe, the reſt that follows is in Rhime, concerning the manner of the Depoſition of King Richard, and the making Duke Henry King, with an Invective Song or Ballad againſt Him on that Subject, which I purpoſely omit, becauſe I think this I have already given you, is ſufficient to let you underſtand the Reaſons of King Richard's ſo eaſily ſurrendring Himſelf, and the Circumſtances of it; Froiſſart's Account of it being very falſe, as it is imperfect.

The Duke comes to Town, and is Joyfully receiv'd.

But to return to the Matter: It is very obſervable that the King having [2.] yielded Himſelf the Twentieth of Auguſt, being but the ſeven and fortieth day after the Duke's Arrival in England, He might well aſſume Cæſar's Motto, Veni, Vidi, Vici; for conſidering his Marches from Ravenſpur in the North up to London, and from thence to Briſtol, and ſo thro' Wales to Cheſter; a Man can ſcarce Travel over ſo much Ground in the ſpace that he Conquer'd it: Nay ſo Indulgent was Fortune to him, that all the King's Jewels and Treaſure which were depoſited in Holt-Caſtle (amounting to ſeven hundred thouſand Pounds) with all His Horſes and Baggage now fell into his hands.

[2.] The wonderful ſucceſs of the Duke of Lancaſter.

The King being thus ſecured in the Tower, the Duke of Lancaſter loſt no time, for he had already at Cheſter in King Richard's Name, cauſed [3.] Writs to be iſſued forth for Summoning a Parliament to be held at Weſtminſter on the laſt day of September following; and in the mean time he Conſults with his neareſt Relations and Friends how to ſteer his Courſe, ſo as to bring his Deſigns to a lucky Concluſion, which had hitherto even beyond his Hopes been favour'd by Providence: In order to which, the [4.] Duke of York (who but a little before had been Governor of the Realm for the King, was now become his Nephew of Lancaſter's Chief Director; and after divers debates propos'd it as very expedient, that King Richard ſhould both voluntarily Reſign the Crown, and alſo be ſolemnly Depoſed by all the Eſtates of the Realm, for otherwiſe His Reſignation would be imputed only to His Fear, what Reaſon,

This Advice was generally approved of, and accordingly perſued, a Solemn Renunciation being tendred unto the King, and by [1.] Him Signed on Michaelmas-day next following, being the day before the Parliament was to meet. The Words, Order, and Ceremony whereof, and of the Articles exhibited againſt Him, and His Depoſition thereupon in Parliament, appear on the Records remaining in the Tower; Authentick and Atteſted Copies whereof are Printed in the end of the Decem-Scriptores, beginning at Coll. 2743. from whence the ſame are truly Tranſlated, as follow.

The ſaid King, before the ſaid Lords, and others above-named, hereunto benignly Anſwer'd, That He would with effect accompliſh, what before in that behalf He had Promiſed, but firſt deſired deſired to have a Conference with His Couſin Henry Duke of Lancaſter, and the ſaid Lord Archbiſhop of Canterbury, before He fulfilled His Promiſe.

Then the ſame day after dinner, the King much deſiring, and long waiting for the ſaid Duke of Lancaſter's coming, at laſt he, with the Lords and others above-named, as alſo the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, came into the Preſence of the ſaid King in the Tower aforeſaid, the Lords Roos, Willoughby, and Abergeny, and very many others being there likewiſe; and ſome time after the ſaid King had diſcourſed with the ſaid Duke of Lancaſter and the Archbiſhop, then looking round him, with a ſeeming chearful Countenance; on thoſe there preſent, the King ſaid publickly before them all, that He was ready to make the Renunciation, as it had been already promiſed by Him. And it was told Him, that to ſave Him the [1.] Labour of Reading it with His own Mouth, He might, if He pleaſed, have it done by another; yet taking the Parchment, Schedule, or Inſtrument of Renunciation into His own hands, ſaid that He Himſelf would Read it, and ſo He did diſtinctly throughout, and thereby Abſolved all His Liege People, and Renounced, Receded, and Swore to the ſame, with other things then ſaid and pronounced by Him; and did alſo Subſcribe it with His own Hand, as is more fully contain'd in the ſaid Schedule; in the following Form.

The Reſignation of Richard II.

In the Name of God Amen. I Richard by the Grace of God, King of England, and France, and Lord of Ireland, do Abſolve the Archbiſhops, Biſhops, and other Prelates of Churches, Secular, or Regular, of whatſoever Dignity, Degree, State or Condition they are, Dukes, Marqueſſes, Earls, Barons, Vaſſals, and Valvaſors, and all my Liege-men whatſoever, Eccleſiaſticks, or Seculars, of all the ſaid Kingdoms and Dominions, by what Name ſoever they are known, from the Oath of Fealty and Homage, and other Oaths whatſoever to be made, and from all Bond or Tie of Legiance, Royalty and Dominion, whereby they have been or are in any manner Bound unto Me. And I do Free, Releaſe and Acquit them, and their Heirs and Succeſſors for ever from the ſaid Oaths and other Obligations whatſoever. And I do diſmiſs them free, acquitted and diſcharged, as far as relates to my Perſon, as to the whole effect of Law which may follow from the Premiſes, or any of them. And I do freely of my own Accord, ſimply and abſolutely, in and by the beſt Manner, Way and Form that I can, by theſe Writings Renounce and totally Reſign all Kingly Dignity and Majeſty, with the Crown, Dominion and Power of the ſaid Kingdoms and Lordſhips, and all other My Dominions and Poſſeſſions any way belonging or appertaining unto Me, by what Name ſoever they may be called, within the aforeſaid Kingdom, or elſewhere; and all Right or Colour of Right and Title, Poſſeſſion and Dominion, which at any time I ever had, now have, or by any means ſhall have in or to the ſame, or any of them, with all their Appurtenances or Dependencies; and alſo the Rule and Government and Adminiſtration of the ſaid Kingdoms and Dominions, with all manner of meer and mixt Empire, and Juriſdiction to Me in the ſame belonging, and to the Name of King, and the Honour and Regality thereof, purely, voluntarily, ſimply and abſolutely, by the beſt manner, way and form that the ſame can be done by theſe Writings. And I do Renounce, and do totally Reſign them, and both in Deed and Word diſmiſs and quit the ſame, and from them do recede for ever. Saving to my Succeſſors, Kings of England, the Rights to Them, or any of Them belonging, or that ſhall any ways belong in the ſaid Kingdoms and Dominions and all other the Premiſſes for ever. And I do confeſs, acknowledge, repute, and truly, out of certain knowledge, do Judge my ſelf to have been, and now to be, utterly inſufficient and unfit for the Rule and Government of the ſaid Kingdoms and Dominions, with all their Appurtenances, and for My Notorious Demerits, I deſerve to be Depoſed; and I do Swear upon theſe Holy Goſpels of God, by Me Corporally touched, that I will never Act contrary to the ſaid Reſignation, Renunciation, Diſmiſſion, and Ceſſion, nor any way oppoſe the ſame in Deed or in Word, by my Self, or any Others; nor will as much as in Me lies permit the ſame, publickly or privately to be contraven'd, or oppoſed; but the ſaid Renunciation, Reſignation, Diſmiſſion, and Ceſſion, will for ever hold ratified, and will firmly obſerve the ſame in the whole, and in every part; ſo God Me Help, and theſe his Holy Goſpels.

Then follow theſe Words in Latin.

Ego Richardus Rex Antedictus propria manu hæc Subſcribo, i. e.

I the before-named King Richard, do Subſcribe this with my own Hand.

[1] *Ib. N.*14. The King declares it was his Will that the Duke of Lancaſter ſhould ſucceed Him.

And [1.] preſently to the ſaid Renunciation, and Ceſſion, the ſaid King declared by word of Mouth, That if it lay in His Power, the ſaid Duke of Lancaſter ſhould ſucceed in His Kingdom. But ſeeing this did not depend on His Pleaſure, He did Requeſt the ſaid Archbiſhop of York, and the Biſhop of Hereford (whom He for that time had Conſtituted His Procurators) to declare and intimate ſuch His Ceſſion and Renunciation to the States of the Kingdom, that they would be pleaſed to ſignifie to the People His Will and Intention in that behalf. And in token of ſuch His Will and Intention, He did then and there openly pluck off the Golden Ring of His Signet from His own Finger, and put it upon the Finger of the ſaid Duke of Lancaſter, deſiring, as He affirmed, that the ſame might be made known to all the States of the Kingdom, which being done, taking their Leaves on both ſides, they all went out of the ſaid Tower, to return to their Lodgings.

On [1.] the Morrow being Tueſday the Feaſt of St. Hierom, the Parliament met in Weſtminſter-Hall, where the Archbiſhop of York, and Biſhop of Hereford, publickly declared the King's Ceſſion, and Renunciation, with the Inſcription of the King's Hand, and alſo the delivery of the Signet to the Duke of Lancaſter. The Ceſſion and Renunciation was firſt read in Latin, then in Engliſh, and the States and People there preſent were asked, if for their own Intereſt, and the Profit of the Nation, they would admit the Ceſſion and Renunciation, who unanimouſly Anſwer'd, They would admit it.

[1.] *Ib.N.*15. The Archbiſhop of York, and Biſhop of Hereford, publickly declare the King's Renunciation to the Parliament.

After [2.] which Admiſſion, it was publickly Propoſed and agreed, that beſides that, it would be moſt expedient, and advantageou to the Nation, and to remove all Scruples, and Siniſter Suſpicions, that the many Crimes and Defects committed by the ſaid King during the time of His Government, and for which, as He Confeſſed in His ſaid Ceſſion, He might be worthily Depoſed, ſhould be drawn up in Writing, and Publickly Read and Declared to the People. The Tenor of all which Articles, is as follows.

[2.] Ib. It is alſo agreed that the Articles againſt King Richard, ſhould be drawn up in Writing.

But before I ſet them down, I cannot forbear taking notice, that what is next entred upon the Roll, ſeems impertinent to the Matter in hand; for before the Articles themſelves, there is here inſerted a Form of the Oath, which the Kings of England took at their Coronations, and which is received from them by the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and was alſo taken by King Richard the Second.

But ſince I have given you the Subſtance of it in the beginning of this Reign, it need not be again repeated; nor can I imagine to what purpoſe it was enter'd here, unleſs it were to ſet forth this King's manifold Tranſgreſſions of the ſaid Oath, for the Breach of which, they thought fit to Depoſe Him.

The Title of the ſaid Articles are thus.

The

The Objections or Articles againſt King RICHARD, in order to His Depoſing.

Anno Dom. 1399.

I. Ib. N. 18. FIRST, it is Objected to King Richard, That for His Evil Government, by giving the Goods and Poſſeſſions of the Crown to Perſons unworthy, and His indiſcreet ſquandring of them away, and for that end impoſing grievous and intolerable Burthens upon the People, without any Reaſon, and likewiſe other innumerable Evils by his own Aſſent and Command perpetrated, there were by the whole Parliament, Choſen and Aſſigned certain Prelates, and other Lords Temporal, who with all their Power ſhould faithfully labour at their own Charges, about the juſt Government of the Kingdom, the King having holden a Conventicle with his Accomplices, therein propoſing to Impeach of High Treaſon the ſaid Lords Spiritual and Temporal ſo employed about the Government of the Kingdom, and violently drew in the Juſtices of the ſaid Kingdom to Confirm this his Wicked Purpoſe, for fear of Death, and Corporal Tortures, endeavouring with all his might to deſtroy the ſaid Lords.

II. Ib. N. 19. Item, The ſame King lately at Shrewsbury, cauſed to come before Him, and others his Favourites, into a Chamber many Perſons, and the greater part of the Judges, where by Threats and divers Terrors, He induced, cauſed and forced them ſingly to make Anſwer to certain Queſtions on his behalf, touching the Laws of his Kingdom, againſt their Will, and otherwiſe than they would have Anſwered, had they not been ſo forced; by Colour of which Anſwers, the ſame King propoſed to have proceeded afterwards to the deſtruction of Thomas Duke of Glouceſter, the Earls of Arundel and Warwick, and other Lords, againſt whom He was very much incenſed, eſpecially becauſe they deſired Him to be under good Government; but by Divine Providence, and the Reſiſtance and Power of the ſaid Lords, the King could not bring his Deſign to effect.

III. Ib. N. 20. Item, When the Lords Temporal in defence of themſelves, reſiſted his Malice and Craft, the ſaid King prefixed a day for the Parliament to do them and others Juſtice; who upon Faith and Confidence therein, remained quietly in their own Houſes; but the King privately with his Letters or Commiſſion, ſent the Duke of Ireland into Cheſhire, to raiſe Arms againſt the ſaid Lords, Great Men, and Officers of the Commonweal, Publickly Erecting his Standard againſt the Peace He had Sworn to keep; from whence many Homicides, Captivities, Diſſentions, and other infinite Miſchiefs, followed thro' the whole Kingdom, for which Cauſe He incurred Perjury.

IV. Ib. N. 21. Item, That altho' the ſaid King had Pardoned the Duke of Glouceſter the Earls of Arundel and Warwick, and all their Aſſiſtants all Offence in full Parliament, and for divers Years had ſhewn chearful Tokens o Peace and Love towards them, yet the ſame King, always bearing malice in his Heart, took an Opportunity, and cauſed to be ſeiſed th

The Earl of Arundel Pleading his Charter of Pardon, and demanding Juſtice to be done him in Parliament, yet he was encompaſſed with great numbers of Armed Men, and had his Head Wickedly ſtruck off, and Committed the Earl of Warwick and Lord Cobham to perpetual Impriſonment, Confiſcating their Lands againſt Juſtice, the Laws of his Kingdom, and his expreſs Oath, and giving them to their Appellants, or Accuſers.

Item, At the time when in Parliament He cauſed the Duke of Glouceſter, and Earls of Arundel and Warwick to be Condemned, that He might the more freely exerciſe his Cruelty upon them, and accompliſh his injurious Will on others, He drew to him a great multitude of Malefactors out of the County of Cheſter, who marching up and down the Kingdom with the King, as well within his own Houſe as without, cruelly killed his Liege Subjects, beat and wounded others, Plundring the Goods of the People, refuſing to pay for their Victuals, Violating and Raviſhing their Wives, and other Women; and altho' great Complaints were made to the King of theſe Exceſſes, yet He took no care to apply any Remedy, or do Juſtice upon them, but favoured thoſe People in their Wickedneſs, truſting in them, and their Aſſiſtance, againſt all others of his Kingdom; for which Cauſe his good Subjects had great matter of Commotion, and Indignation. V. Ib. N. 22.

Item, Altho' the ſaid King cauſed Proclamation to be made throughout the Kingdom, that He had cauſed his Uncle the Duke of Glouceſter, and the Earls of Arundel and Warwick to be Arreſted, not for any Rebellious Congregations, or marchings with Horſe up and down the Kingdom, but for many Extortſions, Oppreſſions, and other things done againſt his Regality, and Royal Majeſty, and that it was not his Intention that any of their Company at the time of their Aſſembling and marching with Horſe aforeſaid, ſhould for that Reaſon be Queſtioned or diſturbed; yet the ſaid King afterwards in his Parliament Impeached the ſaid Lords, not for any ſuch Extortſions, Oppreſſions, or other things aforeſaid, but for pretended Rebellious Tumults, Aſſemblies, and marching with Horſe, adjudging them to death, and cauſed many of their Company for fear of death to make Fine and Ranſom as Traytors, to the great deſtruction of abundance of his People; and ſo He craftily, fraudulently and maliciouſly deceived the Lords, their Followers, and the People of the Nation. VI. Ib. N. 23.

Item, After many of theſe Perſons had paid their Fines and Ranſoms, and had obtain'd his Letters Patents of full Pardon, yet they receiv'd no benefit thereby, until they made new Fines for their Lives, by which they were much impoveriſh'd, which was highly in derogation to the Name and Honour of a King. VII. Ib. N. 24.

Item, in the laſt Parliament holden at Shrewsbury, the ſame King purpoſing to Oppreſs his People, ſubtilly procur'd, and cauſed to be VIII. Ib. N. 25.

Anno Dom. 1399. granted, that the whole Power of Parliament, by Conſent of all the States of the Kingdom ſhould remain in ſome certain Perſons, who, after the Parliament ſhould be diſſolved, might anſwer the Petitions depending in Parliament, then undetermin'd, and undiſpatched. By Colour of which Grant they proceeded to other General Matters touching that Parliament, according to the King's Will, in derogation to the State of Parliament, great diſadvantage and prejudice to the Kingdom, and of Pernicious Example. And that theſe Actions might ſeem to have ſome Colour and Authority, the King cauſed the Rolls of Parliament to be changed, raſed and blotted as He pleaſed, contrary to the effect of the Grant aforeſaid.

IX. Ib. N. 26. Item, Notwithſtanding the ſaid King at his Coronation had Sworn that He would do and cauſe to be done in all his Judgments, equal and right Juſtice, with diſcretion, in Mercy and Truth according to his Power; yet the ſaid King without all Mercy, rigorouſly amongſt other things, Ordained under great Penalties, that no Man ſhould intercede with Him for any Favour toward Henry Duke of Lancaſter then in Baniſhment; and in ſo doing, He acted againſt the Bond of Charity, and raſhly Violated his Oath.

X. Ib. N. 27. Item, That tho' the Crown of England, with the Rights of the ſaid Crown and Kingdom it ſelf, have been in all times paſt ſo free, that neither the Pope, nor any other Foreign Power had any thing to do in the ſame, yet the ſaid King, for the corroborating of his erroneous Statutes, ſupplicated the Pope to confirm the Statutes made in his laſt Parliament; whereupon He obtained his Apoſtolick Letters, or Bull, wherein were contained grievous Cenſures againſt all ſuch as ſhould preſume to contravene them. All which things are known to be againſt the Crown, and Royal Dignity, and againſt the Statutes and Liberties of the ſaid Kingdom.

XI. Ib. N. 28. Item, Although the Lord Henry, now Duke of Lancaſter, by the King's Command, Exhibited his Bill or Accuſation againſt the Duke of Norfolk, concerning the State and Honour of the King, and duly proſecuted it, ſo that he was ready to make it good by Combat, as the King had order'd it, yet the ſaid King had put it by, and without any Lawful Cauſe Baniſh'd the ſaid Duke of Lancaſter for ten Years, againſt all Juſtice, the Laws and Cuſtoms of the Kingdom, and the Military Law in that behalf, thereby damnably incurring Perjury, XII. Ib. N. 29. Item, After the ſaid King had graciouſly granted to the now Duke of Lancaſter, by his Letters Patents, that while he was in Baniſhment, his Attorneys might Sue for Livery of any Inheritance that might fall to him, for which Homage was due, which ſhould be reſpited for Paying a reaſonable Fine, He injuriouſly revoked thoſe Letters Patents againſt the Laws of the Land, thereby incurring Perjury.

XIII. Ib. N. 30. Item, Notwithſtanding it had been Ordain'd, that every Year the King's Officers, with the Juſtices, and others of his Council, ſhould Nominate and Chuſe the Sheriffs of all Counties according to their diſcretion, yet he alone Commanded others of his Party, and ſuch as would do as he would have them, to be Sheriffs, to the great Grievance of his People, contrary to the Laws of his Kingdom, thereby notoriouſly incurring Perjury.

XIV. Ib. N. 31.

Item, That whereas the ſaid King Borrowed ſeveral Sums of Money from Lords and others by his Letters Patents, promiſing faithfully to repay them at a certain Term, he did not perform ſuch his Promiſe, whereby his Creditors are much grieved, and not only they, but many others reckon him an unfaithful King.

XV. Ib. N. 32.

Item, Whereas the Kings of England uſed to live very well upon the Revenues of the Kingdom, and the Patrimony of the Crown in the time of Peace, without the oppreſſion of their People, yet the ſaid King during his whole time had given the greateſt part of his Revenue to unworthy Perſons, and impoſed Burthens upon his Subjects almoſt every Year of his Reign; by which he hath not only exceſſively oppreſſed his People, but in a great meaſure impoveriſhed his Kingdom, not employing thoſe Goods to the Profit and Advantage of the Nation, but Prodigally ſquandring them away in Oſtentation, Pomp, and Vain-glory, owing in the mean time great Sums of Money for Victuals and other Neceſſaries of his Houſhold, tho' his Revenues were greater than any of his Progenitors.

XVI. Ib. N. 33.

Item, The ſaid King not willing to keep and protect the juſt Laws and Cuſtoms of his Kingdom, but to do whatever he Arbitrarily pleaſed, when thoſe Laws have been declared to him by the Juſtices, and others of his Council, deſiring that Juſtice might be done accordingly, he ſaid expreſly with an Auſtere Countenance, That the Laws were only in his Mouth and Breaſt, and that he himſelf alone could Make and Change the Laws of his Kingdom; and being ſo ſeduced, with that wrong Opinion, he would not ſuffer Juſtice to be done to many of his Liege Subjects, but by Threats and Terrors hath forced many to ceaſe from the Proſecution of Common Juſtice.

XVII. Ib. N. 34.

Item, That whereas Laws made in Parliament do always bind, until eſpecially Revoked by the Authority of another Parliament, yet the ſaid King deſiring to enjoy ſuch Liberty as no ſuch Laws ſhould bind him, and that he might do what he pleaſed, cunningly procured ſuch a Petion, on behalf of the Community of his Kingdom, to be Exhibited in Parliament, and to be Granted, That he might be as free as any of his Progenitors before him; by Colour of which Petition and Grant, he often cauſed many things to be done contrary to the Laws Unrepealed, acting therein expreſly and knowingly againſt the Oath taken at his Coronation.

XVIII. Ib. N. 35.

Item, Though it had been Ordained that no Sheriff ſhould continue in his Office above One Year together, and could not be again choſen to that Office 'till three Years after; yet the ſaid King for his own particular Profit, and ſometimes at the Inſtance, and for the Benefit of others, hath permitted ſome Sheriffs to continue in their Offices for ſometimes Two, ſometimes Three Years, contrary to the Tenour and Anno Dom. 1399. Effect of the ſaid Sratute, thereby incurring Perjury; and this wa Notoriouſly Publick, and generally Exclaim'd againſt.

XIX. Ib. N. 36. Item, Although by Law and Cuſtom, the People ought to be fre in Chooſing Two Knights to be preſent in every Parliament, to de clare their Grievances, and provide Remedies for them, yet the ſaid King, that he might obtain his own Headſtrong Will in his Parlia ments, often directed his Writs to the Sheriffs, to ſend ſuch as he No minated, ſome of whom he gained over to him by Favours, others b Threats and Terrors, others again by Bribes and Gifts; to conſent t ſuch things as were Prejudicial to the Kingdom, and Grievous to th People; and eſpecially by Granting to him the Subſidy of Wooll fo the Term of his Life, and another Subſidy for certain Years, thereb too much Oppreſſing the People.

XX. Ib. N. 37. Item, The ſaid King, that he might in all things Act Arbitraril did unlawfully cauſe and Command all Sheriffs to Swear, beſide the Antient Accuſtomed Oath, that they would Obey all his Command whenever they were ſent to them under the Great Seal, Privy-Seal, o Signet; and that in caſe they ſhould know any in their Bailiwicks o Juriſdictions, of what Condition ſoever they were, who ſhould ſpeak any Ill Publickly or Privately to the Diſgrace or Scandal of the King' Perſon, they ſhould forthwith Arreſt and Commit them to Priſon there to remain 'till they received other Commands from the King, a may be found in the Record; which Practice might in all probabilit tend to the deſtruction of many of the good Subjects of this Kingdom.

XXI. Ib. N. 38. Item, The ſaid King, that he might the more trample upon hi People, and get their Eſtates to Enrich himſelf, cauſed the People o Sixteen Counties, by Letters under their Seals, to ſubmit themſelves to him as Traytors; by Colour of which, he got from them vaſt Sums of Money to obtain his Favour. And altho' to pleaſe the People thoſe Letters Obligatory were reſtored to them, yet the Procurator of the People had full Power to bind themſelves for them to the King which he cauſed to be done, and ſo deceived his People, and ſubtil extorted their Goods from them.

XXII. Ib. N. 39. Item, Altho' the ſaid King had Sworn at his Coronation to pre ſerve the Liberties Granted to the Church of England, yet by reaſon o his Voyage into Ireland, he by his Letters Commanded many Reli gious Perſons, viz. Abbots and Priors, ſome to ſend him Horſes, others Waggons and Carriages, others great Sums of Money; by which manner of Writing, he forced many of them out of fear to comply with his Demands; by which means they were grievouſly Impoveriſh'd and Oppreſſed, in manifeſt derogation of Eccleſiaſtical Liberty, and he no leſs had incurred Perjury.

XXIII. Ib. N. 40. Item, In many Great Councils, when the Lords and Juſtices were Charged to Adviſe him Faithfully in Matters relating to his Own, and the State of the Kingdom, yet thoſe Lords and Juſtices were often ſo ſharply Rebuked, and Reproved, that they have not dared to ſpeak the Truth in giving their Advice concerning the State of himſelf, and the Kingdom.

XXIV. Ib. N. 41. Item, The Treaſure, Reliques, and Jewels of the Crown, (the Goods of the Kingdom) which had and ought to be repoſited in the Treaſury for the Honour of the King, and Preſervation of the Kingdom, againſt any ſudden Emergency that might happen, the ſaid King carried into Ireland with him, without the Conſent of the States of the Realm, whereby the Kingdom had been greatly Impoveriſh'd, if God had not otherwiſe Provided, by the re-taking of thoſe Goods from him againſt his Will. And furthermore, he cauſed the Rolls of Records concerning the State and Government of his Kingdom. to be raſed, to the great prejudice of his People, and Diſheritance of the Crown; and all this he did, as it is ſtrongly believed, for the Support of his Evil Government.

XXV. Ib. N. 42. Item, He was ſo Variable and Diſſembling in his Words and Writings, and ſo contrary to himſelf, eſpecially in Writing to the Pope, Kings, and other Lords out of the Kingdom, as well as within it, and alſo to his other Subjects, that no Man living knowing what he was, could confide in him; yea he was reputed ſo Unfaithful and Inconſtant, that he not only became a Scandal to his own Perſon, but alſo to the whole Kingdom, and to all Foreigners, when once they came to know him.

XXVI. Ib. N. 43. Item, Tho' the Lands, Tenements, Goods and Chattels of all Freemen, by the Laws of the Land, ought not to be Seiſed, unleſs they be Forfeited, yet the ſaid King, intending to enervate thoſe Laws, in the preſence of very many Lords, and others of the Community of the Kingdom, hath often ſaid and affirmed, that the Life of every one of his Subjects, and his Lands, Tenements, Goods, and Chattels, were his, to be diſpoſed of as he pleaſed, without any Forfeiture; which is utterly againſt the Laws and Cuſtoms of the Kingdom.

XXVII. Ib. N. 44. Item, Altho' it had been Enacted a Law, which had hitherto been Confirmed; That no Freeman ſhall be taken, &c. nor any ways deſtroy'd, and that the King ſhall not proceed againſt him but by Lawful Tryal of his Peers, or the Law of the Land; yet according to the Will, Command and Appointment of the ſaid King, very many of his Liege-People being maliciouſly Accuſed, for having ſpoken Publickly, or Privately, words that might tend to the Scandal and Diſgrace of the King's Perſon, have been taken, Impriſoned, and brought before the Conſtable and Marſhal in the Court Military, and there being Accuſed, they could not be admitted to give any other Anſwer, than not Guilty; and could defend themſelves no otherwiſe than by * their Bodies, their Accuſers being Young Men, Luſty and Stout, whereas they were often Antient, Impotent, Lame, or Infirm; whereby not only the Deſtruction of divers Lords and Great Men, but of many other private Perſons of the Community of the Kingdom, were likely to have follow'd; ſince therefore the ſaid King hath wilfully contraven'd this Law, it was not to be doubted but he hath incurred the Crime of Perjury.

* By Combate.

XXVIII. Ib. N. 45. Item, Altho' the People of England by Vertue of their Liegeance, were ſufficiently bound to their King, and if they Offended in any manner, he is enabled to Correct and Puniſh them by the Laws and Cuſtoms of the Kingdom, yet the ſaid King deſiring to trample on, and too much Oppreſs his People, that he might the more freely execute and follow the Fancy of his Fooliſh and Unlawful Will, he ſent his Letters into all Counties of this Kingdom; that all his Liege Subjects, as well Spiritual as Temporal, ſhould take certain Oaths in General, which were very grievous to them, and which might probably cauſe the final Deſtruction of his People, and that they ſhould Confirm thoſe Oaths under their Letters and Seals; which Command the People obey'd, leſt they ſhould incur his Indignation, and likewiſe for fear of Death.

XXIX. *Ib. To which the King, as if he had been aſtoniſhed, preſently Anſwer'd, He thought it might ſo happen, and that he himſelf might be expelled his Kingdom by his Subjects; and further ſaid, that if it ſhould be ſo, he would convey himſelf to the ſame Place where he the Archbiſhop then ſhould be; and that the Archbiſhop might the more readily believe him, he ſhew'd him a great Jewel of Gold under his upper Veſtment, which he ſaid he would ſend to him as a Token, that he would not defer his coming to the Place where he was. And that the Archbiſhop might have ſtill the greater Confidence in him, he ſent to him, Adviſing him that he ſhould privately ſend all the Jewels belonging to his Chappel to the ſaid King, to be ſafely kept, leſt under the Colour of the Judgment of Baniſhment, they might be ſeized; which being ſo done, the King cauſed them to be put into certain Coffers, and thoſe to be locked up, and Sealed by one of the Archbiſhop's Clerks, by whom he returned the Keys to him; yet afterwards he cauſed the ſaid Coffers to be broken open, and took out the Goods, and diſpoſed of them according to his own will and pleaſure. Furthermore, the ſaid King faithfully promiſed the Archbiſhop, that if he would repair to the Port of Hampton, in order to go out of the Kingdom, he would by the Queen's Interceſſion get him to be recalled. And if it ſhould ſo happen that he ſhould go out of the Kingdom, yet after Eaſter next coming, he ſhould return into England without fail, nor ſhould he any way loſe his Archbiſhoprick: This too he faithfully Promiſed, Swearing upon the Croſs of St. Thomas the Martyr, Archbiſhop of Canterbury; notwithſtanding which Promiſes the King cauſed the Archbiſhop to go out of the Kingdom, and wrote to the Pope for his Tranſlation to ſome mean Foreign Biſhoprick.
